

AN IMPARTIAL REPORT

OF THE DEBATES

IN THE
TWO HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT,

DURING THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE FIFTH PARLIAMENT

OF THE
UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET AT WESTMINSTER,
ON TUESDAY THE 28TH DAY OF JANUARY, 1817,

IN THE
56TH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE THE THIRD; INCLUDING

AUTHENTIC COPIES OF ROYAL SPEECHES AND MESSAGES; ADDRESSES, PETITIONS, REPORTS;

THE ANNUAL FINANCE ACCOUNTS, AND OTHER IMPORTANT PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS, TOGETHER WITH A LIST OF ALL PUBLIC ACTS PASSED DURING THE SESSION, AN ANALYTICAL TABLE OF CONTENTS, AND COMPLETE ALPHABETICAL INDEXES.

BY ROBERT HARDING EVANS.

London:

PRINTED FOR PAYNE AND FOSS, PALL MALL; CADELL AND DAVIES, STRAND
R. HUNTER, ST. PAUL'S CHURCH-YARD; AND JOHN RICHARDSON, ROYAL EXCHANGE.

1817.

PREFACE.

In submitting the following work to the notice of the Public, the Editor thinks it necessary, in the first place, to apologize for the lateness of its appearance. The delay has been occasioned, in a great degree, by the difficulties inseparable from a first undertaking of this nature, and his anxiety to render it as accurate and as full as his exertions, and the limits to which he had confined himself, would allow. In this latter view, he ventures to hope that some benefits have arisen from retarding the publication. By deferring it till this time, he has been enabled to complete the history of many interesting transactions, and to annex some useful documents which could not have been otherwise incorporated with the work. The reader is now furnished with a faithful account of the trial of Andrew M'Kinlay, for administering unlawful oaths, at Glasgow; and with the result of the proceedings for High Treason at Manchester and Derby; so that he will have before him, at once, the principal facts upon which some of the most important legislative measures of the Session were founded. The Finance accounts also are brought down to the latest period; and such notes and observations are annexed to the body of the work, as may tend to render the immediate subject of debate more clear, and to save the trouble of referring to other authorities.

In the next place, the Editor feels it his duty to mention the sources from which his Reports have been derived. A constant attendance on his part in one or other of the Houses, during the whole of the Session—a careful investigation of the printed debates in the public journals—a regular inspection of the Votes and proceedings of the House of Commons, and a minute comparison of his notes with the corrected speeches of Members, constitute the grounds on which the Editor ventures to invite attention to this new publication. The utmost impartiality has been scrupulously adhered to, and nothing is omitted, or super-added, to place any subject in a different view from that in which it appeared at the time of discussion. In the next Session, should the present undertaking be favourably received, the Editor will be happy to avail himself of a more particular communication with the Members, for the purpose of correcting their speeches on important occasions; but he begs leave most respectfully to observe, that, in every such instance, he shall consider himself bound to adhere to what was actually spoken; and not, for the sake of perfecting the speech, to extend the line of argument. Speeches have been occasionally published by Members themselves, which have gone more fully into the subject than what they spoke on the occasion, whilst particular passages, which produced an impression on one side or other of the House, have been wholly omitted. The Editor has now before him a corrected speech of an honourable Member, in the preface to which it is stated, that the licence of publishing more than was spoken is usual. That it has been usual, the Editor is perfectly aware; but it seems to him, with all due deference, that the propriety of the practice is extremely questionable. In a series of debates, it certainly ought not to exist; as it would not only impose on the confidence of the reader, but be very unfair towards those who succeed in the discussion, who, from any thing that appears, must be supposed incapable of furnishing any reply to the arguments of the previous speaker. The Editor hopes that this view of the subject will be considered a sufficient apology for the remark which he has taken the liberty of making.

At the beginning of the work, will be found an analytical table of the debates in both Houses; and alphabetical indexes, both of the Speakers, and of the Debates, are placed at the end. In the latter, some heads are set down which were not the immediate subject of discussion; but the Editor conceived that this mode of bringing them into view would not be unacceptable to the reader, as it may frequently save him the trouble and fatigue of research. No difficulty can arise in distinguishing the points which formed the direct object of inquiry from those which were only incidentally mentioned.

A list of all the Public (General) Acts passed during the Session is inserted at the end of the Appendix; and to facilitate the search for any particular act, the Editor has arranged the whole of them under different heads, according to the nature of the subject to which they relate.

For the rest, he has only to express a hope that no material errors will be discovered in the work: if any inadvertencies occur, they are, he trusts, so slight, that they will be obvious to the reader, who will no doubt excuse them. Should his efforts on the present occasion be honoured with the patronage of the public, no endeavour shall be wanting, on his part, to render the Reports of the ensuing Session more perfect, and to complete them at an earlier period.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

I. DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.	VI. LIST OF PUBLIC (GENERAL) ACTS.
II. LISTS OF CONTENTS AND NOT-CONTENTS.	VII. ADDENDA.
III. DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.	VIII. INDEX OF SPEAKERS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.
IV. LISTS OF MAJORITIES AND MINORITIES.	IX. INDEX OF SPEAKERS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.
V. APPENDIX, CONTAINING PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS AND ACCOUNTS.	X. INDEX TO THE DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.
	XI. INDEX TO THE DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

I. DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

	Page
1817.
Jan. 28. The Prince Regent's Speech at the Opening of the Session.....
Communication respecting an Attack on the Prince Regent, in his passage from Parliament.
Address voted to the Prince Regent.	2
A Conference held with the Commons.	2
29. Message from the Commons, respecting their Privileges, in receiving Messages from the Lords.	20
The Prince Regent's Answer to the Address.	20
Address moved by the Earl of Dartmouth, in answer to the Speech from the Throne	20
Addressees voted to the Prince Regent, the Queen, and the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, on the Marriage of the two latter.	45
The Earl of Shaftesbury appointed Chairman of the Committees of the House.	46
31. Message from the Commons, respecting their Privileges, in holding Conferences with the Lords.	69
Feb. 1. The House proceed in state, to present their Address on the Speech from the Throne	82
2. The Prince Regent's Answer to the Address.
Liberty of the Subject—Petition of Mr. Hunt, praying for the protection of the House.	83
.....Petition of Thomas Dugood, praying to be heard at the bar, on certain grievances.	84
Message from the Prince Regent, announcing the existence of Seditious Practices.	85
Papers laid on the table relative thereto.	85
Vote of Thanks to Lord Exmouth, Sir David Milne, and the Dutch Admiral Capellen, and the Seamen and Marines, for the successful result of the attack upon Algiers.	85
4. Address voted to the Prince Regent, in answer to the Message respecting Seditious Practices.	94
5. A Secret Committee, chosen by ballot, to examine the Papers.	99
Lord Exmouth's Answer to the Vote of Thanks.	105
6. Debt of Louis XVIII. to the British Government.	109
Loan to the French Government.	110
Vote of Thanks to the Marquis of Hastings, Sir David Ochterlony, and the Troops, for the successful conclusion of the War in Nepal.	111
12. Roman Catholics—Laws and Ordinances of Foreign States respecting them.	159
Earl Grosvenor's notice of a Motion on Sinecures and Useless Places.—His Lordship's observations on Parliamentary Reform.	159
18. Petition from Glasgow for Reform.	169
Report of the Secret Committee.	189
Petitions of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London—of the Common Council of London—of the Ward of Aldgate—and the Borough of Rutherglen—for Reform of Parliament.	196
Loan to the French Government.	198
21. Petition of the Secretary of the London Union Society, respecting the Report of the Secret Committee.	213
Bill, introduced by Lord Sidmouth, to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act.	217
24. Earl Grey's Observations on the intention of Ministers to give up part of their Incomes.	239
Petition from the Borough of Southwark, for Economy and Reform.	239
Second Petition of the Secretary of the London Union Society, respecting the Report of the Secret Committee.	259
Petition of Mr. Hunt, respecting the Meetings in Spa-fields.	248

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

	Page
Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act—Second and Third Reading.....	248
Protest against the Bill.....	278
25. Owen's Divorce Bill—Question, as to Execution having been sued out upon the Judgment of the Court below.....	303
28. Petitions of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, and also of the Livery of London, against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	383
Petition from one of the Hundreds of Lancashire, respecting Seditious Meetings..	388
Petitions from Ayrshire and Montrose for a Reform of Parliament.....	364
Malt Duty Bill—Amendment proposed by Lord Redesdale to omit the Clause enabling persons holding Offices to give up part of their Salaries.....	384
March 3. The Lord Chancellor's Declaration that persons confined under the Suspension Bill are entitled to state their grievances by Petition to the Sovereign or Parliament, and that Gaolers are liable to punishment for preventing them.....	415
Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act—Amendments made by the Commons, respecting Scotland.....	415
The Earl of Danley's motion that the consideration of the Bill be put off for three months.....	416
Protest on the Motion being negatived.....	Ad agenda.
Petitions from Kilmarnock, and the Ward of Bishopsgate, for Retrenchment and Reform.....	410
Petition of Mr. John Thomas Waters, praying for the abolition of Capital Punishments.	440
5. Claim to the Mountnorris Peerage established.....	417
Army and Navy Seduction—and Treasonable Practices Bills—Second Reading...	447
6. Bailey's Divorce Bill—Question as to the access of the Husband.....	454
7. Army and Navy Seduction—and Treasonable Practices Bill—Third Reading—Amendments made.....	453
10. Bailey's Divorce Bill—Evidence given to shew that the Child was not that of the Husband.....	458
11. Earl Grosvenor's Resolutions respecting Sinecures and Useless Places.....	479
12. Bailey's Divorce Bill—Question as to the Illegitimacy of the Child—Rule of the House, in granting a Divorce, not to alter the state in society of any other individual.....	507
13. Bailey's Divorce Bill—The act of Adultery considered, as unconnected with the Question of Legitimacy.....	526
Petition from Shawford, praying for the Restoration of the Income Tax.....	526
Petition from Southwark, for Retrenchment and Reform.....	526
Farther Observations on Earl Grosvenor's Resolutions respecting Sinecures.....	527
14. Army and Navy Seduction and Treasonable Practices Bill—Returned from the Commons, with the Amendments agreed to.....	550
Irish Distilleries—Petition from Belfast.....	580
17. Bailey's Divorce Bill—Question as to a Remission or Condonation of the Adultery. Seditious Meetings Bill—First Reading.....	610
18. Lord Holland's Motion for Papers respecting the Treatment of Buonaparté.....	614
Protest on the Motion being negatived.....	633
20. Seditious Meetings Bill—Second Reading.....	646
Lord Grenville's Questions to the Ministers respecting Acts passed in the Colonies for the Registration of Slaves.....	649
21. Scotch Private Bills.....	652
Seditious Meetings Bill—Amendments in a Committee.....	652
24. Seditious Meetings Bill—Amendments on bringing up the Report.....	664
25. Seditious Meetings Bill—Third Reading.....	665
Protest against the Bill.....	689
29. Seditious Meetings Bill—Conference with the Commons respecting the Amendments.	715
16. Earl Grey's Motion for a copy of Lord Sidmouth's Circular Letter to the Lords Lieutenants of Counties, respecting Libels.....	722
Irish Peace Preservation Bill.....	722
21. Lord Sidmouth's Circular Letter respecting Libels presented—Lord Holland's Observations on the Case of Mr. Wright, an Unitarian Preacher, of Liverpool.....	723
Irish Arms Bill.....	725
24. Petitions from Saltcoats, Ardrossan, &c. for Parliamentary Reform.....	726
Earl Grey's Motion for the Opinion of the Law Officers, referred to in Lord Sidmouth's Circular Letter.....	726
25. Seditious Meetings Bill—Construction of the Bill as to granting Licences to Debating Societies.....	731
23. Seditious Meetings Bill—Academical Society—Construction of the Bill.....	745
30. Earl Grey's Motion for copies of the Opinions referred to by the Law Officers in their Opinion on Libels.....	778
21. Seditious Meetings Bill—Petition of the Academical Society.....	783
2. Petition of Salt Manufacturers at Chesterfield, relative to the Salt Duties.....	790
The Lord Chancellor's Statement respecting the Opinions and Cases referred to by the Law Officers in their Opinion on Libels.....	791

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

iii

	Page
May 7. Admiral Baron Van de Capellen's Answer to the Vote of Thanks	884
8. Petitions of the Roman Catholics of Ireland respecting their Claims.....	913
9. Owen's Divorce Bill—Passed.....	927
A Committee appointed to consider the state of the Poor Laws	927
12. Petitions of the Roman Catholics of Warwickshire and Staffordshire, respecting their Claims.....	1003
Earl Grey's Motion for the Case submitted to the Law Officers, respecting Libels	1004
Copies of the Letter and Opinion	1057
13. Lord Erskine's Remarks on the Law of Libel.....	1074
14. Gas Light Bill—Incorporated Companies.....	1092
16. Bailey's Divorce Bill—Passed.....	1113
Petitions of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford against the Roman Catholic Claims	1113
The Earl of Donoughmore's Motion for a Committee of the whole House to consider the Petitions of the Roman Catholics	1113
19. Petitions of Attornies, praying that persons not of the Profession, might not be allowed to draw Conveyances.....	1162
20. Message sent to the Commons, to request that some of their Members might be permitted to attend, to be examined before the Committee on the Poor Laws.....	1178
21. Leave given to Lord Melville, to attend the Finance Committee of the Commons....	1229
22. Acts relating to Tithes in Upper Canada.....	1235
23. Office Abolition and Regulation Bills—First Reading.....	1249
Lord Erskine's Motion for an account of all Recognizances given for Libel, since the year 1640.....	1250
The Earl of Liverpool's notice of a Message to be sent by the Prince Regent respecting the State of the Country	1250 & 1263
June 3. The New Speaker of the Commons approved by Commission.....	1274
Message from the Prince Regent, announcing that the late Speaker had been created Baron Colechester, and recommending the House to make provision for him and his next heir male.....	1275
Message from the Prince Regent, respecting the continuance of Seditious Practices	1276
Address voted to the Prince Regent.....	1276
A Secret Committee appointed to examine the Papers	1277
Lord Holland's Motion, respecting the Right of Magistrates to visit State Prisoners	1288
Protest against the exclusion of the Magistrates.....	1297
5. Address voted to the Prince Regent in Answer to the Message respecting the late Speaker.....	1307
Petition of the Lord Mayor and Livery of London, against the further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	1307
6. Miller's Divorce Bill—Question whether the Husband, residing at Malta, had made such inquiries as might lead to a detection of his Wife's misconduct, she having had four children during his absence.....	1329
Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, against the further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	1329
Poor Employment Bill—Second Reading	1329
10. Poor Employment Bill—Third Reading	1352
12. Second Report of the Secret Committee.....	1372
Petition of Freeholders of Berkshire against the further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act	1378
Commission of the Peace (Ireland)—Petition of Patrick O'Hanlon, Esq.	1378
13. Bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—First Reading	1380
16. Earl Grosvenor's Motion for the Names, Ages, and Descriptions of Persons confined under the Suspension Act.....	1389
Bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—Second Reading	1391
17. Edinburgh and Glasgow Canal Bill.....	1424
Petition of Inhabitants of Chester, against the further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	1425
Earl Grosvenor's second motion for the Names, Ages, and Descriptions of Persons confined under the Suspension Act.....	1425
Bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—Committee	1427
18. Petition of Inhabitants of Chester, in favour of the Continuance of the Suspension Act.....	1431
19. Petition of the Managers of the Savings Bank at Bristol against certain Clauses in the Savings Banks Bill.....	1451
Bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—Third Reading.....	1452
20. Savings Banks Bill—Second Reading	1486
24. Return of the Number and Ages of Persons confined under the Suspension Act....	1573
25. Correspondence relative to the High Sheriff of Tipperary.....	1599
Petition of Freeholders of Warwickshire against the Bill for continuing the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	1598
Irish Insurrection Bill.....	1598

	Page
June 25. Petition of the Managers of the Bath Provident Institution, against the Savings Banks Bill—Bill Committed—Amendments made.....	1602
26. Lord Melville's Notice of his intention to present a Bill respecting the administration of Oaths to Naval and Military Officers.....	1633
Clergy Residence Bill—First Reading.....	1633
Tithes Leasing Bill—First Reading—Proceeded no farther.....	1633
Office Abolition and Regulation Bills—Second Reading.....	1634
Miller's Divorce Bill—Second Reading—Objections on general principles.....	1637
Naval and Military Officers' Oaths Bill—First Reading.....	1638
30. Petitions against the use of Machinery.....	1701
Naval and Military Officers' Oaths Bill—Second Reading.....	1702
Bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—Consideration of the Amendment made by the Commons, to limit its duration to the 1st of March 1818.....	1702
Office Abolition and Regulation Bills—Committee.....	1704
July 1. Miller's Divorce Bill—Withdrawn on general principles.....	1727
Petition of the University of Cambridge, against the Tithes Leasing Bill.....	1728
Naval and Military Officers' Oaths Bill—Committee.....	1728
Clergy Residence Bill—Second Reading.....	1728
The Earl of Donoughmore's Resolutions respecting the appointment of Sheriffs in Ireland.....	1728
Savings Banks Bills—Further proceedings put off, in order that new Bills might be brought in.....	1730
2. Petition for abolishing the practice of Sweeping Chimnies by means of Climbing Boys.....	1736
Naval and Military Officers' Oaths Bill—Passed.....	1739
3. Address for a Return respecting certain Offices in Guernsey, Jersey, and other places.....	1750
Conspiracy to seduce persons to commit Crimes.....	1750
Petition of inhabitants of Chelsea, for Parliamentary Reform, and against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—Obstructions to the Right of Petitioning.....	1751
Office Abolition and Regulation Bills—Third Reading.....	1751
Clergy Residence Bill—Committee.....	1754
7. Privileges of the Commons—Appal from the Courts below, Sir F. Burdett v. the late Speaker and the Serjeant at Arms—Judgment affirmed.....	1764
Savings Banks—New Bills brought up from the Commons.....	1773
Clergy Residence Bill—Third Reading.....	1773
8. Election Laws' Amendment Bill—Second Reading put off for three months.....	1776
Savings Banks Bills—Second Reading—Bills afterwards passed without debate.....	1778
9. Chancery Suitors.....	1783
Deputy Remembrancer's Regulation Bill—Committee—proceeded no farther.....	1786
10. Report of the Committee on the Poor Laws.....	1818
Frame Breaking Bill.....	1818
Lord Grenville's Motion for an Address, respecting the Slave Trade.....	1819
Petition of the associated Unitarians of Kent and Sussex praying to be relieved from the operation of the Marriage Act.....	1821
Irish Grand Jury Presentment Bill.....	1825
11. Madhouses Regulation Bill—Second Reading—put off for three months.....	1826
12. Mr. Speaker's Speech to the Prince Regent on presenting the Appropriation Bill.....	1879
The Prince Regent's Speech on closing the Session.....	1881
The Parliament prorogued.....	1883

II. LIST OF CONTENTS AND NOT-CONTENTS.

1817.
Feb. 21.	List of the Contents on Earl Grosvenor's Motion for receiving the Petition of the Secretary of the London Union Society.....
22.	— of the Not-Contents on the First Reading of the Bill to Suspend the Habeas Corpus Act.....
16.	— of the Contents and Not-Contents on the Earl of Donoughmore's Motion for a Committee to consider the Petitions of the Roman Catholics.....
June 16.	— of the Not-Contents on the Second Reading of the Bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....

III. DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

1817.
Feb. 28.	Sir F. Burdett's notice of a Motion on Parliamentary Reform.....
	Lord Vane's Motion for an Address, in Answer to the Speech from the Throne.....
	Message from the Lords, requesting a Conference.....
	Communication made by the Lords, respecting an Attack on the Prince Regent.....
	Debate adjourned—Lord James Murray examined respecting the Attack.....
	Address voted to the Prince Regent.....

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

		Page
Jan. 29.	Privileges of the Commons, in receiving Messages from the Lords.	46
	Petitions from Bristol, Saddleworth, and other places, for a Reform of Parliament...	46
	The Prince Regent's Answer to the Address.....	47
	Privileges of the Commons, in holding Conferences with the Lords.....	47
	Debate on the Address, in Answer to the Speech from the Throne, resumed.....	49
31.	Message sent to the Lords, respecting Conferences.....	68
	Appointment of Sheriffs in Ireland.....	68
	Addresses voted on the Marriage of the Duke of Gloucester with the Princess Mary	69
	Petitions from Cornwall and Halifax, for Parliamentary Reform—Question as to reading Petitions, before they are presented.....	69
	Report of the Address, in Answer to the Speech from the Throne.....	81
Feb. 1.	Message from the Prince Regent, respecting Public Accounts, and the Estimates for the year	82
	The House proceed in state with the Address.....	82
5.	The Prince Regent's Answer to the Address.....	86
	Message from the Lords, respecting Conferences.....	86
	Petitions from Kirkintilloch, Rutherglen, Sheffield, and other places, for Parliamentary Reform.....	86
	Message from the Prince Regent, announcing the existence of Seditious Practices...	87
	Vote of Thanks to Lord Exmouth, Sir David Milne, the Dutch Admiral, Seamen and Marines, for the successful attack on Algiers.....	87
	Spanish Patriots.....	88
	Liberty of the Subject—Petition of Thomas Dugood.....	88
	Committee of Supply.....	96
4.	Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, for Economy
	and Reform.....	100
	Similar Petitions from Hamilton and Norwich—Question as to Members being satisfied that Petitions contain nothing disrespectful, before they present them.....	100
	Address voted to the Prince Regent, in Answer to the Message respecting Seditious
	Practices.....	103
	Liberty of the Subject—Petition of Mr. Hunt, praying for the protection of the House
	Bills to regulate the commerce with the Cape of Good Hope.....	104
	105	105
1.	Lord Exmouth's Answer to the Vote of Thanks.—Thanks voted to the Royal
	Artillery, Engineers, Sappers and Miners, employed in the attack.....	106
	A Secret Committee, chosen by ballot, to examine the Papers respecting Seditious
	Practices.....	106
	Loan to the French Government.....	107
	Petitions from the Meeting in Spa-fields, and from Lee, Horsforth, Tavistock, and Norwich, for Parliamentary Reform.....	108
	Petition from Absted, respecting the Poor Laws.....	109
	Committee of Supply—Vote of 28 millions for paying off Exchequer and Irish
	Treasury Bills.....	109
6.	Petitions of Cloth-workers, against the use of Machinery.....	112
	Petition from Manchester, for Reform.....	113
	Bank of England.....	116
	Vote of Thanks to the Marquis of Hastings, Sir David Ochterlony, and the troops, for the successful termination of the war in Nepal	116
	Bill to amend the Bankrupt Laws.....	119
7.	Scotch Lunatics.....	120
	Committee of Supply—Vote of Annual Taxes on Malt, Sugar, &c. and of Exchequer
	Bills.....	121
	Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London, for Economy and Reform	122
	Similar Petitions from Manchester, Salford, Leeds, and Bradford.....	124
	Appointment of a Committee on the Public Finances.....	124
10.	Petitions from Dyarl, and Kilmarnock, for Reform.....	126
	Irish Distilleries.....	126
	Leather Tax.....	126
11.	Petitions from the Meeting in Spa-fields, and from Portsdown-hill, Lynnington, Wick, and the Journeymen Tailors of the Metropolis, for Economy and Reform—Question as to respectful Language.....	126
	Machinery.....	126
	Resignation by the Marquis Camden of his Sinecure.....	126
	Petition from Coventry, respecting the Poor Laws.....	126
	Estates belonging to Greenwich Hospital.....	126
	Customs.....	126
12.	Petitions from Leeds, Dewsbury, and Glasgow, for Reform.....	126
	Lord Arden's Sinecure.....	126
	Rules and Regulations of the Metropolitan Prisons.....	126
	Colonial Audit-Office.....	126
	Game Laws.....	126

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

	Page
eb. 13. Petitions of the City of London, respecting Tithes.....	168
Petitions from Crompton, and other Places for Reform—and Petition, stating the facts as to a Petition from Warrington on the 4th instant.....	168
Bill to facilitate the business of the Court of King's Bench.....	169
Bill for the better protection of Savings Banks.....	169
Bill to regulate Madhouses.....	170
14. Secret Committee ordered to Report.....	170
Irish Savings Banks Bill.....	170
Petitions from Dunbarton, and other places, for Reform.....	170
17. Game Law.....	172
Condemned Prisoners in Newgate.....	173
Sir Francis Burdett postpones his Motion for Reform—Petitions from various places on that subject—Mr. Brougham's opinions thereon.....	176
Petitions on Agricultural Distress.....	184
Navy Estimates.....	185
Lord Milton's Motion, respecting the War Salary of the Secretaries of the Admiralty	186
Malt Duty Bill—Clause to enable persons to give up part of their Salaries.....	187
19. Appointment of a Committee on the Wootton Bassett Election—Members not to withdraw in such cases till the Ballot be completed.....	199
Report of the Secret Committee.....	200
Mr. Grenfell's motion for a Committee, respecting the Bank of England.....	207
Cash Payments.....	212
The House adjourns over the Queen's Birth-day.....	213
21. Rochester Election.....	227
Petition of Merchants and Traders of London, respecting the Window Tax.....	228
Abuses of Magistrates in licensing Public Houses.....	228
Prisoners in Newgate.....	233
Petitions from Kirkaldy, Leuchars, Boston, and Dublin, for Reform.....	234
Report of the Navy Estimates.....	234
Army Estimates.....	235
Mr. Tierney's motion for a copy of the Report of the Secret Committee of the Lords.	235
Malt Duty Bill.....	235
Mr. Curwen's Motion for a Committee on the Poor Laws.....	255
24. Petitions from Ludlow, Perth, Hull, Wakefield, &c. for Reform.....	274
Petition of Mr. Hunt, respecting the meeting in Spa-fields.....	274
Seditious Meetings Bill—introduced by Lord Castlereagh.....	277
Bills for the better preservation of the person of the Prince Regent against Treasonable Practices, and to punish the seduction of Soldiers and Sailors.....	302
25. Petition of Licensed Victuallers, complaining of the conduct of Magistrates.....	305
Petitions from Clitheroe, Arnold, Southwark, Oxford, Renfrew, Dysart, Faversham, &c. for Reform.....	305
Irish Grand Jury Presentments Bill.....	304
Duties on Wine.....	305
Message from the Lords, that they had passed a Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act.....	305
Petition of Cotton Manufacturers, touching the Report of the Secret Committee....	305
Petition of the City of Westminster against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act	305
Sir M. W. Ridley's Motion respecting the Lords of the Admiralty.....	311
26. Report on the Rochester Election.....	335
Petition of Thomas Jefferies, confined for prevaricating before the Committee on the Wootton Bassett Election.....	335
Petitions from Worcester, Nottingham, &c. for Reform.....	335
Petition of the Members of the Hampden Club, respecting the Report of the Secret Committee, &c.....	336
Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	336
Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act—First and Second Reading.....	340
27. Bill respecting Parish Settlements.....	373
Petitions from Perth, and other places, for Reform.....	373
Mr. Speaker's Reprimand of Thomas Jefferies.....	374
Hampden Clubs.....	375
Petition from Middleton, respecting the Report of the Secret Committee.....	375
Petition from Bath against the Suspension Bill.....	375
Petition of Thomas Evans, confined on suspicion of Treason.....	376
Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act—Committee.....	377
28. Petitions for Reform.....	385
Bills to prevent the seduction of Soldiers and Sailors, and to protect the Prince Regent against Treasonable Practices—Committee.....	385
Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London, against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	386
Question as to the operation of the Suspension Bill in Scotland.....	387

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

vii

	Page
Feb. 28. Petition from Liverpool against the Suspension Bill	391
Petition of the Chairman of the Hampden Club in Leicestershire, complaining of the Report of the Secret Committee	397
Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act—Third Reading—Amendments made re- specting Scotland	397
March 3. Game Laws	424
Petition from Blackburne, complaining of the acts of persons pretending to be Re- formers	424
Conduct of Mr. Casey, of Liverpool	425
Lord Morpeth's Motion for a New Writ, in the room of the late Mr. Horner	427
Seditious Meetings Bill—Second Reading	431
Bills to prevent the Seduction of Soldiers and Sailors, and to protect the person of the Prince Regent—Third Reading	438
Six Hundred Petitions presented by Sir F. Burdett, praying for Parliamentary Re- form—Question as to bringing them up postponed	438
4. Petition from Chester, in favour of the Suspension Bill.	440
Petition from Southwark, against the Bill.	440
Petitions for Reform	441
Torture of a British Subject at Hayti	441
Game Laws	444
Mr. Ponsonby's Motion for leave to bring in a Bill to enable persons to hold their Offices, without taking out new patents, on the Demise of the Crown	445
Appointment of a Committee to inquire into the state of the Lunatic Poor in Ireland	446
5. Committee of Supply—Vote for Civil Services, and an additional sum for the Army	447
Mr. M. Fitzgerald's Motion for an Address respecting the Scarcity in Ireland	448
New Silver Coinage	449
7. Petitions from Berkshire, York, &c. for Reform.	456
Mr. Tierney's name struck off the list of Members on the Finance Committee, at his request, owing to indisposition	457
Petitions on the Poor Laws	457
The Police Committee re-appointed	458
Irish Distilleries	459
Petition of Settlers in New South Wales complaining of the Governor.	459
Petitions from several places in Scotland for Reform	461
Committee of Supply—Army Estimates—Exchequer Bills	462
French Payment, pursuant to the Treaty of Peace	465
Seditious Meetings Bill—Report brought up, and Amendments proposed	467
Bill to facilitate the business of the Court of Exchequer.	479
11. Petition of Freeholders of Kent for Retrenchment and Reform	494
Sir J. Newport's Motion respecting Fees, &c. in Courts of Justice	498
Irish Police Bill	504
12. Game Laws	508
Committee of Supply—Exchequer Bills	508
Charges of the Bank of England	509
Cold Bath Fields Prison—Mr. Evans	510
Petition from Liverpool for Reform—Conduct of the Mayor.	511
Adjourned Debate on the Six Hundred Petitions for Reform—The printed Petitions rejected, and others for Informalities	516
13. Mr. Brougham's Motion for a Committee on Trade and Manufactures	519
14. Wootton Bassett Election	531
Committee of Supply—Navy Estimates.	531
Game Laws	534
Seditious Meetings Bill—Third Reading—Amendments.	534
17. Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, against State Lotteries	611
Ordnance Estimates	611
Police Committee—To report generally relative to granting Licences to Victuallers	611
18. New Street Bill	631
Motion for a New Writ in the room of Mr. Serjeant Best, appointed a Welsh Judge	634
Mr. Lyttleton's Resolutions respecting Lotteries	634
19. Duties on Rice	644
Scotch Lunatic Asylums	644
Mr. Ponsonby's Notice of a Motion respecting Welsh Judges sitting in Parliament..	644
Mr. Brougham's Motion for copies of Treaties relative to the cession of Monte- Video to Portugal	644
20. New Churches	654
Petition from the Ward of Bishopsgate for Reform	654
21. Game Laws	654
Irish Arms Bill	664
23. Petitions on the Poor Laws, and for Retrenchment and Reform	694

	Page
March 26. A Committee appointed to consider a more expeditious mode of printing the Votes of the House	690
Duties on Salt	691
27. Bankrupt Laws Amendment Bill	692
Petitions from several Places in Scotland for Reform	692
Petitions of Attornies, praying that persons not of the Profession might not be allowed to draw Conveyances.....	692
Petition of Riband Weavers, praying for the protection of their Trade	692
Sir J. C. Hipplesey's Motion for copies of Despatches from Ministers accredited to Foreign States, respecting the appointment of Prelates under the See of Rome... ..	693
First Report of the Finance Committee.....	693
Tithes Leasing Bill—First Reading.....	694
Seditious Meetings Bill—Lords' Amendments.....	694
28. Wool Trade.....	695
Petition from Merchants &c. of Dundee, respecting the loyalty of the People of Scotland.....	695
Report of the Committee on the Votes of the House.....	696
Prisons in Ireland.....	696
Seditious Meetings Bill—Lords' Amendments.....	697
29. Conference with the Lords respecting the Amendments.....	715
Petition from Leigh, respecting Reform.....	716
31. Forged Bank Notes.....	716
Adjournment of the House for the Easter Recess.....	716
April 14. Mr. Speaker's Indisposition—Adjournment of the House to the 24th Instant.....	719
24. Mr. Speaker's Thanks.....	726
Petition from Wolverhampton, for a Reduction of Taxes, &c.....	727
Relief of the Poor.....	727
Committee of Supply—Lotteries.....	732
Tithes Leasing Bill—Second Reading.....	733
Mr. Calcraft's Motion for a Committee on Salt Duties.....	733
A Committee appointed to inquire into the Election Laws of Ireland.....	744
28. Debtor and Creditor Laws.....	746
Petition of the Roman Catholics of Waterford, respecting their Claims.....	747
Petition of the Roman Catholics of Warwickshire and Staffordshire.....	748
Petitions from Scotland for Reform.....	748
Petition of the Academical Society, respecting the Construction of the Seditious Meetings Act.....	748
Petition from Birmingham, complaining of Distress and Want of Employment....	750
The Chancellor of the Exchequer's Resolutions respecting the Relief of the Poor..	752
Salt Duties Bill.....	767
Irish Estimates referred to the Finance Committee.....	767
Mr. Tieney's Motion respecting a Third Secretary of State.....	768
Sir M. W. Ridley's Motion for a copy of the Petition of the Academical Society to the Quarter Sessions of London.....	768
30. Mr. Manners Sutton's Motion for leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate the Laws relating to the Clergy.....	778
Bill to make Lead Mines chargeable to the Poor Rates.....	782
May 1. Poor Employment Bill—First Reading.....	783
Petitions relating to the Wool Trade.....	784
Petition from the Corporation of Dublin, against the Roman Catholic Claims.....	785
Petition from St. Ives, for Reform.....	785
Mr. Ponsonby's Motion for a Committee to inquire into the Administration of Justice in Wales.....	786
Mr. Sergeant Onslow's Motion for a Repeal of the Usury Laws.....	787
2. Report of the Committee on the Police of the Metropolis.....	792
Breach of Privilege—Rev. Thomas Thirlwall.....	792
Mr. Cooper's Bill respecting Irish Grand Juries withdrawn.....	798
5. London Tithes Bill.....	798
Scotch Lunatic Asylums Bill.....	802
Committee of the House on the First Report of the Finance Committee.....	802
6. Petitions on the Wool Trade.....	827
Petitions respecting the Duties on Leather.....	828
Persons confined for Contempt of Court.....	829
Mr. Lambton's Motion respecting Mr. Canning's Embassy to Lisbon.....	830
7. Admiral Capellen's Answer to the Vote of Thanks.....	884
Petitions respecting the Exportation of Cotton Yarn.....	884
Wrongous Imprisonment—Petition of John Montgomery.....	887
Breach of Privilege—Attendance of the Rev. Thomas Thirlwall.....	891
Mr. Grenfell's Motion respecting Alien Proprietors of Bank Stock.....	899
A Committee appointed on the Election Laws.....	902

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

ix

	Page
May 7. Administration of Justice—Case of Mary Ryan.....	902
Office Abolition Bill—Chief Justices in Eyre.....	908
Office Regulation Bill—Exchequers in England and Ireland.....	909
Board of Works in Ireland.....	912
8. Usury Laws Repeal Bill—First Reading.....	914
A Committee appointed to consider of the means of preventing explosion on board Steam Boats.....	914
Military Punishment.....	914
Mr. Bennet's Motion respecting Mr. Herries's Appointment.....	915
Tithes Leasing Bill—Committee.....	926
Office Regulation Bill—(Scotland).....	927
9. Petition of the University of Oxford, against the Roman Catholic Claims.....	930
Mr. Grattan's Motion for a Committee to consider the Laws affecting Roman Catholics.....	930
12. A Committee appointed to consider the Petition of Messrs. Hill and Bundy, relative to an improved method of preparing Flax.....	1059
Game Laws.....	1060
Clergy Residence Bill—Poor Employment Bill—Second Reading.....	1060
Army Estimates.....	1060
13. Petition from Cork for Reform.....	1075
Undue Remission of Punishment—Case of Robert Hoy.....	1076
Army Estimates.....	1077
Lotteries.....	1091
Office Regulation Bill—(Exchequer in England).....	1092
Civil Services Recompense Bill.....	1092
14. Public Defaulters in Ireland.....	1093
Irish Grand Jury Presentments.....	1093
Poor Employment Bill—Names of the Commissioners appointed under it.....	1096
Office Abolition (Ireland) Bill.....	1099
15. Military Punishment.....	1099
Intended Renewal of the Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act—House ordered to be called over on the 2d of June.....	1102
Sir John Newport's Motion on the state of the Irish Finances.....	1103
Civil Offices Continuance Bill—Committee.....	1113
16. Lead Mines Bill—withdrawn—and another Bill brought in.....	1156
Savings Banks Bill—Recommitted.....	1156
Miscellaneous Estimates.....	1159
Clergy Residence Bill—Committee.....	1160
Third Report of the Finance Committee.....	1162
19. Petitions from Great Yarmouth, and other places, for Reform.....	1162
Debtor and Creditor Law.....	1162
Farther Observations on the intended renewal of the Suspension Act.....	1163
Lotteries.....	1164
Offices Abolition and Regulation Bills.....	1166
Civil Services Recompense Bill—Second Reading.....	1168
Committee of Supply—New South Wales.....	1176
Irish Savings Banks Bill.....	1176
20. Steam Boats—Petition of William Lester.....	1178
Poor Laws—Members have leave to attend the Lords' Committee.....	1178
King's Stationer in Ireland.....	1178
Lotteries—Petition of Mary Sparks.....	1178
Office Abolition and Regulation Bills.....	1179
Petitions from Scotland, and from Dublin and Cork for Reform.....	1180
Sir F. Burdett's Motion for a Committee on the state of the Representation.....	1181
21. Mr. Brougham's Notice of a Motion for a Repeal of the Septennial Act.....	1230
Irish Insurrection Act—First Reading.....	1230
Sir J. Mackintosh's Motion for Communications between the Home Department and Mr. Poole.....	1230
Mr. Blake's Motion for a Committee on the Act of 1793, so as to restore the Right of admission to their Freedom of Corporations in Ireland, to such Roman Catholics and others, as would, if they had been seven years Protestants, have an inchoate right to such admission.....	1231
Poor Employment Bill—Committee.....	1231
22. British Museum.....	1231
Petition of Merchants, &c. of London, respecting the Bankrupt Laws.....	1231
Non-attendance of a Member.....	1231
Tithes in Upper Canada.....	1231
Re-appointment of the Committee on the Education of the Poor.....	1231
Window Tax and Carriage Tax—Ireland.....	1231
Abuses in the Convict Department at Cork.....	1231
Linen Trade.....	1231

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

	Page
May 22. Extents in Aid	1246
Clergy Residence Bill—Committee	1248
Office Regulation Bill—Mints in England and Scotland	1248
23. Petition of Protestant Freeholders of Cavan, in Favour of the Roman Catholic Claims.....	1252 & 1418
Report of the Committee on Flax	1252
Petition of the Lord Mayor, &c. of London on the Bankrupt Laws.....	1252
Petition of the University of Oxford against the Tithes-Leasing Bill.....	1252
Savings Banks Bill.....	1252
Call of the House deferred to 9th June.....	1252
Petitions against the Exportation of Yarn.....	1252
Lead Mines Bill—Second Reading.....	1253
Irish Insurrection Bill—Second Reading.....	1254
Poor Employment Bill—Third Reading.....	1262
Extents in Aid Bill.....	1262
Benefices on which there is no Residence.....	1262
Adjournment of the House for the Whitsun Recess.....	1262
50. Mr. Speaker's Resignation.....	1263
June 2. New Speaker Elected.....	1264
3. New Speaker Approved.....	1299
Breach of Privilege—Police Report.....	1300
Petition from Bristol—Extents in Aid.....	1300
Petition of the Common Council of London, against a farther Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	1300
Law of Treason—Lists of Witnesses.....	1300
Usury Laws—Petition from Belfast for a Repeal of.....	1303 & 1364
New Writ for Oxford in the Room of the late Speaker.....	1303
New Writ for London in the Room of Mr. Alderman Coombe.....	1303
Message from the Prince Regent respecting the continuance of Seditious Practices.....	1303
Message from the Prince Regent respecting a Provision for the late Speaker.....	1303
Irish Election Laws Bill.....	1306
5. Petition against the Lead Mines Bill.....	1308
Usury Laws—Petition from Belfast in Favour of.....	1308 & 1363
Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London, against the further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	1308
A Committee appointed to consider of the practice of employing Boys in Sweeping Chimneys.....	1309
Salt Duties Bill—Third Reading.....	1309
Vote of Thanks to the late Speaker.....	1309
Motion for an Address in Answer to the Message respecting a Provision for the late Speaker.....	1312
A Secret Committee appointed.....	1315
Lord Folkestone's Motion for Instructions to the Committee, to report the Evidence, &c.....	1324
Custom House Docks, Dublin.....	1326
Fourth Report of the Finance Committee.....	1328
Lead Mines Bill, thrown out.....	1328
6. Leave of Absence—Question on.....	1330
Petitions on Cotton Twist.....	1330
Alehouse Licences Bill.....	1331
The late Speaker's Answer to the Vote of Thanks.....	1334
The Prince Regent's Answer to the Address, respecting a Provision for the late Speaker.....	1335
New Writ for Chippenham, in the room of Mr. Peel.....	1335
Scarcity in Ireland.....	1335
Call of the House deferred till the 16th.....	1336
Colonial Acts.....	1336
Civil Services Recompense Bill—Committee.....	1336
9. Mr. Brougham's Notice of a Motion for the Repeal of the Septennial Act, postponed.....	1337
Usury Laws—Petition from Glasgow against.....	1337
Petition from Bristol on the Bankrupt Laws.....	1339
Grant to the late Speaker.....	1339
Game Laws.....	1348
Ordnance and Miscellaneous Estimates.....	1349
Vaccination.....	1350
Mr. V. Fitzgerald's Irish Grand Jury Bill—First Reading.....	1351
10. A Committee appointed on the Bankrupt Laws.....	1355
A Committee appointed on Extents in Aid.....	1355
Civil Services Recompense Bill—Report.....	1356
Grant to the late Speaker.....	1361
Ordnance Resolutions.....	1361

June 10.	Debtor and Creditor Law.....	1362.
11.	The Lord Mayor of London takes his seat for London.....	1364
	Lord Folkestone's Motion for a Return of the Number of Persons confined under the Suspension Act, their Names, Ages, &c.....	1364
	Petition from Berkshire against a Renewal of the Suspension Act.....	1367
	Administration of Justice at Guernsey.....	1368
	Borough Representation—Haslemere—Petition of James Greenaway.....	1368
	Grant to the late Speaker.....	1371
12.	Cottage Window Tax—Scotland.....	1379
	Report on Vaccination.....	1379
	Trinity House.....	1379
	Call of the House postponed till the 16th.....	1380
	British Museum.....	1380
	Grant to the late Speaker.....	1380
13.	Mr. Peel takes his seat for Oxford.....	1381
	Irish Grand Jury Bill—Second Reading.....	1381
	Irish Insurrection Bill.....	1381
	Committee of Supply—College of Edinburgh—Penitentiary.....	1388
	Grant to the late Speaker.....	1389
14.	Fifth Report of the Finance Committee.....	1389
16.	Petitions from the Isle of Wight and Tavistock, against the Suspension Bill.....	1418
	Irish Insurrection Bill.....	1418
	Spies and Informers—Mr. Oliver.....	1418
	Strangers excluded—House divides three times on a Motion of Adjournment.....	1419
	Committee of Supply—Spies and Informers.....	1421
	The Order for a Bill respecting the Clerk of Parliaments discharged.....	1424
	Clerks of the Signet and Privy Seal Bill.....	1424
17.	Call of the House, upon a division, discharged.....	1427
	Petitions from Chester, in favour of, and against the Suspension Act.....	1427
	Mr. M. A. Taylor's Motion for a Committee on the Newfoundland Trade.....	1427
	Petitions of Watchmakers.....	1429
	Offices (Scotland) Regulation Bill.....	1430
18.	Mr. Brougham's Motion on the Septennial Act, again postponed.....	1431
	Machinery.....	1431
	Petition from King's Lynn against the Suspension Act.....	1431
	Lord Folkestone's Motion respecting the Right of Magistrates to visit State Prisoners.....	1432
	Borough Representation—Haslemere—Second Petition of J. Greenaway.....	1445
19.	Marriages Regulation Bill.....	1479
	Return of the Number of Persons, and their Ages, confined under the Suspension Act.....	1479
	Petition from Rochester against the Suspension Act.....	1479
	Copy-Right Act.....	1479
	Spies and Informers—Mr. Oliver.....	1481
	Mr. Curwen's Motion for a Bill to amend the Law in respect to Tithes.....	1483
	Bill to regulate Distresses for Small Rents.....	1484
	Sir John Newport's Motion for an Address on the State of Ireland.....	1484
20.	Petition of Mr. Beaumont, and others, respecting Licences to Alehouses.....	1486
	Navy Estimates.....	1486
	Irish Miscellaneous Services.....	1487
	Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—Criminal Law of Scotland.....	1490
	Report of the Committee on the Election Laws.....	1497
	Report of the Secret Committee.....	1497
	The Budget.....	1518
21.	Copy of the Report of the Lords' Secret Committee.....	1527
23.	Report of the Committee on Chimney Sweepers.....	1528
	Petitions from Warwick and Hertford against the farther Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	1528
	Petition of Mr. Lemaitre against the further Suspension.....	1530
	Bill to continue the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—First Reading.....	1535
	Sixth Report of the Finance Committee.....	1570
	Paper Drawback Bill.....	1570
24.	Election Laws Bill.....	1578
	Petitions respecting the Duties on Leather.....	1573
	Report of the Committee on Steam Boats.....	1574
	Petition relative to the Confiscation of British Property in Denmark.....	1574
	Petitions from Middlesex and Kent, against the farther suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.....	1578
	Bill to continue the Suspension—Second Reading.....	1584
	Report of the Committee of Ways and Means.....	1595
	Committee to consider of a Resolution for Building Chapels.....	1597
	Bill for the better regulation of Chimney Sweepers.....	1603

	Page
June 24. Report of the Committee on the African Trade.....	1605
Report of the Committee on the Irish Lunatic Poor.....	1608
Sir Samuel Romilly's Motion respecting Lord Sidmouth's Circular Letter.....	1608
26. Mr. Curwen's Tithe Bill—Printed—no further Proceedings—Substance of the Bill.....	1634
Mr. Brongham's Motion on the Septennial Act again deferred, till next Session....	1634
Petition of Dennis Sullivan, respecting his Prize Money.....	1635
Mr. Tierney's Finance Resolutions.....	1635
Verdict of a Jury—Mr. Wooler's Petition.....	1637
Petitions from Birmingham, and the Concentric Society at Liverpool, against the Suspension Act.....	1646
Bill to continue the Suspension—Committee.....	1646
Small Debts Bill—Order for the third reading discharged.....	1658
Frivolous Arrests Bill.....	1658
Poor Employment Amendment Bill.....	1658
27. Petitions respecting the Duties on Leather.....	1659
Usury Laws—Petition from Birmingham for a Repeal of.....	1659
A Committee appointed on the Petitions relative to Cotton Yarn.....	1660
Persons confined on suspicion of Treason—Petition of Mr. Evans.....	1660
Petitions from Berwick-upon-Tweed, and Godalming, against the Suspension Act..	1663
Bill to continue the Suspension—Third Reading.....	1669
Criminal Law of Scotland—Case of Andrew McKinlay.....	1695
30. Usury Laws Bill—Further Consideration put off for three months.....	1717
Sir J. Mackintosh's Motion respecting the Droits of Admiralty—Postponed till next session.....	1718
Irish Grand Jury Presentment Bill.....	1718
Navy Estimates.....	1722
Mr. Rose's explanation of the case of Dennis Sullivan.....	1724
Miscellaneous Services.....	1725
Irish Election Laws Bill.....	1726
Mr. Ponsonby's sudden Indisposition—House adjourns.....	1727
July 1. Mr. C. Grant's Finance Resolutions.....	1731
Cottage Window Tax—Scotland.....	1732
Frame-Breaking Prevention Bill.....	1732
Petition from Chelsea for Reform.....	1732
Persons Confined on Suspicion of Treason—Mr. H. Addington's statement of Mr. Evans's case.....	1732
Appointment of a Committee to consider the Petitions of Watchmakers.....	1735
Copy-Right Act.....	1735
The Order for a Committee on Cotton Yarn, discharged.....	1736
Repeal of the Usury Laws—Mr. Serjeant Onslow's notice of a Motion for next ses- sion.....	1737
Irish Lunatic Asylums Bill.....	1737
Marriages Solemnization Bill—Reported and Printed—no farther Proceedings—Sub- stance of the Bill.....	1737
2. Savings Banks—Committee appointed to examine Lords' Journals relative thereto —New Bills brought in.....	1739
Naval and Military Officers' Oaths Bill—First Reading.....	1739
Bill to Regulate the Office of Deputy Remembrancer of the Court of Exchequer...	1739
Bill to Abolish the Office of Alderman in Ireland.....	1739
Undue Remission of Punishment—Case of Robert Hoy.....	1739
Persons confined on Suspicion of Treason—Mr. Barham's Motion for a Committee on Mr. Evans's Petition.....	1740
3. Petition of the Nabob of the Northern Circars, for Restitution of his Patrimonial Estate.....	1751
Mr. M. A. Taylor's Motion for a Committee to consider the Report on the Newfound- land Trade.....	1754
Pensions to wounded Officers.....	1760
Naval and Military Officers' Oaths Bill—Second Reading.....	1760
Frame-Breaking Prevention Bill.....	1760
4. Scotch Lunatic Asylum Bill—put off for three months.....	1761
Naval and Military Officers' Oaths Bill—Committed, Reported, and read a Third time.....	1761
Report of the Committee on the Administration of Justice in Wales.....	1761
Election Laws Bill.....	1761
Report of the Committee on the Poor Laws.....	1761
Alehouses Licences Bill—Postponed till next session.....	1763
Chapels Building Bill—Put off for three months.....	1763
Irish Grand Jury Bill.....	1764
Extents in Aid Bill.....	1764
7. Bill to secure the Safety of Passengers in Steam Boats.....	1774
Mr. Calcraft's Motion for a Remuneration of Constables attending upon both Houses	1774

	Page
July 7. New Street Act	1775
Addition to the Standing Orders in Private Bills.	1775
Mr. Bennet's Motion for a return respecting Mad-houses	1776
Report of the Committee on the Education of the Poor	1776
Undue Remission of Punishment—Robert Hoy—Mr. Bennet's notice of a Motion thereon next session	1777
8. Mr. Calcraft's Notice of a Motion next session for remunerating Constables	1778
Sir H. Parnell's Notice of a Motion next session, to regulate the Office of Petty Constables in Ireland	1778
Second Report of the Police Committee	1778
Petition of the Associated Unitarians of Kent and Sussex, respecting the Marriage Act	1780
Sessional Addresses.	1780
Bill to regulate Scotch Lunatic Asylums—Read a first time, and further proceedings postponed.	1781
Sir H. Parnell's Motion for Papers relative to Maynooth College.	1781
9. Sir J. C. Hippisley's Motion for a copy of the Concordat between the Court of Portugal and the See of Rome, in 1778.	1786
Petition from Liverpool, to repeal the Act for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus.	1787
British Consul at Massachusetts—Mr. George Manners.	1788
Mr. Wilberforce's Motion for an Address on the Slave Trade	1788
Mr. Tierney's Motion on the Finances of the United Kingdom	1801
Sir S. Romilly's Motion for Copies of the Presentment of the Grand Jury of Dominica, respecting the cruel treatment of Slaves	1817
10. Lyme Regis Harbour.	1825
11. Colonial Acts.	1827
Report of the Committee on Watchmakers.	1827
Report of the Committee on the Bankrupt Laws.	1827
New Writ for the Right Hon. Nicholas Vansittart, appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer of Ireland.	1827
Mr. Lamb's Motion for a new Writ, in the room of the late Mr. Pousonby	1827
Lyme Regis Harbour.	1829
Petition of John Knight, praying to be brought to trial, or to be transported out of the Country.	1830
Masquerades	1830
Mr. Brougham's Motion for an Address on the State of the Nation.	1830
Petition of Mr. Evans, the younger, complaining of Ill-treatment, with respect to accommodations in Prison	1878
Report of the Committee on Extents in Aid.	1879
12. The House attends in the House of Peers to hear the Speech from the Throne—The Parliament prorogued	1884

IV. LISTS OF MAJORITIES AND MINORITIES.

1817.
Jan. 29. List of the Minority on the Motion for an Address in Answer to the Speech from the Throne.	67
Feb. 17. — of the Majority and Minority on Lord Milton's Motion respecting the War Salary of the Secretaries of the Admiralty	187
19. — of the Minority on Mr. Grenfell's Motion respecting the Bank of England.	213
23. — of the Majority and Minority on Sir M. W. Ridley's Motion, respecting the Laws of the Admiralty	332
26. — of the Minority on the First Reading of the Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act	372
28. — of the Minority on the Third Reading of the Bill	413
March 13. — of the Minority on Mr. Brougham's Motion on Trade and Manufactures	580
14. — of the Minority on the Third Reading of the Seditious Meetings Bill	610
18. — of the Minority on Mr. Lyttleton's Resolutions respecting Lotteries.	643
23. — of the Minority for postponing the further consideration of the Lords' Amendments to the Seditious Meetings Bill	714
— of the Minority against the Clause for prohibiting Meetings in Palace-yard.	714
April 25. — of the Minority on Mr. Calcraft's Motion respecting the Salt Duties.	744
29. — of the Minority on Mr. Tierney's Motion respecting a Third Secretary of State.	774
May 6. — of the Minority on Mr. Lambton's Motion respecting Mr. Canning's Embassy to Lisbon.
8. — of the Minority on Mr. Bennet's Motion respecting Mr. Herries's Appointment	92
9. — of the Majority and Minority on Mr. Grattan's Motion for a Committee to consider the state of the Laws affecting Roman Catholics	99
13. — of the Minority on Mr. Calcraft's Motion for recommitting the Report on the Army Estimates.	10
19. — of the Minority against the Third Reading of the Lottery Bill.	117
— of the Minority against the Second Reading of the Civil Services Recompense Bill.	117

May 20.	List of the Minority on Sir Francis Burdett's Motion for a Committee on the State of the Representation	1229
June 2.	— of the Minority on the Election of a Speaker	1273
5.	— of the Minority against referring the Papers respecting Seditious Practices to the former Committee	1328
10.	— of the Minority on Mr. Calcraft's clause in the Civil Services Recompense Bill, to compel Persons who may accept a Pension under it, to vacate their seats in Parliament	1363
11.	— of the Minority on Lord Folkestone's Motion for a Return of the Persons confined under the Suspension Act, their Names, Trades, Ages, Places of Confinement, &c.	1371
16.	— of the Minority on Mr. Brougham's Motion of Adjournment, in consequence of Mr. C. Wynn having moved the Standing Order for the exclusion of Strangers	1424
18.	— of the Minority on Sir Francis Burdett's Motion for bringing up the Petition of James Greenaway, relative to the Borough of Haslemere	1449
	— of the Minority on Lord Folkestone's Motion, respecting the Right of Magistrates to visit State Prisoners	1449
19.	— of the Minority on Sir John Newport's Motion for an Address on the state of Ireland	1486
23.	— of the Majority and Minority on the First Reading of the Bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act	1570
25.	— of the Minority on Sir Samuel Romilly's Motion respecting Lord Sidmouth's Circular Letter	1633
26.	— of the Minority on Sir John Newport's Clause for limiting the Duration of the Suspension Bill to the 1st of December	1656
	— of the Minority on Mr. Douglas's Motion for excluding Scotland from the Bill ..	1657
27.	— of the Minority against the Third Reading of the Bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act	1706

V. APPENDIX.

1.	Account of the Public Income and Expenditure of the United Kingdom for the year ended the 5th of January, 1817; and of the probable Income and Expenditure for the years ending 5th of January, 1818 and 1819 respectively	i
2.	Debt of Great Britain and Ireland	x
3.	Sum due to Great Britain from Austria	ib.
4.	Accounts relating to Imports and Exports	ib.
5.	— to Ireland	xi
6.	— to the Bank of England	xii
7.	— to the New Silver Coin	xiii
8.	Returns respecting the Army	xiv
9.	— the Navy	ib.
10.	— the Clergy	ib.
11.	Report of the Vaccine Establishment for 1816	xv
12.	Amount of the Land Tax assessed upon England and Wales	xvii
13.	Abstract of the Net Produce of the Revenue of Great Britain, in the years ending 10th Oct. 1816, and 10th Oct. 1817; distinguishing the Quarters, &c.	xviii
14.	Offices about to be regulated or abolished	xx

VI. LIST OF PUBLIC (GENERAL) ACTS. xxi

VII. ADDENDA.

1.	Protocol of the Conference at Paris, on the 18th of March, respecting Lucien Buonaparte, (referred to in Mr. Brougham's Speech on the State of the Nation, page 1839)	xxvii
2.	Protest on the 3d of March, on the Earl of Darnley's motion, that the consideration of the Bill to Suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, be put off for three months, being negatived	ib.
3.	Further Proceedings of the Magistrates of Berkshire, respecting the Right of Visiting State prisoners (see page 1450)	ib.
4.	Result of the Trials for High Treason at Derby (see page 1671)	xxviii

VIII. INDEX OF SPEAKERS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

IX. INDEX OF SPEAKERS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

X. INDEX TO THE DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

XI. INDEX TO THE DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

LIST OF HIS MAJESTY'S MINISTERS,
DURING THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE FIFTH PARLIAMENT
OF THE
UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.
1817.

CABINET MINISTERS.

Lord President of the Council	Earl of Harrowby.
Lord High Chancellor	Lord Eldon.
Lord Privy Seal.....	Earl of Westmoreland.
First Lord of the Treasury	Earl of Liverpool.
First Lord of the Admiralty	Viscount Melville.
Master-General of the Ordnance	Earl of Mulgrave.
Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs	Viscount Castlereagh.
Secretary of State for War and Colonies	Earl Bathurst.
Secretary of State for the Home Department	Viscount Sidmouth.
Chancellor of the Exchequer	Right Hon. Nicholas Vansittart.
Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.....	Right Hon. Charles Bragge Bathurst.
President of the Board of Control	Right Hon. George Canning.
Master of the Mint	Right Hon. William Wellesley Pole.

NOT OF THE CABINET.

Secretary at War	Viscount Palmerston.
Treasurer of the Navy...	Right Hon. George Rose.
Paymasters of the Forces	{ Right Hon. Charles Long.
	{ Right Hon. Frederick Robinson.
President of the Board of Trade	Lord Clancarty.
Vice-President	Right Hon. John Frederick Robinson.
Master of the Horse	Duke of Montrose.
Secretaries to the Treasury.....	{ Right Hon. Charles Arbuthnot.
	{ Stephen Rumbold Lushington, Esq.
Secretary to the Admiralty	John Wilson Croker, Esq.
Attorney-General—till the 7th of May	Sir William Garrow.
Solicitor-General—till the 7th of May	Sir Samuel Shepherd.
Attorney-General—from the 19th of May	Sir Samuel Shepherd.
Solicitor-General—from the 19th of May	Sir Robert Gifford.

IRELAND.

Lord Lieutenant	Earl Whitworth.
Lord High Chancellor	Lord Manners.
Secretary of State	Right Hon. Robert Peel.
Chancellor of the Exchequer*	Right Hon. Vesey Fitzgerald.

SCOTLAND.

Lord Advocate	Alexander Maconochie, Esq.
Speaker of the House of Commons—till the 30th of May	Right Hon. Charles Abbot.
..... from the 2nd of June	Right Hon. Manners Sutton.

* An Office now consolidated with the English Chancellorship of the Exchequer.

DURATION OF PARLIAMENTS, FROM THE FIRST OF HENRY VIII.

(When long Parliaments were first introduced)

TO THE PRESENT TIME.

Met.		Dissolved.		Existed.
REIGN OF HENRY VIII.
	Y.		M.		D.
21 Jan.	1510	23 Feb.	1510	0	1 2
4 Feb.	1511	4 Mar.	1513	2	1 0
5 Feb.	1514	22 Dec.	1515	1	10 17
15 Apr.	1523	13 Aug.	1523	0	3 29
5 Nov.	1530	4 Apr.	1536	5	5 1
8 June	1536	18 July	1536	0	1 10
28 Apr.	1539	24 July	1540	1	2 26
16 Jan.	1541	29 Mar.	1544	3	2 13
23 Nov.	1545	31 Jan.	1547	1	2 8

EDWARD VI.
4 Nov.	1547	15 Apr.	1552	4	5 11
1 Mar.	1553	31 Mar.	1553	0	1 0

MARY.
5 Oct.	1553	6 Dec.	1553	0	2 1
2 Apr.	1554	5 May	1554	0	1 3
12 Nov.	1554	16 Jan.	1555	0	2 4
21 Oct.	1555	9 Dec.	1555	0	1 18
20 Jan.	1557	17 Nov.	1557	0	9 28

ELIZABETH.
23 Jan.	1558	8 May	1558	0	3 16
11 Jan.	1562	2 Jan.	1567	4	11 22
2 April	1571	29 May	1571	0	1 27
8 May	1572	18 Mar.	1580	7	10 10
23 Nov.	1585	14 Sept.	1586	0	9 21
29 Oct.	1586	23 Mar.	1587	0	4 23
4 Feb.	1588	29 Mar.	1588	0	1 25
19 Nov.	1592	10 Apr.	1593	0	4 22
24 Oct.	1597	9 Feb.	1598	2	3 16
7 Oct.	1601	29 Dec.	1601	0	2 22

JAMES I.
19 Mar.	1603	9 Feb.	1611	7	10 21
5 April	1614	7 June	1614	0	2 2
30 Jan.	1620	8 Feb.	1621	1	0 9
19 Feb.	1623	21 Mar.	1625	2	1 5

CHARLES I.
17 May	1625	12 Aug.	1625	0	2 26
6 Feb.	1626	15 June	1626	0	4 9
17 Mar.	1627	10 Mar.	1628	0	11 23
13 April	1640	3 May	1640	0	0 22
3 Nov.	1640	20 Apr.	1653	12	5 17

CHARLES. II.
25 Apr.	1660	29 Dec.	1660	0	8 4
8 May	1661	24 Jan.	1678	16	8 16
6 Mar.	1679	12 July	1679	0	4 6
17 Oct.	1679	18 Jan.	1681	1	3 1
21 Mar.	1681	28 Mar.	1681	0	0 7

Met.		Dissolved.		Existed.
REIGN OF JAMES II.
	Y.		M.		D.
12 Mar.	1685	28 July	1687	2	4 16
22 Jan.	1688	26 Feb.	1689	1	1 4

WILLIAM III.
20 Mar.	1689	11 Oct.	1695	6	6 22
27 Nov.	1695*	7 July	1698	2	7 10
24 Aug.	1698	19 Dec.	1700	2	3 26
26 Feb.	1700	11 Nov.	1701	1	8 5
30 Dec.	1701	7 July	1702	0	6 2

ANNE.
20 Aug.	1702	5 Apr.	1705	2	7 16
14 June	1705	15 Apr.	1708†	2	10 1
8 July	1703	21 Sept.	1710	2	2 13
25 Nov.	1710	8 Aug.	1713	2	8 14
12 Nov.	1713	15 Jan.	1715	1	2 2

GEORGE I.
17 Mar.	1715‡	10 Mar.	1721	5	11 21
10 May	1722	5 Aug.	1727	5	2 26

GEORGE II.
28 Nov.	1727	18 Apr.	1734	6	4 21
13 June	1734	28 Apr.	1741	6	10 15
25 June	1741	18 June	1747	5	11 24
13 Aug.	1747	8 Apr.	1754	6	7 26
31 May	1754	20 Mar.	1761	6	9 20

GEORGE III.
19 May	1761	11 Mar.	1768	6	9 22
10 May	1768	30 Sept.	1774	6	4 21
29 Nov.	1774	1 Sept.	1780	5	9 4
31 Oct.	1780	25 Mar.	1784	3	4 26
18 May	1784	11 June	1790	6	0 25
10 Aug.	1790	29 May	1796	5	11 3
12 July	1796	31 Dec.	1800	} 5 11 18
United Kingdom, G. B. & I.
22 Jan.	1801	29 Jan.	1802
31 Aug.	1802	24 Oct.	1806		4 2 25
15 Dec.	1806	29 Apr.	1807		0 4 15
22 June	1807	29 Sept.	1812	5	3 7
24 Nov.	1812

* The Triennial Act passed 6 W. and M. c. 2.

† The Union with Scotland took place May 1, 1707.

‡ The Septennial Act passed 1 Geo. I. st. 2. c. 38.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTS

During the FIFTH SESSION of the FIFTH PARLIAMENT of the United Kingdom of GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND, appointed to meet at Westminster, the Twenty-eighth day of January, One thousand eight hundred and seventeen, in the Fifty-sixth year of the reign of His Majesty King GEORGE the THIRD.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, January 28, 1817.

THIS day being appointed for opening the session, the Prince Regent came down to the House at two o'clock, with the usual state, and took his seat upon the throne. Shortly afterwards, the Commons being in attendance, his Royal Highness delivered the following speech :

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ It is with deep regret that I am again obliged to announce to you that no alteration has occurred in the state of his Majesty's lamented indisposition.

“ I continue to receive from Foreign Powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country, and of their earnest desire to maintain the general tranquillity.

“ The hostilities to which I was compelled to resort, in vindication of the honour of the country, against the Government of Algiers, have been attended with the most complete success. The splendid achievement of his Majesty's fleet, in conjunction with a squadron of the King of the Netherlands, under the gallant and able conduct of Admiral Viscount Exmouth, led to the immediate and unconditional liberation of all Christian captives then within the territory of Algiers, and to the renunciation by its Government of the practice of Christian slavery. I am persuaded that you will be duly sensible of the importance of an arrangement so interesting to humanity, and reflecting, from the manner in which it has been accomplished, such signal honour on the British nation.

“ In India, the refusal of the Government of Nepal to ratify a treaty of peace which had been signed by its Plenipotentiaries, occasioned a renewal of military operations. The judicious arrangements of the Governor General, seconded by the bravery and perseverance of his Majesty's forces, and of those of the East India Company, brought the campaign to a speedy and successful issue; and peace has been finally established upon the just and honourable terms of the original treaty.

VOL. I.

“ Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

“ I have directed the estimates for the current year to be laid before you. They have been formed upon a full consideration of all the present circumstances of the country, with an anxious desire to make every reduction in our establishments which the safety of the empire and sound policy allow. I recommend the state of the public income and expenditure to your early and serious attention. I regret to be under the necessity of informing you that there has been a deficiency in the produce of the revenue in the last year; but I trust that it is to be ascribed to temporary causes; and I have the consolation to believe that you will find it practicable to provide for the public service of the year without making any addition to the burdens of the people, and without adopting any measure injurious to that system by which the public credit of the country has been hitherto sustained.

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ I have the satisfaction of informing you, that the arrangements which were made in the last Session of Parliament, with a view to a new silver coinage, have been completed with unprecedented expedition. I have given directions for the immediate issue of the new coin, and I trust that this measure will be productive of considerable advantages to the trade and internal transactions of the country.

“ The distresses consequent upon the termination of a war of such unusual extent and duration, have been felt, with greater or less severity, throughout all the nations of Europe, and have been considerably aggravated by the unfavourable state of the season. Deeply as I lament the pressure of these evils upon this country, I am sensible that they are of a nature not to admit of an immediate remedy; but whilst I observe with peculiar satisfaction the fortitude with which so many privations have been borne, and the active benevolence which has been employed to mitigate them, I am persuaded that the great sources of our national prosperity are essentially unimpaired, and I entertain a confident expectation that the native energy of the country will at no distant period surmount all the difficulties in which we are involved.

B

"In considering our internal situation you will, I doubt not, feel a just indignation at the attempts which have been made to take advantage of the distresses of the country, for the purpose of exciting a spirit of sedition and violence. I am too well convinced of the loyalty and good sense of the great body of his Majesty's subjects to believe them capable of being perverted by the arts which are employed to seduce them; but I am determined to omit no precautions for preserving the public peace, and for counteracting the designs of the disaffected: and I rely with the utmost confidence on your cordial support and co-operation, in upholding a system of law and government, from which we have derived inestimable advantages, which has enabled us to conclude with unexampled glory, a contest whereon depended the best interests of mankind, and which has been hitherto felt by ourselves, as it is acknowledged by other nations, to be the most perfect that has ever fallen to the lot of any people."

The Prince Regent then withdrew, and the House adjourned till five o'clock. At that hour Lord Sidmouth intimated that, previous to their Lordships taking into consideration an Address in answer to the Prince Regent's Speech, he had a communication to make on a subject of the highest importance; and, on his lordship's motion, strangers were ordered to withdraw. Lord Sidmouth then apprized their lordships, that as the Prince Regent was returning through the Park, at the back of the garden at Carlton House, the glass of the carriage window had been broken either by stones, or by two bullets fired from an air-gun, which appeared to have been aimed at his Royal Highness. Lord James Murray was then examined as to the particulars of this outrage; and their lordships unanimously agreed to the following Address to the Prince Regent:—

"We, his Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, ———, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to approach your Royal Highness, humbly to express to your Royal Highness our abhorrence of the outrage offered this day to your Royal Highness, in your Royal Highness's passage from Parliament. We cannot reflect, without the deepest concern and indignation, that there should be found within his Majesty's dominions any persons capable of an attack so daring and flagitious upon your Royal Highness's person; and we beg leave humbly to lay before your Royal Highness the earnest wishes of his Majesty's faithful Lords ———, in which we are confident we shall be joined by all descriptions of his Majesty's subjects, that your Royal Highness will be graciously pleased to direct the most effectual measures to be taken without delay, to discover the authors and abettors of this proceeding."

A message was then sent to the Commons by the two Clerks (none of the Masters in Chancery being present) to desire a conference in the Painted Chamber. At the conference the managers for the Lords, among whom were Lords Liverpool, Sidmouth, Grenville, Grey, &c. communicated to those for the Commons the Address just agreed to by their Lordships, and the proceedings preliminary thereto. On the return of the managers, the consideration of the Prince Regent's Speech was postponed until to-morrow, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, January 28, 1817.

The House assembled at two o'clock, and on a message from the Lords, the Speaker and several Members attended to hear the Speech from the Throne. The House then adjourned till five o'clock, when the Speaker took the chair.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir Francis Burdett gave notice, that, on this day month, he would submit a motion to the House upon this subject.

THE REGENT'S SPEECH.] The Speaker stated, that his Royal Highness the Prince Regent had delivered a gracious Speech from the Throne, which, with the leave of the House, he would read. The Speech being accordingly read, (for which see p. 1.)

Lord Valletort rose to move the Address. After expressing his entire concurrence in the sentiments of his Royal Highness, he proceeded to state the grounds upon which those sentiments met his approbation. It was indeed peculiarly grateful to reflect, that the great object of the war had been fully attained; that the powerful military despotism which had so long desolated Europe and threatened our own overthrow, was completely overwhelmed; that order and tranquillity were universally restored; that the people of all nations were allowed to enjoy that peace, the preservation of which was become, in fact, a part of our religion, which all the dynasties of Europe were pledged to maintain inviolate; and that the doctrine of legitimacy, which was so essential to the happiness, the repose, and the security of all nations, had been established. With regard to the victory which distinguished our fleet at Algiers, he conceived that to form a great source of unmixed congratulation; for whether viewed with reference to the motives which led to the undertaking, or the consequences which marked the result, it was most honourable to our national character, and must conduce to our solid and permanent interest. As to the Nepal war, it was notorious that this contest was forced upon us by the repeated and long continued outrages of the Nepaulese upon the population of all the adjoining provinces, whom we were bound to protect, and that hostilities were not resorted to until the remonstrances of our Government in India were found utterly unavailing.

The conduct of our Government was indeed highly meritorious. With that spirit of moderation which characterized real wisdom, and which always signalized the principles of Lord Hastings, that distinguished nobleman endeavoured, by all the means the resources of his great mind could devise, to conciliate the Government of Nepal before he had recourse to war. It was only when those means were found totally ineffectual, that hostilities were commenced, and the result of this war was such as to form a legitimate cause of triumph in the Speech from the Throne. That Speech was satisfactory in a peculiar degree, in the prospect it held out of every practicable retrenchment in the scale of our public expenditure. But while he felt assured that every possible reduction would be made in the public burthens, the people would be sensible that the dignity, the power, and the character of our Government must be duly maintained. To preserve order, to ensure security, was manifestly essential not only to the interests of our manufactures and commerce, but to the maintenance of our proper station among the nations of Europe. In this view it must be felt that nothing could be so expensive as weakness, nothing so prodigal as insecurity. The recommendation of His Royal Highness fully to consider our financial circumstances, would, no doubt, be duly attended to, and such a system be adopted, as was best calculated to preserve our national safety, and to maintain inviolate our great national credit. It was true, there had been a material deficiency in the revenue, but yet not such as to create any degree of despondency. The receipts last winter were greater than ever; since that time they had fallen off; but were we, from the events of the last nine months alone, to predict eternal and irretrievable bankruptcy? If we give a loose to despair, and spread despondency on every side, should we not in every way increase our embarrassments? But if we bore up with fortitude, and strove to our utmost against the pressure of the time, our exertions must ultimately be crowned with success. The present distress of the community was sufficiently to be accounted for from temporary causes: he should not at present dilate on them, because they would doubtless be sufficiently canvassed at future opportunities; but he should venture to point out a few of the more immediate causes of this distress. The sudden transition from a state of war to a state of peace, the cessation of an immense war expenditure, and the sudden reduction to one comparatively small, must have affected the demands for the various products of industry. The expenditure during the last year of the war, among the labouring classes, amounted to 130 millions; in the year after it was only 70 millions: this, joined to the great discharge of soldiers and sailors, and others removed from various departments of the State, must necessarily give rise to considerable distress. Then, the monopoly of commerce, which we had enjoyed during the whole of the war, fell off at once, and the markets were opened to other competitors; the great improvements in agriculture, and the consequent increase of agricultural produce, were followed by an unpropitious season, so that scarcity and high prices were unavoidably added to the dearth of employment. We were now, however, gradually recovering from the general depression; and we should be false to ourselves, false to the country, if we were now to give up its best interests in despair. We had seen a most mischievous spirit diffused among the poorer classes of the community. He hoped, however, the House would do their utmost to maintain that constitution we had so long enjoyed; a constitution which, in spite of clamour, was still unrivalled, and acknowledged to be the most perfect that had fallen to the lot of any people. The noble lord concluded by moving an address, which was in effect an echo of the speech.

Mr. Dawson, in rising to second the motion, observed, that whatever might be the distress of the times, it could not be relieved by despair or irresolution. His Royal Highness had not been insensible to the many difficulties of our situation; and it was at least satisfactory to hear, that the object for which so much blood had been spilt, and so much treasure expended, was at length securely attained. Our victory over the Dey of Algiers had proved that our arms were not wanting to protect the unfortunate, and that no other claim was requisite to ensure our assistance, but the knowledge of distress and oppression. But, whatever might be thought of that victory, there could be but one feeling of congratulation at the prospect of a lessened expenditure. It was true that the nation did labour under calamities—but we had the best grounds for not sinking into despondency; and he could not but admire the manly openness with which we were told of the deficiency in our revenue, and encourage the spirit of fortitude with which we were called on to meet it. When the pressure of the moment was past, our commerce could not but revive, and under these circumstances, he saw no reason for alarm; it was, no doubt, a cause of sorrow to see the distresses of every class of the community—distresses produced by unavoidable events, but which, he believed, would be of short duration. And what was our situation compared with that of every nation on the continent, whose fields had been ravaged, whose cities desolated, and whose governments had been overthrown? But the House must participate with His Royal Highness in the sorrow expressed at the lamentable scenes of domestic violence and disturbance which had occurred: the feelings of the people had been inflamed, and the poorer classes harangued on subjects they were unable to comprehend. He must lament that factious men had called them together under pretence of public discussion, when they were actuated only with a view to their own private interest. The House must join in the indignation expressed by his Royal Highness towards these baneful disturbers of the public peace; and though there might be no danger in this country, where sense and loyalty went hand in hand, yet this was the time to prove the firmness and wisdom of Parliament, and that "non civium ardor prava jubentium" could shake them from their steady purpose of preserving the rights and tranquillity of the nation. Under these considerations he had the greatest satisfaction in seconding the motion of the noble lord.

Mr. Ponsonby rose.—He began by expressing his entire concurrence with many of those observations which had been so eloquently made by the Mover and Seconder of the Address, and like them, professed himself not in the smallest degree disposed to exaggerate the existing distresses of the country, or to add to the present feelings of despondency. He agreed with them, that the fate of the country was at all times, but now most particularly, placed in the hands of Parliament; and that on the conduct of this House in particular, during this session, depended very much the welfare and happiness of the people. The first paragraph of the Speech entirely coincided with his own views, namely, that part of it which related to the late conflict with the Dey of Algiers. With respect to the second, that which related to the War in India, he should not at present make any remarks, though he by no means gave any pledge respecting what he should do when the question should hereafter come before them. The rest of the Speech referred principally to the Revenue, and to the State of the Country. He must, of course, consider it as a speech advised by Ministers, and not as one proceeding from the Sovereign personally. He merely stated this, because he now intended to submit some remarks on the Speech delivered at the beginning of last Session by the Commissioners, and on that which had this day been delivered by the Prince Regent. Previous, however, to doing so, he would wish a paragraph in the former to be read by the Clerk, (which was accordingly read as follows.) "His Royal Highness is happy to inform you, that the manufactures, commerce, and revenue of the United Kingdom, are in a flourishing condition. The Prince Regent laments the heavy pittance upon the country which its great exertions could not fail to produce, and his Royal Highness has commanded us to assure you, that you may rely on every disposition on his part to concur in such measures of economy as may be found consistent with the security of the country, and with that station which we occupy in Europe." The House had now heard the professions of economy made by Ministers at the opening of last Session, and they were able to judge, and the country could judge, how far they were to be credited. They had last year advised his Royal Highness to tell both Houses of Parliament, that the country was in a flourishing condition, but in no one instance had that been proved to be true. They had also said they would adopt measures of economy. It was in the recollection of the House what measures had been proposed last Session,—measures that tended to abolish many kinds of unnecessary expenditure, and to introduce economy; but how had they been received by Ministers? Was it not an indisputable fact that they had on every occasion resisted them? What ground had the country now to believe, that they were more sincere than they were before, or that their conduct would be marked with more anxiety for the public welfare? It was said, that the causes of our distresses were merely temporary. He was willing to hope, that this, to a certain extent, was true; but he denied that it was wholly so. Last Session we were told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that sufficient provision had been made to meet the exigencies of the year. It was worth while to notice how that provision had been made up, and he would therefore do so, taking it in round numbers. There were three millions on one account with the Bank, six on another, five millions and six hundred thousand the surplus unapplied of the grants for the year 1815, and three millions which the Right Honourable Gentleman assumed would be the surplus of the Consolidated Fund. But, he contended, there was no surplus whatever now, nay, were it necessary, he might carry the point a great way further, and say more. Much had been stated respecting the propriety of keeping the public faith, and no man could be more anxious that this should be done than he was. When we spoke of a Sinking Fund, we obviously and unquestionably meant that it was something by which a debtor was enabled to lessen his debt. Surely then, the Sinking Fund, which instead of reducing our debt, left it where it found it, deserved no such name. The revenue had now totally failed, and were they to take the whole of the Sinking Fund in its room, they would still be obliged to borrow a considerable sum. It was obvious to the plainest understanding, that no benefit whatever could result to the country from ten millions being taken from the public debt on one side of the account by the operation of the Sinking Fund, while the same sum was added to it on the other. While such was the real nature of the case, how was it possible for Ministers to assert, as they had done last year, that the revenue of the country was in a flourishing condition; and now, when they saw the total destruction of the revenue, how could they declare it had arisen from merely temporary causes? The war undoubtedly had been long, and had been attended with unparalleled expense. Still, no man who dispassionately viewed the subject could admit, that the return of peace had at once produced this dreadful mass of evils. It was equally worthy of remark, that at the time this Speech was delivered by the Commissioners, the country was in a state of profound peace, and was so still. On the one occasion our revenue was described as flourishing, and on the other as having greatly failed. Now, were the cause of the calamity a mere transition from war to peace, why had the calamity not been in some degree alleviated before the present period? Twelve months had elapsed since the first speech was delivered, and instead of amelioration, the country was a thousand times worse. The real causes of the distress were, the immense debt and taxation of the country. When therefore, we presumed to exhort the people to exercise fortitude under the trials they were called to endure, and to be patient while they made so many sacrifices, it was surely the duty of the House to speak the truth to them, and not to attempt to blind or delude them by a false statement of the grounds of their calamity. Much had been said respecting the attempts made by some individuals to inflame the public mind, by stating circumstances in aggravation of the present distresses, which had no connection with the real causes. For himself, he felt confident that no man could rationally charge him with having ever in the smallest degree, directly or indirectly, given any countenance to such inflammatory designs, and he trusted he never should; but this he knew, that if the House wished to give the people any confidence in what they did, it was only by shewing their determination to do their duty. It was only by shewing that they would trust to no class of Ministers, of whatever party those Ministers might be, but would themselves, with all that attention, anxiety, impartiality, and love of justice, which as the representatives of a mighty empire they owed to their constituents, examine into and correct every abuse that existed in the public government of the country. (hear, hear!) And indeed it was impossible that, as representatives, they could be true to themselves or their country, unless they manifested a constitutional jealousy over every Ministry which might exist in the country. Nay, he would not hesitate to declare, that they were bound to act so, if they had any wish to preserve the people in due subordination. The people naturally looked up to the wisdom and energy of Parliament, and it would be painful in the extreme that the good they expected from that wisdom and energy should be withheld from them. In looking still further into the argument respecting the temporary nature of our calamities, one might naturally suppose from their being called temporary, that Ministers had strong expectations of some relief. Now, where were the resources from which such relief was to come? Was it from the manufacturing interests? Alas! the painful experience of thousands demonstrated the ruin of those interests. Was it from commerce? There were in the House many commercial men, but was there one of them who would say, that he entertained the smallest hope of an improved state? Looking around, the prospect was equally gloomy in every direction. No improvement was to be hoped for, unless the House did their duty by feeling sincerely for the people, and carrying that feeling into practice. He was at a loss to know why Parliament had not been sooner assembled. Ministers must have known that the early meeting of Parliament was the general wish of the country, and that no inconvenience could have been sustained by the gratification of that wish. But he imagined, that whatever advantages he and those Gentlemen who were of his opinion might see in the speedy assembling of Parliament, Ministers saw the great inconveniences they should be exposed to, and therefore resolved to postpone it as long as they possibly could. The debates of last Session seem to have given them some alarm, and they therefore prevented the trouble of debate as long as they could. Feeling these things very strongly, and feeling the absolute necessity of the House endeavouring by every exertion to secure the confidence of the people, he had prepared an Amendment that contained no language of despondency or exaggeration, but a plain honest statement of facts, and a declaration by which the House, should it adopt the Amendment, would come to a determination to shew itself ready without delay to go into the state of the country, and make that investigation which the urgency of the case required. Before he read that amendment, he called on them to consider the situation in which they were now particularly placed, and the duty they had to discharge to the public. The nation was at this moment looking up to them with an awful and indescribable anxiety. Every eye was directed to their proceedings. By discharging their duty in the manner which they ought, they would secure the love and affection of the people; but were they to act in a different manner—were they to shew the country that they still wished the delusion to be continued, then indeed would every claim to public confidence be lost—despondency and discontent succeed—and, to say the least, that want of union between the Representatives and their Constituents would take place, which would be productive of the most unpleasant effects. Should his Amendment be unfortunately negatived, he trusted that a noble friend of his, who had last year made a motion for a Committee to inquire into the National Expenditure, would again revive that motion. The right hon. gentleman then concluded by moving, that the following Amendment be adopted in that part of the Address which related to the finances and distress of the country:

“That we have seen with the deepest concern the continued embarrassments of our agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; the alarming deficiency of the revenue, and the unexampled and increasing distresses of all classes of his Majesty’s faithful subjects:

“That we are willing to indulge the hope that these distresses may be found, in part, to have originated from circumstances of a temporary nature, and that some alleviation of them may be produced by the continuance of peace; but that we should ill discharge our duty to his

Royal Highness, and be guilty of countenancing a most dangerous delusion, were we to conceal from him our opinion that the pressure which now weighs so heavily on the resources of the country, is much more extensive in its operation, more severe in its effects, more deep and general in its causes, and more difficult to be removed than that which has prevailed at the termination of any former war.

"That we are firmly persuaded that the same exemplary patience and fortitude with which all ranks have hitherto borne the difficulties under which they labour, will continue to support them under such burthens as may be found indispensably necessary for the unavoidable exigencies of the public service; but that to maintain this disposition, it is incumbent on this House, by a severe and vigilant exercise of its powers, to prove to their fellow subjects, that the sacrifices which it may be their painful duty to make, are strictly limited to the real necessities of the State.

"That while we acknowledge the gracious dispositions announced in his Royal Highness's Speech from the Throne, we cannot help expressing our regret that his Royal Highness should not have been sooner advised to adopt measures of the most rigid economy and retrenchment, particularly with respect to our Military Establishments: that to a prompt and effectual reduction in this and every other branch of our expenditure, his Majesty's faithful Commons most naturally look as the first step to relieve the sufferings and redress the grievances of which the people so justly complain; and that to enable themselves to assist his Royal Highness by their advice in the performance of a duty so imperiously called for by the present situation of the country, they will lose no time in instituting a strict inquiry into the state of the nation."

Mr. B. Bathurst observed, that the arguments on the speech of last year were not strictly applicable in the present instance. At that time our commerce was truly stated as flourishing: and it did not appear that Ministers made any specific propositions, but that considerable reductions, suited to the circumstances of the country, should be made in the large branches of the public expenditure. But now they had advised his Royal Highness to make the statements contained in his speech, and to notice the deficiency. Could these measures have been recommended by them, unless they were sincerely disposed and prepared to act upon them, and to submit propositions to Parliament, that the House might really take upon themselves to consider the situation of public affairs? Nearly the whole of the right hon. member's speech was concerning financial difficulties and retrenchments: but the speech from the throne would not have been so worded, had not his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended at an early and convenient time to propose a committee of inquiry. It was intimated that Parliament was not called sooner, because Ministers might have thought it would derange their plans. But no proper plan could be discussed affecting the revenue until the estimates were prepared, which would very soon be laid before the House, and thus the whole subject would be fairly considered. He was afraid, indeed, that the situation of the country would be required to be looked into much more fully and carefully than he could at the present time attempt to enter into it. The particular circumstances connected with our commerce and manufactures would require much investigation. The internal state of things had rendered it very desirable that gentlemen should be able to attend as much as possible to their duties as country magistrates in different parts of the kingdom. He could not agree with the right honourable member in talking of revenue as if it was entirely to be a clear surplus; nor in his views, by which the whole revenue might be considered deficient. We were not now increasing our debt, and he must regard the utility of the Sinking Fund. The House had not yet seen what Government had already done, nor were they yet acquainted with what it intended to propose. The right honourable member had scarcely adverted to the present distressed situation of the agricultural interest, which would yet demand attention. In this and last year, from various and different causes, there was a diminution in the amount of articles consumed, owing to the privations of the agriculturists. It was not possible for the farmer at present to purchase so many commodities as he had been accustomed to do. That was an important circumstance; and we ought also to look at what the season itself had been. The crops in many cases, too, had suffered by not being housed earlier. Something more, it was said, was wanted to add to the commercial interests of the country; but he thought, that what was most to be desired was not new things, but the preservation and support of our existing commercial interests. When the exports varied, by foreign customers purchasing fewer of our commodities, a stagnation naturally occurred. Looking at measures that might be adopted, and at the internal wealth of the country, with the alterations that might take place in Europe, he felt disposed to view the future with hope and confidence. It had not been possible to arrange matters earlier; he must therefore trust the House would think they had gone far enough by voting the address as originally proposed by the noble lord, without amendment.

The Honourable Mr. Lambé said, that the war, and the war alone, had occasioned all our difficulties. If it was undertaken without cause or against justice, or for unworthy objects; if opportunities occurred of terminating it with advantage, and those opportunities were neglected; if it had thus been pertinaciously persevered in, or impolitically commenced, the distress which was the consequence of it was to be attributed to the Ministers who began and conducted it.

If, on the other hand, it was at first unavoidable, and had been carried on no longer than it could have been terminated with honour and security, then no one was to blame for its results but the enemy who forced it upon us; but still in both cases it must be stated as the cause of our present embarrassments. Our calamities were produced by the war, though their complete pressure was not felt till the arrival of peace; they were thus connected with the peace in point of time, but they could not be traced to the peace as their cause. In this situation the great object for us to pursue was, not to propagate a delusion with respect to the cause of our distress, but to take every means of alleviating it, or preventing its extension, by supporting and maintaining public credit. He stated this opinion, not from any fear that the recommendations of those who attempted to justify a breach of national faith would be attended to, but from a firm conviction, that breaking faith with the national creditor, would bring no relief to the people, nor tend to remove, in any degree, the embarrassments of the country. On the contrary, he was convinced that such conduct on the part of the legislature would aggravate and extend them. If we were to trust the dictates of experience, we had it in support of this opinion. Some time ago the complaints against the landholder were as loud as they now were against the fundholder; these complaints were now heard no more, for there was no reason for them. Rents had been reduced, the landed interest were straitened in their incomes, but who had benefited by the change? The distresses of the manufacturing and labouring classes, instead of being alleviated, had been increased; they had been deprived of employment by the reduced circumstances of those who employed them, and found no advantage in the diminution of the income of those against whose wealth they clamoured. Our situation should be supported with that firmness and patience that could alleviate every calamity, instead of leading us to attempt plans and expedients which might aggravate temporary sufferings into irretrievable ruin, by destroying entirely public confidence and national credit. But how were we to support public credit, if we did not resort to such expedients? He would answer—by economy and retrenchment. (Hear, hear.) Parliament, he hoped, was prepared for entering into economical reductions; Ministers, he hoped, were prepared for the task; and the country, he hoped, was likewise prepared. He said, he hoped the country was prepared for it; for, although he meant no reflection against any particular individuals, he could not refrain from observing, that many who now called for economy and retrenchment would be sorry that they were adopted. A strict and rigorous attention to economy, and a reduction of all our establishments to the lowest possible scale, must be productive of evils to certain individuals, and he was not disposed to under-rate their sufferings, but the national good and the public security were paramount to all other considerations. The right hon. gentleman who spoke last had contended, that there was no necessity for the amendment of his right hon. friend, because the address pledged the House to the same course of conduct as the amendment. This he by no means admitted. The address pledged the House only to take "into consideration the state of the public income and expenditure;" whereas the amendment went much further, and embraced an inquiry into the state of the nation in all its interests, financial, commercial, political, and colonial, its extension of colonial territory, which was made the ground or the excuse of extending its military and civil establishments; and in short, its expenditure at home and abroad. Our commercial situation and system deserved and required revision, after such a violent change as it had lately undergone by the political circumstances of the world. There was one subject which pressed upon the attention of all, and which would be embraced in the inquiry that the amendment of his right hon. friend proposed—he meant the Poor Laws. The sum raised for the support of the poor, in the shape of rates, now amounted to a tax almost as great, and on certain classes of the community certainly more oppressive than the property-tax. It was impossible that eight millions a-year could be collected or administered in the manner, and for the purpose, in which this tax was collected and administered, without the greatest oppression to the landed interest, and the ultimate diminution of the industry and resources of the country. Not only this, but many other subjects, demanded an inquiry which might lead to amendments in our laws, institutions, and establishments, mild and moderate in their operation, and certain in their results upon public prosperity and happiness. Nor ought the House to be deterred from its duty in adopting improvements and economical reforms by the rumours or the fears of any disturbances or breaches of the peace which they had heard, or with which they were threatened. His opinion on this subject was always the same; it had always remained unaltered, and he believed would do so. He allowed in their fullest extent, the rights of the people to petition for any lawful object that they thought connected with their interests, privileges, or well-being; he revered popular meetings, which were regularly and quietly conducted (hear, hear); he revered the rights and the privileges which they exercised, and was disposed to attend to their representations as much as any man; but when such assemblies proceeded to violence, when they led to breaches of the peace, he was for vigorous and immediate repression. (Hear, hear.) This conduct he would recommend, not only from motives of public security, but from motives of tenderness and mercy to the deluded persons themselves. He deprecated all breaches of the peace, disturbance, and riot, not only for their immediate effects, but for their ultimate consequences. Tumult for liberty and right was not only dangerous and destructive, but was a liar, and never kept its promises. It led, in the end, through scenes of anarchy and blood to a political tyranny, or military despotism; the more fatal in its nature, and the more hopeless in its consequences, from the circumstance, that the people were taught to take refuge under its protection from the more appalling evils of insecurity and confusion. The hon. gentleman supported the amendment.

Mr. C. Grant said, that as far as he understood the Speech of his Royal Highness, it included nearly all those topics in its recommendation to Parliament which were embraced in the Amendment of the right hon. gentleman; and those which were not included would necessarily enter into the discussions of the Committee that had been mentioned. In that Committee the propriety of our Colonial Policy, and of our Commercial System, would be taken into consideration. With respect to the Poor Laws, that subject was brought before the House last year, and a full examination of it deferred to the present Session. He agreed with the hon. gentleman, that it would form a most important branch of that inquiry which the House would have to institute. He agreed also, that it would be their duty to support the public credit, which, with our agricultural prosperity, formed the two great sources of our national wealth. Nor was he disposed to question the truth of the assertion, that our present distresses were attributable to the war in some respect. But he was, at the same time, of opinion, that all the varying circumstances of our fortune during the last five and twenty years, had a more radical foundation than merely the continuance of that war. He should explain the matter upon a different principle. He would say that it was not simply a transition from a state of war to a state of peace, which had caused our distresses, but a transition of the country from a state in which it had been compelled to rely upon its own resources for food, to a state in which foreign supplies could be obtained. When the war took place we were an importing country to a considerable extent. The continuance of the war, however, necessarily increased the price of what we imported, from the war charges, and the high rate of insurance required. An impulse was consequently given to our own agricultural system, which continued through the whole of the war. The effect of this upon the home market was immediately felt, for it gave the middling and the lower classes of society a greater power of demand for articles provided by our manufacturers. In the prosperity of our agriculture was found the prosperity of the whole kingdom; but the return of peace shook that internal system of demand and supply to its foundation. The Corn Bill did much towards bringing it, and, from its gradual operation, might expect an improvement in all our manufactures, and in every branch of our trade. With regard to the disturbances that had occurred, he trusted there was but one opinion in that House upon the subject. There was a spirit at work throughout the country, of a most malignant and daring character, which attempted to pervert our distresses into an instrument of disloyalty and sedition. The effect of its machinations, if indulged, would be the subversion of the Constitution. He was far from confounding with those incendiaries, the individuals who, from motives which he believed to be sincere and honourable, however much he might differ from them, sought a Constitutional Reform. But the history of all ages proved, that the most wise and virtuous, in the attainment of their object, had sometimes employed as auxiliaries, instruments who ultimately became their masters and their tyrants, and therefore the danger was to be guarded against. He trusted, however, that the firmness of that House would preserve this country from such dangers.

The hon. member was proceeding, when he was interrupted by the annunciation of a message from the Lords.

Attack on the Regent.

The messengers were admitted, and the message was read to the following effect:—"That the lords request a present conference with the house in the painted chamber, on a subject deeply affecting the safety of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and the honour and dignity of Parliament." The message added, that "owing to the absence of the usual messengers, and the urgent nature of the business, the Lords were obliged to send this message by their Clerk-Assistant, and their Reading-Clerk."

The messengers withdrew, when

The Speaker observed, that as the usual method of communicating with the House had not been observed on the present occasion, it was necessary to mark the departure from established precedent. He therefore suggested, that it would be proper to call in the messengers of the lords, and inform them, that the House had received their message, and would return an answer by a messenger of their own.

The messengers were accordingly called in and informed, that an answer would be returned to the communication of the Lords by a messenger of the House of Commons.

As soon as they had withdrawn,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that in consequence of the importance of the occasion, that House acquiesced in the reasons assigned by the House of Lords for sending their Clerk-Assistant and Reading-Clerk, trusting, however, that it would not be drawn into precedent on future occasions.—This motion was unanimously agreed to.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, that the House do agree to a conference with their lordships, and that a message be sent to their lordships acquainting them therewith.

This motion was also carried, and Lord Binning was sent to communicate it to their Lordships. Upon his return,

The Speaker said, the next step was to appoint the Managers of the conference, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Canning, Mr. Ponsonby, Mr. Tierney, Sir S. Romilly, Lord A. Hamilton, Lord Lascelles, Mr. Fremantle, Mr. Brand, Mr. C. W. Wynn, Mr. B. Bathurst, and others were named, who repaired to the Painted Chamber.—After a short interval they returned to the house, when

The Chancellor of the Exchequer reported, that the lords had communicated to them that a daring outrage had been offered to the person of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, on his return from Parliament this day; that they had agreed to an address to his Royal Highness thereupon, and requested the concurrence of the Commons in the same. The lords had likewise informed them, that they had received the evidence of a witness on these proceedings, and that the name of this witness was the Right Hon. James Murray, commonly called Lord James Murray.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, that their lordships' message should be taken into consideration.

Mr. C. W. Wynn suggested, that it would be proper to decide immediately upon the course which the House should adopt. Considering the extreme urgency of the subject then before them, he submitted, whether the debate on the address should not be adjourned.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought, that as the communication which the House had received from their lordships was so extraordinary and alarming, and considering the respect which they owed to the Crown, they ought not to proceed on any other business that day.

The Speaker said, that whatever might be the determination of the House, it would be better that the course of proceeding should be known and decided.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, that the further consideration of the debate on the address should be adjourned till to-morrow.

This being agreed to, the right hon. gentleman moved that the message of the lords be now taken into consideration.

The communication was accordingly read again, together with the address agreed to by their lordships, (for which see page 3.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, that Lord James Murray be called in, and examined; which was unanimously agreed to.

His lordship accordingly appeared at the bar, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer proceeded to put the following questions, which were repeated by the Speaker:—

The noble lord is desired to state what situation he holds in his Royal Highness the Prince Regent's household?—I am a lord of the bed-chamber.

Was the noble lord in attendance on his Royal Highness on his coming to the House of Parliament this day?—I was.

Was the noble lord in the carriage with his Royal Highness the Prince Regent when he returned from the House?—Yes, I was.

The noble lord will be pleased to state what happened in his own sight on that occasion?—On the return of his Royal Highness from the House of Parliament, when the carriage had arrived between Carlton-house and Spring-gardens, the glass of the carriage on the left side was fractured.

In what manner was that fracture produced?—The glass appeared to have been fractured by two bullets of a small size, a quarter of an inch apart.

The noble lord will be pleased to state, whether he conceives that the glass was fractured by bullets, or by some other substance thrown with great violence?—I have not the least doubt, in my own mind, that it was fractured by bullets.

Did the noble lord make any other observations with respect to the proceedings on this occasion?—About a minute after the glass was first broken, a large stone was thrown against the window of the carriage; then three or four others.

Was it the same window that the bullets had fractured?—Yes, it was.

Had the noble lord any opportunity of observing the glass between the first fracture and the time of its being finally broken by the stones?—I observed the first fracture very minutely in the interval.

Did the noble lord observe whether there were such a number of persons near the carriage at that time, that a pistol might have been fired by any person without his being immediately recognized?—The crowd not being near the carriage at the time, if a pistol had been fired, the person might have been observed.

Does the noble lord conclude, that the bullets were fired by any other instrument than a pistol, such as an air-gun?—I conclude, as I heard no report, that they were fired by an air-gun, without the aid of gunpowder.

The Speaker then asked, whether any other hon. member would wish to put any questions to the noble lord.

Sir Benjamin Hobhouse.—Will the noble lord have the goodness to state, whether any bullets have been found in the carriage?—(Hear, hear.) I have not heard that any bullets have been found in the carriage; I should observe, that I conceived, from the manner of the fracture, that the bullets must have come from some height, perhaps from one of the trees, of which there are many in that part of the Park, in which were several persons.

A Member.—Did the noble lord hear any noise to induce him to suppose that the bullets passed through the carriage?—I heard no noise but that produced by the fracture of the glass.

Mr. C. W. Wynn.—Will the noble lord be pleased to answer, whether the opposite glass was up or down?—It was up.

Mr. Brougham.—Will the noble lord state whether he observed two similar holes in the opposite glass?—The opposite glass was not broken at all. The reason I supposed the bullets to have come from a height was, that splinters of the glass were thrown violently to the lower part of the opposite side of the carriage.

Mr. Brougham.—The noble lord will be pleased to say, whether any bullets, or similar substances, were found at the bottom of the carriage?—I had no opportunity of ascertaining this, as I left the carriage immediately after the Prince Regent.

A Member.—Did his Royal Highness the Prince Regent give any instructions afterwards to search the carriage?—Not to my own knowledge.

Mr. Brougham.—Will the noble lord state who were the other persons in the carriage besides the Prince Regent and himself?—The duke of Montrose, who is master of the horse: he sat on the same side of the carriage on which the window was broken.

Mr. Brougham.—The noble lord is requested to answer, whether the bottom of the carriage was struck with any thing else than the splinter of glass?—I only observed that a splinter of glass struck the bottom of the opposite door.

Mr. Brougham.—Will the noble lord say, whether the stone or stones which broke the window did enter the carriage?—No, it did not: the glass being very thick, it rebounded.

Lord Cochrane.—Will the noble lord state, whether the window that was broken, was next to his Royal Highness?—His Royal Highness sat in the middle of the carriage.

Lord Milton.—The noble lord is requested to say, whether the stone or stones that were thrown after the bullets, actually smashed the window, or merely starred the glass?—It not only smashed the window, but also pounded the glass.

Mr. C. W. Wynn.—Will the noble lord say, whether the glass was not of an unusual thickness?—The glass was remarkably thick.

Sir Robert Heron.—Will the noble lord state, who were the persons on the outside of the carriage, nearest to the window that was struck? Were they soldiers or others?—There was a footman on the side of the door, and one of the life-guards immediately behind, but no soldier opposite the window.

A Member.—Will the noble lord say, whether he supposes the bullets perforated any other part of the carriage at all?—Whether they perforated any other part of the carriage I do not know, but I suppose they did.

Here the examination closed, and his lordship was ordered to withdraw, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, and said, that the house being heard from the mouth of the noble lord, the particulars of this daring and flagitious outrage, he trusted that they would support the address, by concurring with the House of Lords who had expressed their abhorrence of such proceedings, committed on the person of his Royal Highness, whilst he was returning from the exercise of the Royal Prerogative in opening the session.

Mr. Ponsonby moved, that the address be read a second time.

This being done, the right hon. member rose again and said, that every body must agree to the propriety of the address. Whether the outrage on the person of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent had been committed by bullets or by stones, they had not decisive evidence before them; and, indeed, it was quite immaterial, except with regard to the guilt of the person, and could not in the least degree influence the decision of the House. In delivering this opinion, he was sure that he only expressed the unanimous sense of the House. (Hear, hear.)

The question was then put from the chair, and the address was agreed to nemine contradicente, by filling up the blanks left by their lordships with the words, "and Commons."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer next moved, that such members as were of the Privy Council should wait upon his Royal Highness to know when he would be pleased to receive the address. This was agreed to, and the members were named.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, January 29.

PRIVILEGE.] A Message from the Commons, brought up by Mr. William Dundas and other Members, expressed their acquiescence in the reasons which induced their lordships to send a Message yesterday by their Clerks, instead of the usual Messengers, but desired that it might not be drawn into precedent.

ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.] The Lord Chancellor informed their lordships, that both Houses had this day presented an humble Address to the Prince Regent, to which his Royal Highness had returned the following gracious answer:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"This additional proof of the strong feelings of duty and loyalty which animate the two Houses of Parliament affords me the highest satisfaction.

"Relying with the utmost confidence on the steady attachment of his Majesty's subjects, I have nothing to regret on this occasion, but a flagrant violation of the laws and constitution.

I shall cause such steps to be immediately taken, as may be the best calculated to bring to justice and punishment, the persons concerned in an offence so dangerous to the public peace, and so injurious to the best interests of the country."

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.] The Speech of his Royal Highness having been read by the Clerk at the table,

The Earl of Dartmouth rose to move the Address. He sincerely wished that it were in his power to congratulate their lordships and the country on the present aspect of affairs; but though he could not offer unmixed congratulation, he could at least call their attention to the consideration of many circumstances stated in the Speech, which afforded much consolation. It was a satisfaction to learn, that no interruption was likely to occur to that repose and tranquillity of which this country so much stood in need. It was this that tended to the advancement of civilization, and to the promotion of general prosperity. The depredations and insults of the Barbary Corsairs, had made it absolutely necessary for this Government to put a stop to Christian slavery. A war was accordingly commenced, and the combined fleet was entrusted to the command of Lord Exmouth, who had proved himself not only most brave and skilful, but most zealous in the cause in which he was employed. The Dey of Algiers treated with contempt the just demand of the British forces, and trusted to the strength of his own fortifications; but neither the strength of his towers, nor the obstinate bravery of his troops, could effectually resist the valour and intrepidity of British officers and British seamen. The Al-gerine fleet was destroyed, and the Dey was ultimately obliged to accede to those terms which the British Government chose to impose. The Christian captives were set at liberty, and all the objects of the war were finally achieved. In the East his Majesty's land forces had been no less successful; and, seconded by the judicious arrangements of the Governor-General, the British Government had been enabled to bring to an honourable termination a war which had been unavoidably undertaken. Thus did the whole of the British Empire, even to the most distant parts, enjoy a profound and happy peace. In looking to the internal state of the kingdom, some circumstances had occurred which called for feelings of a less grateful nature. The disloyal and disaffected had taken advantage of the present calamitous state of the country, and had endeavoured to create insubordination and disturbance; but it was evident to all who had inquired into the subject, that the existing distresses could only be ascribed to the sudden transition from war to peace, and that, heavy as they pressed upon the poorer classes of the community, they were only temporary evils. Some symptoms of the revival of commerce had already appeared; and, to remedy the present difficulties, pecuniary aid had been given by those who were able, to supply the wants of the poor. The attempts which had been made to destroy this benevolent spirit, by exciting sedition and disaffection, had been checked, in a great measure, by the activity and firmness of the magistrates, and by those who were aware that such outrages only served to increase the general distress; but the same feeling of abhorrence which had induced their lordships yesterday to express their indignation at the outrageous insults offered to his Royal Highness, while performing the most important duties of his office, would equally induce them to express their abhorrence at the attempts made to excite the people to the most wicked and daring acts of violence. It was owing to the wisdom of Government, inspired by the constitution, that this country had been enabled so gloriously to obtain tranquillity abroad, and by the same means peace and happiness would be restored at home. His Lordship concluded by moving an Address, which, as usual, was an echo of the Speech.

Lord Rothés, in seconding the Address, conceived it unnecessary for him to detain their lordships at any length. No doubt, very great satisfaction would be derived from the communication which his Royal Highness had been graciously pleased to make of the assurances he had received from all the foreign powers of continued amity and friendship. It was a communication gratifying at all times, but peculiarly so at the present moment. In the complete and glorious success of the expedition under Lord Exmouth at Algiers, their lordships would find great cause for exultation. It had added fresh lustre to the British arms, and had

He would not enter into any detail of the causes of the distresses alluded to in the Speech; every thinking man, however, must be satisfied, that they were occasioned in a great degree by the sudden transition from a long war to a profound peace. But it would afford great satisfaction to all classes of the community, that in the midst of these calamities, it would be unnecessary to have recourse to new burdens upon the people, or to infringe on any stipulations or engagements made with the public. Their lordships would no doubt feel, in common with himself, great indignation and abhorrence at the frequent and daring attempts made to excite sedition and riot among the lower classes; but when he promised himself yesterday the honour of addressing their lordships upon this subject, he little expected to have been under the painful necessity of adding to the catalogue that dreadful outrage which yesterday had occurred. In a country where the greatest liberty existed, the first of his Majesty's subjects, in the exercise of the most sacred functions, was most daringly and grossly insulted; insulted—nay, more—that great personage was assaulted, and his life perhaps endangered. (Hear, hear, hear.) He most sincerely wished that he possessed the eloquence of some noble lords, to express his feelings upon this lamentable occasion; but he must simply confine himself to an expression of sanguine hope, that their lordships and the community at large, would exert themselves to the utmost in endeavouring to wipe off that foul stain which had, for a second time, unhappily fallen upon the country. He was satisfied, however, that the great mass of the people were firmly attached to their sovereign. The people were in general of a cool and temperate character; and with the hope of a speedy return of happiness and comfort, they would bear their present sufferings with fortitude and patience. He would answer for them, and he felt persuaded that he might do it safely, that they were most grateful to the higher classes, who, although suffering inconveniences themselves, had come forward, and some of them even from scanty purses, had relieved the distresses of their fellow-creatures. No one could witness these scenes without expressing his admiration, and acknowledging that the universal benevolence which pervaded this country was one of its greatest ornaments.

Earl Grey.—Before he proceeded to observe on those parts of the speech of the Ministers delivered by his Royal Highness, and those parts of the speeches of the noble lords who moved and seconded the address, with respect to which it would be his painful duty to dissent from their sentiments, he would briefly advert to those parts of these speeches as to which there could be no difference of opinion. First, then, no one could more heartily than he did join the noble mover and the noble seconder of the address, in paying the highest tribute of praise to the skill, enterprise, perseverance, and courage, of the noble and gallant admiral who commanded the fleet in the attack upon Algiers; no one could more cordially join in that just tribute of applause paid to the courage, resolution, and exemplary valour of the officers and seamen under his command; rejoicing, as he did, in this new accession of glory to the British arms, and particularly to that branch of our defensive force which ought always to be looked upon with favour, as the best and most natural protection of this country. But while he concurred in these just and well-deserved praises, he could not help expressing his regret, considering the heavy pressure under which the country laboured, that any necessity should have arisen for adding even the expense of that expedition to our already almost intolerable burdens; and while he expressed that regret, he could not help adding some doubt, whether the security and good effects which many expected to result from this enterprise, would be of so permanent a nature as some were sanguine enough to believe they would be: but while he suggested that doubt, he wished most anxiously to guard himself against being understood as having any desire to detract, in the slightest degree, from the merits of those who were employed in the execution. Another topic introduced into the Prince Regent's speech, and into the speeches of the noble lords, was the Nepaul War. Here, again, he most cordially concurred in the tribute of applause paid to the officers and men employed in the prosecution and conduct of that war: but it would be too much to ask at present for any opinion of the House as to the causes and necessity of the war, since on that head no information had, as far as he knew, been communicated to their lordships. There was one thing, however, which he must remark upon, and which he had observed with very considerable surprise—he alluded to the terms in which the termination of this Nepaul war was introduced into the speech. It was introduced in similar terms to those in which the conclusion of that most important war was mentioned which terminated with the capture of Seringapatam and the destruction of the Mysore power—the most formidable, dangerous, and most inveterately hostile to the British authority in India. But leaving that topic, he came to another point in the speech, in which he had the good fortune to agree with the noble lords. They rejoiced at the assurances given in the speech of the prospect of a long continuation of peace, and congratulated the House and the Country on that satisfactory prospect. No one could more sincerely rejoice than he did at any well-founded hopes, if such could be entertained, of the long continuation of peace; but he must at the same time observe, that he had great doubts as to the policy of those arrangements made by ministers at the close of the war, and yet it was on the soundness of the policy which dictated these arrangements that any well-founded hopes of a long interval of peace must essentially depend. The subject was much too large for full consideration at this time; but it was by far too important, too deeply interesting, to be passed over without the fullest examination and discussion when the proper period should arrive: and a communication would probably soon be made to the House with respect to some modifications and alterations in these arrangements, which must bring the subject under their lordships' consideration. But if he might, even now, merely state his opinion, he would say, that he was not without very strong apprehensions that the system of policy on which the arrangements had been formed, was highly dangerous to the security and constitution of this country, and to the peace and prosperity of Europe. These arrangements were, in his opinion, adverse to the independence of nations, alien to every view of sound policy and justice, subversive of every principle on which the balance of Europe had been held to depend, and destructive of every principle on which our own security and the peace and prosperity of the country were founded; dangerous to the character of the army employed in the support of the present government of France, and most dangerous to the constitution of this country. Without securing one great object of British interest in return, Ministers had assisted in transferring the minor states of Europe from government to government, while those who were at the head of these governments, at the moment they were aggrandizing their power by our assistance, hated us for our commercial eminence, hated us for our prosperity, and made war upon us by adverse regulations, with as much inveteracy and detestation as ever Napoleon himself had shewn against us. The noble lord (Earl of Liverpool) might smile, but the day would come for a more ample and particular discussion of that topic. That, however was his view of the subject. If the governors disliked us, the people answered with a corresponding hatred, while they ascribed to this country the sacrifice of the rights and independence of nations. We called upon them to rise in defence of their own rights and independence, in opposition to France; the call was obeyed, and Europe was relieved from the power of France; and then, when their aid was no longer required, they found their rights and independence violated by those to whom they had been taught to look for the support of both. The discontents produced by these proceedings were murmured in secret, and directed chiefly against this country, by which they considered themselves as having been most unjustly deceived. This was the character of the policy which produced these arrangements; a policy which in France appeared already to threaten the most disastrous consequences. With respect to that country, one of two systems might have been adopted; we might have conciliated the population, by not interfering in their internal concerns, after having overturned that government against which alone, as was professed, our hostility was directed. This was what he would have preferred. If that, however, had been forbidden by the disordered state of that unhappy country, when we had unsheathed the sword and conquered, ministers ought, if that course was open to them, to have assumed that right of conquest which their arms had given them, to have demanded the utmost that they could think necessary for our security, and to have reduced the power of France in such a degree, that whatever might be the feelings of the population of that country, we might have looked on without fear or apprehension of the consequences. Neither of these plans, however, did they pursue; but adopted a third course, which had the disadvantages of both the others, without the advantages of either. Without having reduced the power of France, so as to deprive her of the means of endangering our security, British troops were kept there to maintain the present family on the throne; we thus increased her enmity without sufficiently diminishing her strength; and the time, he was greatly apprehensive, might not be very distant, when, in order to gratify the general feeling of hostility, the government of France would find it necessary to go to war with this country, and employ against it that power which we ourselves had created. He could hardly have had very sanguine hopes of a long continuation of peace under any arrangement that could have been made with France; but if there was any arrangement which was of all others calculated to render the long continuation of peace almost impossible, it was precisely that which had been adopted. Their lordships, however, would have an opportunity of considering and discussing that topic when the communication as to the change of the terms on which our troops were to remain in France should be made to them: and the subject would deserve their lordships' most particular attention, if it should appear that the changes and modifications were such, that any part of the expense of maintaining these troops in France was to be borne by this already overburthened country. Having thus stated his opinion as to the first part of the Prince Regent's speech, and of the address in answer to it, he now came to that part of it which, in point of interest and importance, far surpassed all the other topics which it contained—he alluded to the internal state of the country; a state which the noble lords acknowledged to be one of great distress, and which he considered as altogether unparalleled in the annals of this country. Ministers held out to us, as they had always done, that they hoped the distress was but temporary, and that the present pressure would soon be succeeded by a new era of increasing prosperity. That was a hope so congenial to the feelings of every man, whether considered as an individual, or as a member of a great community, that all must wish that the hope were well founded. But their lordships would ill discharge their duty, if they were to rely with implicit confidence on the hopes of Ministers, or of the noble lords who had concurred with them in such flattering expectations, without some examination of the grounds on which these hopes rested. If it was desirable that the belief should prevail among the people, that their distresses were but of a temporary duration, in order to encourage them to bear with patience and fortitude the pressure to which they were for the present exposed, that belief could operate only so far as the conviction went, that the expectations of a speedy termination of their distresses were not without foundation. In that view of the subject, if the hopes held out were well founded, examination could do nothing but good. If, on the other hand, as he greatly feared was the case, the evil was more deeply rooted, and of a more permanent nature and character, then examination was imperiously required, in order to save the country from that destruction with which a dereliction of that most important duty would overwhelm us. Such derangement of property, such universal disorder and confusion in agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing concerns, had never before existed in this Country. That the causes of this unparalleled distress were partly temporary, and that some alleviation of the pressure might be expected from the continuation of peace, he was not only not disposed to deny, but most anxiously desirous to believe: for, otherwise, the prospect must be neither more nor less than absolute despair. But he was at the same time of opinion, that the causes of the evil were more deeply rooted, and more permanent in their nature, than some noble lords seemed willing to allow; and that the difficulties and distresses were such as had never before existed in this country. He had heard it stated on some occasions, that the country had been in a similar state of distress at the close of the American war; and it had been held out to us that, as an era of extraordinary prosperity had then succeeded, we might reasonably expect a similar termination to our present difficulties. He was not then of an age to have a share in the deliberative councils of the country; but it did not appear to him, that either in degree, in extent, in character, in symptoms, or means of cure, the situation of the country was at all similar to that under which it at present laboured. Was the general mass of the population of the country in such a state then as it was now? Were the prisons and workhouses of the country filled with the victims of overwhelming calamity? Was the manufacturing interest in such a state of depression and distress? Was the amount of taxation and expenditure equal to what it was at present? There was a deficiency, it was said, in the produce of the revenue as compared with the expenditure even at that time: but the amount of taxation then was about 12 millions; and was it the same thing, a deficiency on 12 millions, and a deficiency in a revenue of five times that amount? It might as well be said, that as the country advanced in taxation, it was so much the better able to bear the weight of additional taxes; that the addition of the weight of one pound to the load of a horse, already on the point of sinking under his burden, was the same thing as the adding a pound weight to the burden of a horse whose load was not greater nor heavier than he had full strength and powers to carry; that a drop of water added to the contents of a vessel already full to the brim, was the same thing as adding a drop to the contents of a vessel not more than three-parts full; and that the diseases of age were as easily got rid of as the diseases of youth. If there had been no other difference between the situation of the country then, and its situation now, than that of the additional taxation and consequent heavier pressure at the present period, that alone would make a difference almost incalculable. What were the symptoms, and what the remedies, at the close of the American war? We were told that the pressure was temporary; that it had been brought upon us by the change from a state of war to a state of peace; but that the blessings of peace would soon begin to be felt, as they had been at the close of the American war. But a year had already elapsed since the close of the war in 1815: and nearly three years had elapsed since the close of the war in 1814, with the exception of a three months' war, and that without any mitigation of the distresses of the country, which appeared to be rather increasing. In 1783, the year after the close of the American war, there was no settled government. Three different administrations had been in office during that period, and for three months there was hardly any administration at all: and, till the administration of Mr. Pitt was confirmed, in 1784, it was impossible that any regular system could then be adopted to alleviate or remedy the distress of the country. What was his remedy then? He imposed new taxes to the amount of a million. In 1785 he imposed new taxes: and in two years from the conclusion of the treaty of peace, instead of a growing deficiency in the consolidated fund, as was now experienced, there was a growing increase; and Mr. Pitt was enabled to shew, as a proof of the growing prosperity of the country, an increase in one quarter to the amount of 600,000l. These circumstances proved, that there was no similarity between the condition of the country at that time, and its situation at present; that it then possessed means of relief which did not exist at present; that at the end of two years, from the conclusion of the peace, the remedy then applied had made considerable progress towards a complete cure. The remedy then applied was that of additional taxation to the amount of a million, afterwards increased to 1,200,000l. for the purposes of the sinking fund. If the country was now in no worse a situation, the same cure might be applied. At that time, in from two to three years from the conclusion of the peace—little more than the time that had elapsed since the close of the war in 1814—the country began to experience the blessings of peace, and there was a considerable clear surplus in the consolidated fund. Was that the case at present? What might he state to be the deficiency now? The supplies of last year were 35 millions, and the ways and means did not exceed 20 millions; leaving a difference of 14 millions between the revenue and the expenditure. But if the matter were examined more minutely, he was persuaded there would appear a much greater deficiency—a deficiency of 10 less than 18 millions; and while the surplus of the consolidated fund had been estimated at three millions, it would probably appear that there was no surplus at all, and that the deficiency was no less than 21 millions. He challenged Ministers to meet that statement when the time of examination should arrive. The speech of the Prince Regent adverted to reductions calculated on principles of sound policy—words a great deal too loose and too general, and savouring strongly of a measure of reduction very different from that which the present situation of the country demanded; but of that, a word presently. What was the amount of the intended reduction? Was it to be 5, 8, or 10 millions? If the noble earl (Liverpool) could say that the expenditure was to be reduced to 19 millions, then what means had he to meet it? Was there any surplus of the consolidated fund? He would venture to say, that if the noble earl took the whole produce of the sinking fund, there would be a deficiency of nearly one million and a half. Could they then seriously say, that the state of the country now, was similar to its situation at any former period? In addition to this, he had to advert to a subject not at all noticed in the speech, and one which was the chief cause and foundation of all the present distresses of the country—he alluded to the immense mass of paper currency, which had circulated at a depreciation of about 20 per cent., and was now in a great measure suddenly withdrawn, or restored to its proper level. There was no such difficulty at the close of the American war. He had sat in the committee of inquiry into the affairs of the Bank, when the restriction was under consideration: he dissented from the majority of that committee, who determined to report, that the restriction was expedient; and he afterwards opposed it as much as he could in the other House of Parliament. For some time the evil was not felt, and it afforded a facility in carrying on the war which astonished even the most sanguine; so that some with a new species of morality, considered it as a particular dispensation of Providence, as if it had been one of the blessings of Providence to afford facilities for war. In 1810, the consequences of the restriction began to appear, and he had then called the attention of Parliament to the subject, but with the usual want of success. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then felt that it was impossible to add to the already almost intolerable load of taxation; that it was impossible to increase the taxes without serious injury to the foundations of the national prosperity. What followed? Retrenchment and economy? No; but shifts and expedients to disguise the evil for a time, and throw the burden upon some future period. This system encouraged extravagance in the expenditure; and the same plan of profusion was continued till the pressure came in all the weight under which the country was now suffering. This was the grand source of our present difficulties; and still the resumption of cash payments by the Bank, and of the circulation in specie, was delayed. What were the original causes of the restriction? The accommodation afforded by the Bank to the Government, and the quantity of specie sent to foreign countries. Yet last year the Government had received a similar accommodation, which must be repaid before the Bank could resume its cash payments. (Earl of Liverpool—No.) The noble earl said no: but their lordships would see how that would turn out when the subject came to be considered. They had heard, too, of a loan to be made by certain individuals of this country to the French Government. It was always desirable to leave commerce free and unfettered, and it was said that the repayment of this loan was not guaranteed by our Government. He wished, however, that Ministers would make an explicit declaration on that point. The effect of such a transaction was not doubtful, when it was considered how ill the country, in its present situation, could bear the loss of such a mass of capital; and Ministers would incur a heavy responsibility if they afforded the least encouragement to that loan. Yet he could hardly believe that so great a risk would be ventured upon without some communication and understanding with Government. If Ministers, however, could state that they had given no countenance to the transaction, there was, in his opinion, no object of British interest so minute that it ought not, in any future arrangements with the French government, to be preferred to the interests of those concerned in this loan. He could hardly, however, conceive that so great a risk would be incurred without some communication to Government: and if Ministers had even gone the length of taking measures to prevent it, the proceeding would not have been without precedent, for Sir Robert Walpole had brought a bill into Parliament to prevent a similar transaction. It was, at any rate, highly desirable that Ministers should explicitly state, whether the Government had any concern with it or not. He had thus stated the difficulties under which the country laboured—the restriction on the Bank—the amount of taxation—the enormous load of debt, contracted in a great measure in depreciated paper, to be paid in gold and silver; from all which it appeared that the country suffered under a pressure such as had never existed at any former period. He now asked the noble earl, what were their expedients, and what were the means by which the deficiency in the revenue was to be met? From the speech of the Prince Regent the only thing he could discover was, that there was to be no trenching on the public credit; by which he understood, that the sinking fund was not to be touched, and that no new taxes were to be imposed. By what means, then, did they propose to meet the deficiency? Was it by adding to the debt, and increasing the national difficulties? He hoped not. If Ministers were to resort to borrowing, or to the issuing of Exchequer bills, it could not be said that no new burdens were imposed on the country; for the issuing of Exchequer Bills must ultimately operate as a burden on the nation, and was only adding to the amount of our debt without making provision for the payment of either the interest or the principal. Then they came with professions of economy and retrenchment; but their lordships could not forget that they last year professed economy and retrenchment; and then came with an establishment reduced, as they said, to its lowest possible terms; and that they were prepared to defend their estimates, article by article, or in their own words, item by item. Parliament, however, afterwards lowered their establishment and estimates. Now they came again with professions of economy, and with measures of reduction brought, as they said, to its lowest limits. But Ministers had before not only exhibited no spirit of retrenchment and economy, but had insisted upon a continuation of the expenditure, even in the most trivial articles, as if they had been determined to trifle with the feelings of the people, and insult them in their distresses. Now, however, their lordships were told, that they were disposed to make reductions: but it would be the duty of that House to insist upon a reduction and retrenchment very different from that which appeared to be promised in the speech. They must have a severe, rigid, unsparing economy; not such a plan of reduction and economy as appeared to be intimated by the vague and general words—sound policy; but calculated upon a view of the unparalleled distress of the country, and a consideration of what necessity would permit. They must consider, not what Government would think it sound policy to have, but what the country could afford to pay; and if they could not raise their means to their establishment, they must reduce their establishment to their means. (Hear, hear, hear.) The strictest economy must be introduced even in those particulars where, in ordinary circumstances, a liberal expenditure would not be improper, and the splendour of the Crown must now be found, not in the gaudy trappings of the Court, but in a just regard to the distressed situation of the country. However painful it might be, the claims even of meritorious services could not now be listened to with that attention which in ordinary circumstances they ought always to command. The question now must be, not what ought to be done, but what could be done; and Government, in applying remedies to the extent required by the present unparalleled distresses of the country, would have to execute a most painful task, and to encounter almost insurmountable difficulties; and after they should have done all that could be effected, after every measure of the most painfully rigid and unsparing economy, should have been adopted, he was very apprehensive, that even then no alleviation of the pressure of taxation could reasonably be expected. He must here touch upon a kind of expenditure (Sinecures) which had excited much odium and irritation in the minds of the people: he was far from wishing to encourage the delusion which had been industriously spread among the people, that any reduction in the course of this expenditure would afford any sensible alleviation of the burdens under which the country so severely suffered: but he did say, that Government was bound to shew the people of this country, that the expenditure was reduced to the lowest possible terms, and that no sacrifice was required of them, and that no source of expenditure was continued, except what was demanded by the most imperious necessity. There was another topic introduced in the speeches of the noble lords, which he could not think of without the most painful sensations—he alluded to their observations on the attempts said to have been made to inflame the passions of the populace, and to excite them to acts of riot and sedition, with reference to the unfortunate occurrence to which their lordships' attention had last night been particularly directed. No one could feel more strongly than he did the atrocity of the outrage which their lordships had mentioned—an outrage which justly called for the severe censure of their lordships, and which ought to be visited with all the powers of the law, both for punishment and prevention. But, however just and proper it was to expose that outrage to the censure of their lordships, he saw no strong grounds, from the statement of last night, for suspecting that there was any criminal design against his Royal Highness's life. There should be no wish, in any quarter, to encourage the belief, either at home or abroad, that such an execrable purpose could have existed in the mind of a single individual in the country. The outrage was sufficiently atrocious, and the occurrence most deeply to be deplored; but no good reason could exist for representing the transaction as one of a more atrocious character than that which really belonged to it. It was unreasonable to suppose, that in a state of general and severe distress, discontents would not exist. Man would be a different being, and the whole system of human nature would be changed, were not this the case. He however rejoiced to find, that if there had been attempts on the part of any description of persons to inflame their discontents into disaffection, such attempts had failed, and all their efforts had been without success. There was, therefore, nothing that called for any extraordinary measures in this respect; nothing that required the exercise of any powers beyond the usual administration of justice. He could not, therefore, but deprecate any attempt to involve in one common censure, those who honestly sought a reform in the legislature, even on principles which might be regarded as impracticable, with persons disaffected to the constitution. Certainly, no one had ever been more personally objectionable to those reformers than he had been; but though they might continue to stigmatise him as a person who had forfeited their confidence, and whose moderation was hateful to them, still, though he thought their views, to the extent to which they were carried, would, if attempted in practice, lead to the most ruinous consequences, he would not follow their example, and pronounce a condemnation on their intentions. He should, indeed, be extremely sorry, if, by thus confounding all those who sincerely and with honest intentions endeavoured to procure a reform in the legislature, with persons disaffected to the government, an opinion should be excited in this country, or in Europe, that there was any considerable body of men among us, entertaining designs hostile to the constitution. He should regret this still more, were such an opinion to be made the foundation of any laws tending to infringe on the privileges of the subject. He hoped he should not hear it stated, that reform and retrenchment were subjects which the great body of the people ought not to discuss. After all the privations which the people of England had with such unparalleled fortitude borne, he trusted they were not now to be deprived of their constitutional rights. The liberty they enjoyed was their best consolation under all the difficulties they had to encounter; but if they should find Parliament more eager to impose restraints on their freedom than to relieve their wants, then, indeed, he believed their discontents would rapidly and alarmingly increase. On all these grounds he could not refrain from opposing the Address. It did not afford a just view of the country; it did not hold out that strong pledge of retrenchment and economy, which the present state of the country required, and which alone could satisfy the public mind. The noble earl then concluded, by moving an amendment, the same as that moved by Mr. Ponsonby in the House of Commons.

The Earl of Harrowby said, he had listened with the utmost attention to all that had fallen from the noble earl opposite, but had not heard sufficient reasons to induce their lordships to support the amendment. The noble earl had complained, that the difficulties of the country were not sufficiently stated in the Address. He would, it seemed, have them drawn in the blackest colours. But in tracing a general view of public affairs it was by no means necessary always to state things precisely as they were. To adopt the course the noble earl recommended, might be in many cases highly injurious, by subduing that spirit of confidence and hope which can alone give sufficient energy to rescue a country from a state of difficulty, and restore its prosperity. The noble earl called on their lordships to assert facts to which they could not give their assent. It was, for instance, impossible to agree with him, that the present distress exceeds that of every former period. The American war had been alluded to, and he believed the noble earl entered Parliament soon after the termination of that contest. It could not be forgotten, that the language of that day was distinguished by the strongest despondency. The noble earl had alluded to the state of the country in 1783; but he ought to have recollected, that at that period our public debt had increased in the course of ten years by a sum, the interest of which was 4,800,000*l.*, while the whole revenue raised to meet it amounted only to 1,700,000*l.* Here was a state of things which might fairly be put in the balance with the embarrassments of the present period. In that same year, 1783, our exports amounted to the great sum of 10 millions, while in the year which had just expired they had fallen to so low a state as to be only 28 millions! So much for the prosperity of 1783 compared with that of 1817. The country had then a debt gradually accumulating without means prepared for its reduction: no man had then been bold enough to propose a remedy for this enormous evil. At present the country possessed a sinking fund amounting to about 14 millions. It was true, the noble earl had said that this sinking fund was not applicable to our expenditure. It was to be hoped it never would; but in possessing it the country had a mortgaged revenue, which, if added to the other revenue, would equalize the income with the expenditure. The noble earl had dwelt much upon taxation as the cause of the present embarrassments: no man would pretend, when a country is in a state of difficulty, that the pressure of taxes would not augment the distress, but it by no means followed that these taxes should be regarded as the cause of the distress. On the contrary, the fact incontrovertibly was, that when the taxes exceeded their present amount by nearly 18 millions, the prosperity of the country was great. The state of the currency was another subject into which the noble earl had entered, but into which he did not think it necessary to follow him at any length. A very great part of the paper currency had, from various causes, disappeared; but that it had previously produced great effects no man could deny. A revulsion, it was true, had arisen from certain temporary causes, and had occasioned considerable distress; but that distress, like the causes which gave it birth, was also temporary. But to whatever degree that distress extended, had it not been balanced by great advantages? It would be strange indeed, if any man could look back to the events which had occurred during these 20 years, and not oppose to that distress the important acquisitions made by the country during the same period; the rank to which we had risen among nations; the security we had obtained, the imperishable glory we had conquered! Were he to be asked, whether he would embark in the system which had produced these results, or abandon its advantages for the sake of avoiding any evils with which it had been accompanied, he would not hesitate a moment in his choice. Let it not be supposed, that though the progress of the distress had been rapid and unexpected; the system of paper currency was not balanced by benefits of the most important kind. It had created wealth in every corner of the country; it had framed machines, and built warehouses, which were loaded with the merchandise of the world; and it had left behind materials which would, in due time, reproduce prosperity in spite of those gloomy predictions, which, from the year 1791 to that day, had been incessantly repeated, and which could tend only to depress the spirit of the country. With regard to the late treaty of peace, the opinion he entertained was very different from that of the noble earl. As the events which preceded that treaty had raised the glory of the country to the highest pitch, so the policy by which it was concluded was as once the most just to other nations, and the most advantageous to our own. In the concluding part of his speech the noble lord had alluded to an atrocious outrage which had been a subject of inquiry yesterday: in common with him, and every other member of that house, he shared the indignation which the noble earl had expressed; but he must add, that he doubted whether the noble earl was right in his conclusion, that there had been no plan in the commission of the outrage. From the evidence their lordships had heard yesterday, he thought there could be no doubt in the mind of any man on that subject. Most of their lordships would recollect a similar atrocious attack which had been made on the Sovereign more than 20 years ago, and a comparison of the circumstances would shew, that design was not less manifest in the attack of yesterday, than in that to which he had alluded. But it was not surprising that the minds of the ignorant were worked up to excesses, when they were daily excited not only to hatred of the Sovereign, but his government, and indeed of every government. This was the effect to be expected from the inflammatory publications circulated among them with a most mischievous industry. These publications were distributed among a people smarting at present with distress, and unfortunately, therefore, fell upon a soil calculated to produce the fruits which had been witnessed. In this respect, the situation of the country required the greatest attention, and he hoped the subject would speedily occupy the fullest consideration of Parliament. He should think himself attempting to impose on the understanding of their lordships were he to hold out any other view than that which he had done with regard to the state of the public mind. In the mean time he rejoiced to state, that, however their lordships might differ on certain questions of policy, he was perfectly satisfied, that they all agreed in venerating the magnificent edifice of the British constitution, which had existed with glory for so many ages; and also, that they were all determined to maintain it.

Earl Grasvenor never rose with greater pain in his life to address their lordships, and that not merely on account of the distress of the country, great as that distress was. Notwithstanding the many thousands who severely felt the difficulties of the times; notwithstanding the sufferings of that important, but now almost extinguished class, the country gentlemen; notwithstanding that almost all, except those who lived by the taxes, were compelled to make the greatest sacrifices; notwithstanding all these considerations, he derived a far more melancholy view from the conviction that Ministers were determined to resist every reasonable suggestion of economy and reform. This conviction gave him far greater alarm than the situation of public affairs, gloomy as that was. It indeed appeared, that if the present objects of Ministers were pursued, and their present principles maintained, their system must terminate in a military despotism. He could foresee no other result. He was fully persuaded that the disaffection complained of by Ministers arose in a great measure from their resistance to all temperate propositions for economy and reform. Their attempts to maintain a war expenditure in peace, and their conduct with respect to the auditing of the civil list, were proofs of their intentions. With regard to the latter subject, it was to be regretted, that their lordships did not take the business into their own hands, rather than leave it with Administration. What had been their conduct during the recess? Their first object ought to have been to alleviate the public distress; and what did they undertake for that purpose? They formed a meeting at the Mansion-house, where every thing was to be arranged according to their own views. He was not sorry that the object of that meeting failed; for charity was afterwards distributed through its proper channels. The conduct of Ministers was also very reprehensible in the answer they advised to the Common Council of London, which appeared to displease them as much on account of its recommendation of the abolition of sinecures, as on account of its reprobating their war system. For these reasons he should give his support to the amendment.

The Earl of Aberdeen observed, that the noble earl who moved the amendment had, in the course of his speech, condemned the late Treaty of Peace concluded at Paris.—That Treaty, however, was the best that could be adopted, either with respect to our own security, or to that system of liberal policy which it was our duty to maintain towards a conquered people. With regard to the economy so much insisted on, he was fully convinced, that every practicable reduction would be made by his Majesty's Ministers. He had no doubt that they would reduce the expense of every department to as low a state as was consistent with the existing situation of the country, or, he might say, with sound policy, though the noble earl had expressed his dislike to that term.

Lord St. John supported the amendment.

Earl Bathurst defended the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers. What they had stated last year was, that they had made reductions in the establishments as low as the circumstances of that year would allow; but they were then far from saying, that these were the only reductions that could be made, or that future years would admit of. He would appeal to their lordships, if this had not been their uniform language; and whether they had not absolutely denied that these were to be the utmost limit to the reductions of the peace establishments. Whether the reductions were made to the utmost extent that they could possibly admit of, would now be a fair subject for the consideration of Parliament. He would not say, that the military establishments could not be actually reduced lower than was now proposed; but, at least, in the opinion of Ministers, they were as low as the actual safety of the country would admit. He would readily allow, that there was nothing in the present Address which bound their lordships to approve of the objects of the war with Nepal. Near the end of the last session, the House had been told, that that war was closed; but in consequence of the refusal of the Chief to sign the treaty which had then been concluded, a renewal of it became necessary on our part, and the praise contained in the Speech was solely intended for the ability and valour with which it had been conducted, and brought to a successful termination; and as to the language in which the praise was conveyed, being nearly the same as that applied to the conduct of a noble personage now present, (Marquis Wellesley) on account of the conclusion of the Mysore war, he did not think that noble person would think his conduct disparaged by the comparison. The noble lord who moved the amendment had spoken of the utter detestation in which the house of Bourbon was held by the people of France; but until he produced some evidence in support of his assertion, their lordships could not admit it to be well founded. The noble earl had then spoken of the nature of the loan which some capitalists of this country were preparing to advance to the French government. He must say, that he knew of no law to prevent the capitalist of this country from making the most beneficial application of his capital, particularly in lending it to a government in a state of amity and alliance with this country. But this loan would not, as the noble earl seemed to imagine, press exclusively on the English money-market: on the contrary, it would be advanced by a variety of capitalists of all nations, without discrimination; and he was most happy to learn, that a very considerable portion of it would come from the monied men of France. He stated this fact with pleasure, as a proof of the consolidation of the French government, and of the consideration and confidence which it enjoyed among its own subjects, as well as affording a pledge that the duration of peace would be lasting. He would not now go back, as had been done by the noble earl, into a consideration of the terms of the peace that had been concluded with France; that peace had already obtained the approbation of the House, and he believed of the country. But if the noble lord thought that the main object of that peace was to maintain the Bourbons on the throne of France, he was completely mistaken. The first object, he would admit, was to give support to that family, as the most likely mode of securing the general peace of Europe: but there was a second object, to secure the fulfilment of the indemnities stipulated in the peace of Paris; and thirdly, to occupy the frontier towns of France, until the left bank of the Rhine was adequately secured by the erection of barriers against the future aggressions of that country; more particularly after the treaty had confirmed its territorial integrity. With respect to the first of these objects, why was it thought desirable? Chiefly because the whole French army had shewed itself radically hostile to the Bourbon family: that army was now disbanded, but if it had been left in full force, there was little doubt but it would have operated to the immediate overthrow of the Bourbon dynasty. The noble earl had next adverted to the spirit of discontent and disaffection which the Address alluded to, as having manifested itself at home; whoever had noticed the systematic attacks that had been made, must have remarked, that they were not directed so much against the Ministers of the Crown, as against the personage who exercised the functions of sovereignty. There was nothing that malignity could invent that had not been assiduously propagated against him; and it would remain for the House to consider what further measures were necessary to counteract such nefarious objects.

The Marquis Wellesley.—In the present arduous circumstances of the country, there remained at least one source of consolation, one advantage for their lordships, that the distress which prevailed had now attained a pitch, of magnitude which could no longer be concealed—which it was no longer in the power of any master of the art of disguise, nor of Hibernian metaphor, to veil or wrap up from the observation of Parliament. It was a distress of the most dreadful magnitude that ever threatened the existence or well-being of any country; and he was bound to express his astonishment, that on an occasion so unexampled in the history of the world, an Address should now be proposed so inadequate to the importance of the crisis, and to that which the wants both of the Crown and the people so imperiously required. Their lordships must all feel the difference of times and of circumstances; they must surely all be convinced that this was not an ordinary occasion, on which Parliament might meet and bandy about complimentary addresses, by praising, on the one hand, the wisdom of Parliament, and on the other, extolling the fortune of Ministers. This was the occasion when the cry of an afflicted people should be faithfully laid at the foot of the throne. And here he must complain, that the meeting of Parliament had been so long postponed, merely for the convenience of Ministers. It was to him a matter of astonishment and regret, that when Ministers had seen those distresses growing up from hour to hour, and from day to day, from which the people implored relief, (hear, hear) Ministers should turn a deaf ear to their complaints; and that when Parliament did meet, such a Speech should be delivered from the throne—a Speech containing no one distinct expression, invoking no one principle for the guidance of Ministers, and offering no one pledge whatever that inquiry should be made into the state of the nation; not calling upon them to examine into all the national bearings, and if the calamity was great, to state it fully and distinctly, not for the purpose of inducing despondency, but with a view fully to state our difficulties, and to meet them with fortitude, together with the principles on which the only relief could be procured. The Address was a mere echo of the Speech from the throne: but the real distinction between it and the amendment proposed by his noble friend was, that the former was a mere respectful capping of mutual compliments between Ministers and the House; while the latter, though far from being disrespectful, contained a plain statement of the difficulties in which the country was involved, and a resolution that Parliament would make a radical inquiry into their nature and amount. The President of the Council (Lord Harrowby) had indeed said, that the amendment of his noble friend was calculated to excite an uncalled for despondency; but all that was wished for was, a declaration that the House would enter into a serious examination of the state of the country, and adopt corresponding principles of public retrenchment. Was this, he would ask, calculated to spread despondency among the people of England? to diminish our dignity in the eyes of our allies? Could we entertain the low and wretched idea, that we could gain any character in Europe by attempts at concealment? (Hear, hear.) How could we parade over the Continent an idea of our dignity and consequence, while it could not fail to be universally known that a real canker was corroding, and would at last consume the vitals of the country? Could our real situation be concealed by means of any boasting disguise? No; it was only by a full inquiry into the state of our resources, and an unsparing retrenchment of all unnecessary expenses, that the Government could acquire any real dignity either abroad or at home. His noble friend had, in the course of his speech, distinctly stated his opinion, that some of the causes of our distresses were of a temporary nature: but it should not be forgotten, that the prosperity of our commerce sprung chiefly from temporary causes during the continuance of the war, and that a total change was produced in the operation of these causes by the return of peace. He would say, indeed, that for some years prior to the peace, both the revenue and the commerce of the country had assumed an inflated and unnatural magnitude, but by this time they were reduced to their natural level. It was a great delusion, therefore, to assert that the causes of our distresses were of a temporary nature, and would be shortly overcome. He would mount up, however, to what appeared to him the grand original causes of all: thinking, as he did, that their lordships had hitherto merely argued on the proximate causes, as if they were the only ones that deserved attention. In this light he had always viewed the paper-currency of the country, though he had always viewed it while in office as a part of the necessary evils arising from the monstrous expenditure occasioned by the war. The original cause of our difficulties was that expenditure: but he did not, therefore, think that the war originally, or in its progress, was unjust or unnecessary. He gloried in the honour, and in all that the country had gained by it, both from the small share which he had had, but especially from the interest he took in a relative whom he felt as dear to him as himself. What was the advantage we had gained by the war? It was in fact a question of life: and if that life were secured, would not the Ministers allow us the means of life in respectability and comfort? Should it be said, that we live, and that is all? Their lordships had been told that at the close of the American war the circumstances of the country were nearly the same as now; but though in close correspondence with many of the distinguished persons of that day, he had no recollection of any degree of despondency prevailing among them. He had always heard a conviction stated, that the vigorous exertions of the Parliament of that day, in enforcing public economy, would speedily relieve the country. But the comparative difference in our expense and burdens should also be taken into account. At that time the country was comparatively young; the long continuance of war had not succeeded in using, if he might so speak, its resources. We should consider also the effect which the war had had on our commerce. It was known that manufactures had in that period sprung up all over Europe. Not only were the governments of different continental states adverse, but also the whole people hostile to our manufactures and commerce. So much was this the case, that we had actually seen some of the people of the friendly state of the Netherlands sacrificing their self-interests and making an auto da fe of our manufactures. Another cause had been the imprudent cession made to France of some of her eastern possessions, by means of which a large portion of the trade of our own settlements now went through that channel, instead of enriching the commerce of this country. The difference, therefore, between the state in which we came out of the American war was strikingly manifest. The doctrine of Ministers was, that the revulsion from a state of war to that of peace was the cause of our distresses; just as if they proceeded, not from war, but from peace. This was completely reversing the old adage, that war was the cause of suffering, and not peace. So much as to the causes, which he did admit were only temporary, and which had also last year been held forth as merely local—local was the favourite word. Local, indeed, they were in the sense of the old line,

Jupiter est quodcumque videt, quocumque movet:
So universal was the calamity. He admitted that the causes of the national distresses were merely temporary, and the exertions of Parliament might make them still more temporary. With this view he should contend, that the military establishments of the country might be greatly reduced: 2dly, he must conceive that it would be endeavouring to propagate a great delusion, to state that the civil establishments of this country did not require revision and reduction. He meant no reflection on the honourable men who now enjoyed such offices. Let them stand forward now, and manfully declare, that they will not be any obstacles in the way of reduction. He would tell such gentlemen, it must be done; the eyes of the whole country were upon them—the eyes of the British public. Would they then adopt the vigorous amendment of his noble friend, instead of the milk-and-water address of the noble lords opposite? The civil establishment should be retrenched with no sparing hand: indeed, one rule should be applied to them all, that nothing, however ancient, should be suffered to exist which was not absolutely necessary for the safety and very being of the country. The circumstances of the times were so altered, that reductions were now requisite that were never even thought of before: and no Minister, however successful in other respects, could be said to deserve well of the nation, who should not recommend the most rigid economy in every branch of the expenditure. This was not a hasty opinion, but one which he had formed after the most earnest deliberation: and so convinced was he of its utility and importance, that to support it, he would sacrifice his health, nay his life, if necessary, provided Parliament could be induced to carry it into effect. (Cries of hear.) It was at a most critical period that Parliament had met: and it was now that their lordships should shew the people that it was not in vain Parliament had been called together as the proper instrument to remove the public grievances. It was now they should shew, on the other hand, how vain were the fears of those who thought that the constitution had not power to sustain itself. For his own part, one great source of his love for the constitution arose from the consideration of a great and incomparable blessing which had appeared to him to have been hitherto inherent in it: he meant, that while we enjoyed greater freedom than any other nation on the earth, and at the same time entertained the most unconquerable aversion to military despotism, or even military influence, yet it had fallen to the lot of this country to make greater exertions, and perform more glorious exploits in war than any other. Such, however, was the elastic vigour of our political system, that by an intrinsic and native spring, we had, even after the most laborious and exhausting wars, returned to the benefits of our free constitution, and the sources of agricultural, commercial, and general welfare had revived, as if by spontaneous energy. Such, hitherto, had ever been the case; such, however, was no longer the case since the last peace. This peace had not brought with it the usual benefits of peace: we were not delivered from that unconstitutional evil, a standing army: the burdensome expenditure of our establishments was not reduced in proportion to our reduced means: the channels of national wealth and prosperity had not been opened. These were the principal topics that occurred to him; and the main object on which he insisted was, that in the present state of the country, it was not merely the duty of Ministers to give a general pledge to be economical "as far as the safety of the empire and sound policy would allow" (large words these, but of little definite meaning): but they should have given a distinct pledge of what they intended to do, and to what extent they thought reduction would have been compatible at once with the safety and the means of the country. Having thus taken a view of the principal features of the Speech, he would refer to two points, which, though of minor importance, ought not to be passed by without some notice. And, first, as to the expedition against Algiers, there was no man with a British heart, who could help rejoicing in the splendid and decisive victory of Lord Exmouth; no man could refuse the warmest praise to the skill and courage with which it had been achieved. For himself, he felt a particular pleasure in that transaction, because it confirmed in his mind the high opinion which he had been induced to form of the gallant Viscount from his services in India. During the whole of his government, he had never met with a more zealous and able coadjutor. He was not, therefore, surprised at the signal triumph of the noble Viscount at Algiers, though he was gratified to see the success of an officer to whose character he felt a personal attachment. He hoped he should be excused for saying these few words in the presence of the noble Viscount, especially as he feared that illness might prevent his attendance when the thanks of the House should be voted to him. (Hear, hear.) As to the war in India it seemed to him to be necessary, as far as he could, from imperfect acquaintance, understand the causes of it: from recollection, however, of the territory of Nepal, he had some doubt whether an undue importance had not been given to that expedition. However this might be, he thought the conduct of the noble lord at the head of that government was marked by integrity and ability, and nothing could be more grateful to his own feelings, than that the noble lord should be more useful to that empire than he himself had been. He came now to that part of the Speech which alluded to the supposed efforts employed to inflame the public mind. It would have been as well if the noble lords had pointed out some of the attempts made to depreciate that Parliament of which those noble lords professed themselves to be such strenuous defenders. The noble lords, it seemed, were great friends to the constitution, and of course great friends to Parliament; indeed they seemed to have shewn their friendship in a way which was the most likely to maintain friendship, according to an old saying, that "friends should meet seldom and part quickly." But what could be thought of these advocates of the constitution, who, at a time of peculiar distress and emergency, suspended that very constitution which they pretend is so essential to our very existence—who, while the sufferings of the people are increasing from day to day, defer, till the very last moment, the assembling of that Parliament which alone can provide remedies for the calamity, or check the discontent that every where prevails? But while he assented to those who insisted that Parliament should have been sooner called together, he thought it necessary to make one observation with respect to those also who in all directions were crying out for parliamentary reform. He would not hesitate to avow an opinion, that whatever the motives of these people might be, their plans all rested on principles which were diametrically opposite to the spirit as well as practice of the constitution. Universal suffrage and annual parliaments were not only unknown in the history of our constitution, but were subversive of its very nature. What! was the House of Commons to be made the mere organ of a democracy? Was this the intention? Had this ever been the practice of our parliamentary system? It was the peculiar character of our constitution, that it contained within it the three great principles of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, blended together so intimately, yet perhaps so inexplicably, except as to the effect, that the Crown had no strength except in connexion with the aristocracy and the people, the aristocracy was nothing except connected with the Crown and the people, and the people were powerless if independent of the Crown and the aristocracy. Was this mysterious union to be dissolved? Was this system, whose strength was its harmony, to lose all its energy by losing the beauty of its proportions? What discord, what confusion, what destruction would then ensue! The very statement of reform, so understood, is revolution. (Hear, hear, from all sides.) Not only do its principles tend to the subversion of our own beautiful fabric, but they would, from their very terms, destroy and extinguish all order, all government. "But what then," said the noble marquis, "do I say, that because these reformers are in error they ought to be silenced? Do I say that your lordships ought to check an Englishman's best privilege—the right of talking and speaking about the constitution of his government? Do I recommend to your lordships to employ coercion to repress the mistakes of opinion? Oh, no! my lords. (Hear, hear.) Your lordships assemble here for better and nobler purposes. Do not invest yourselves in the solemn robes of judges: still less, my lords, assume the austere office of punishers of the people's errors: but exercise as you ought the grander and more constitutional functions of hearing, considering, redressing the people's wrongs. Such, my lords, is my view of the constitution (cries of hear); and I trust I may say, that no man can be a stancher friend to it than I am. I was born under the influence of this glorious constitution: I was educated in its principles: to it I owe almost every thing: no man owes more to it than I do; no family owes more to it than mine. I have therefore reason to love and admire it, and I would gladly lay down my life to support it. Defendi rempublicam adolescens, non deseram senex. (Hear, hear.) These are the principles by which I am prepared to abide. I would give the public every practicable relief; I admire their fortitude, I compassionate their sufferings; and I call upon this House, as in duty bound, to make every possible sacrifice for their benefit: I would spend my health, my time, my life, in recommending to your lordships every mode of retrenchment and economy; but I would never give up my constitutional principles: by those principles I will stand or fall. (Hear, hear.) The noble marquis concluded by supporting the amendment.

Lord Sidmouth should have thought, if the noble marquis had not declared to the contrary, that he desponded of the state of the country, for he certainly never heard a speech more calculated to excite despondency. If the distresses were indeed permanent, what remedy could be found for them? All inquiry was useless where the calamity was without cure. The noble marquis considered the Address as inadequate to the emergency of the times. Now if he, as a party concerned in the wording of that Address, could be supposed to divest himself of a natural partiality, he would say, that he considered the Speech as one immediately adapted to the occasion. Its peculiar merit lay in its candour and explicitness. The nature of the distress was not disguised, and his Royal Highness was advised to state, that every mode of retrenchment would be adopted that was compatible with safety and sound policy. Was there any thing wrong in this? Was sound policy to be banished from the British councils? What expenses could be reduced would be for the future consideration of their lordships. Government did not present any plan, but left it to the determination of Parliament. He could not help thinking, that the noble marquis had not given a due regard to the statement of the noble earl (Harrowby) with respect to the conclusion of the American war. He (Lord S.) recollected a great and illustrious person, who succeeded to office after Lord North, and who expressed his astonishment at the dreadful state of the country as infinitely worse than he had expected. Then there was no sinking fund; and there was, moreover, a deficiency of three millions in the revenue. Whereas, now (with all our distresses) there was a reduction of eighteen millions of taxes, which was two millions more than the amount of the whole taxes before the war. Distress was as general after the American war as now, and manufactures were as much depressed. Indeed the manufactures now were beginning to revive: there was considerable activity at Manchester and Glasgow. There was also an increasing demand for our mineral productions, and for the copper of Cornwall. He did not mean to say that this revival was very extensive, but it was enough to avert ruin. As to the causes of these distresses, he would not now touch upon them any further than to say, that the causes were not one or two, but a rare and extraordinary combination. He believed that the noble marquis was mistaken in supposing that our manufactures stood in any danger from the rivalry of foreign workmen:

the fact was, that foreigners had not money to pay for our articles : what surplus money they had was applied to repairing the ravages of war. What farther could he say ? The Speech had given the assurance that retrenchment had been already set on foot ; and Parliament was encouraged to enter upon an inquiry immediately. As to the military expenditure, it was fit he should state, that he did not think the amount was more than enough for the necessary demand for the purposes of the garrisons, dock-yards, and public peace. Indeed the army was reduced lower than it ought to be, or would have been, but for the deficient state of the finances. And as to the reductions already made, he had advised them with reluctance, because they at once augmented the public distresses, and the discontent which was the consequence of those distresses. In some respects, indeed, the evil was aggravated to others besides the poor sufferers : for the list of paupers was swelled by those discarded heroes, and of course the poor rates were every where more burdensome. With respect to the allusion in the latter part of the Speech, he could not think the Regent was ill-advised in stating a fact which was notorious to every body. It was fit, however, that he (Lord S.) should state to their lordships, that he should, on Friday next, have a communication to make to the House from the Prince, when their lordships would be able to inquire into the circumstances which had induced his Majesty's Ministers to express themselves as they had done. The noble viscount then contrasted the state of the country with what it would have been if Buonaparte had still been on the throne, where, he said, the Opposition would have let him remain : we should have had an armed peace followed by expensive and ruinous war.

Lord Darnley thought the Speech from the Throne was not adapted to the real state of the country ; nor such as the public had a right to expect under their difficulties. He could have hoped that the Ministers of the Crown would have advised the Prince Regent to imitate the magnanimous example of Queen Anne, who sacrificed the means appropriated to the splendour of the throne to the welfare of her people. Had this advice been recommended and adopted, he was quite certain that the outrage committed on the royal carriage would never have been committed. He for one entertained no feelings of despondency, but it was his firm belief, that the only hope of rescuing the country from its present peril was founded on a determination on the part of Parliament to do its duty.

The question was then put, and the Amendment being negatived without a division, the Address was agreed to, and ordered to be presented by the whole House.

Addresses were then voted to the Prince Regent, to the Queen, and to the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, on the marriage of the two latter.

The Earl of Shaftesbury was appointed Chairman of the Committees of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, January 29.

The House met at half past one, and agreed to a message to the Lords, desiring that the circumstance of sending a message by their Lordships' clerks, should not be drawn into precedent. At half past two the House adjourned to five o'clock, and the SPEAKER, attended by several Members, went to Carlton House with the Address voted yesterday.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] On the resumption of the House, Lord Cochrane stated that he had various petitions to present, including one from Bristol signed by 20,700 persons, complaining of various grievances, and praying for Reform. His lordship complained that petitions of this sort were interrupted in the reading by coughing and clamour, and that they were sometimes read by the clerk in an indistinct and inaudible voice. There was no tumult at Bristol, except what had been occasioned by a police officer. At the meeting in Spa-fields, a set of people came from the Old Bailey, who had seen a man hanged there that morning. The others who were said to be disorderly were starving sailors, who had fought the battles of their country under Lord Nelson, Lord St. Vincent, and others, who were now disbanded. After these observations, which were made at intervals, his lordship having repeatedly been called to order by the Speaker and others, he presented the petition from the Bristol Meeting, which was read by the Clerk. Mr. Protheroe and Mr. Davis (Members for Bristol) asserted, that the petition did not speak the sentiments of their constituents. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, though far from approving of the language of the petition, saw no reason for departing from the usual practice of the House with regard to it. The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane then presented a petition from Saddleworth, in Yorkshire, which stated, among other matters, that the House did not in any constitutional or rational sense represent the nation ; and, by its inadequacy of representation and corruptions, subverted the principles of the constitution. It complained of enormous taxation, and observed that the cause of the war in 1793 was well understood, though possibly its contrivers did not originally intend its evils to extend to such a magnitude and duration. Now the eyes of the people were opening, and our wicked rulers saw it. They were shocked at the proceedings of contending factions, who were alike forgetful of the nation's interests, in their party views, and their repeated, protracted, and disgusting debates. They saw nothing in their discussions, except that the lash of unconstitutional taxation was to be kept applied to the poor. Taxation and representation ought to go hand in hand. There was no way to prevent the establishment of despotism but by having a free Parliament. Through the conduct of the boroughmongers the people could not pay for taxes. They prayed for a law to give the aggrieved people their rights of equal representation and annual Parliaments, which they should exert every constitutional means to obtain. This petition gave rise to a long discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Attorney-General, Mr. Canning, and Mr. B. Bathurst, considered it as a studied insult to the House, and contended that it ought to be rejected. Mr. Brougham, Mr. C. Wynne, Mr. Brand, Mr. Lambe, and Mr. F. Douglas, disapproved of the language and several of the doctrines in the petition, but thought it should be received. On a division, it was rejected by 135 to 48.

Lord Cochrane then presented a similar petition from another town in Yorkshire, to the reception of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer objected. Lord Cochrane, as an instance of the truth of the petition, with regard to the sale of seats in Parliament, stated the way in which he was first returned. He went to Honiton, with plenty of Spanish money. The bellman of the town went about ringing his bell, and calling upon the electors to come forward, and receive each 10*l.* They were invited to call upon Mr. Townshend, at his bank, which they did, obtained their money, and then he was elected: with the same facility might have been returned Lord Camelford's black servant, or his dog.

Mr. Canning suggested to the noble lord to withdraw the petition for amendment, with which suggestion he complied.

Two petitions were presented from Ashton-under-Line: one was admitted and the other rejected. Two petitions from Oldham were disposed of in a similar way. A second petition from Saddleworth, couched in similar terms to those of the first, was rejected.

THE REGENT'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The Speaker reported to the House the Answer of the Prince Regent to the joint Address of both Houses, on the subject of the late outrage, (see page 30.) and the same was ordered to be entered on the Journals.

PRIVILEGE.] Mr. C. W. Wynne, called the attention of the House to a departure from the usual forms observed in conferences between the two Houses, in the treatment of the Managers of the House of Commons yesterday. It had been the constant practice in conferences between the two Houses in the painted Chamber, for the Managers for the Lords to sit on one side of a table, and the Managers for the Commons to stand on the other side. But during the late conference the Managers for the House of Commons had observed the seats of the Lords elevated one step above what they were before, the Managers for the Commons were kept on the outside of the bar. He alluded also to the departure from the ancient usage with respect to the delivery of the Message. He had no doubt that this want of the usual accommodations for the Managers for the Commons had arisen from some mistake inadvertently committed by the Officers of the Board of Works: but it would be for the House to adopt such measures as they might deem most advisable to prevent this departure from usage from being drawn into precedent.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was sure, that what had taken place had not originated in any feeling of disrespect towards the House. The suddenness of the occasion, and some alterations which had lately been made in the Painted Chamber, were very probably the cause of the irregularity.

The Speaker stated, that it was now 150 years since the details of the forms to be observed in the managing of Conferences between the two Houses had been settled, and these forms had been observed ever since. It would not be amiss, were the House to send a Message to the House of Lords, desiring them to give orders that the same accommodations should be afforded to the Managers appointed by the House, which they had formerly enjoyed; and to replace things on their former footing.

Mr. C. W. Wynne observed, if the Managers had been in the slightest degree of ill humour, they might have also noticed another circumstance respecting this conference, when they repaired to the Painted Chamber: some of his Majesty's Ministers in this house, who were among the deputation, waited a long time before any of the lords made their appearance. He had no doubt, however, that this inattention was occasioned solely by accident.

Mr. W. Smith observed, if the Managers had been in the slightest degree of ill-humour, they might have also observed on the time they had been kept waiting at the door.

Mr. C. W. Wynne said, he should have conceived it his duty on an ordinary occasion to have withdrawn immediately, but as the circumstance was so unexpected, he thought it better to follow the course they had adopted, and afterwards to submit a motion to the House on the subject.

Lord Stanley was behind the bar of the House of Lords, when the question of the Address was discussed by their lordships: and he could assure the House, that when the Lords knew that the Commons were attending, they walked out immediately to meet them. He had also heard that their lordships waited a considerable time for the Masters in Chancery, who were not in attendance, in order to send the message by them; but the Lords were at last compelled, from the urgency of the occasion, and not from any disrespect to the Commons, to send it by their clerks.

The Speaker said it would be the more consistent course, after what had passed, to refer to the sessional order regulating the form of proceeding in conferences.

The usual sessional orders were then read from the chair, and were severally re-voted.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.] Mr. Canning moved the resumption of the adjourned debate on the Address in answer to the Speech of the Prince Regent.

Mr. Curwen said, he should have been happy to have had it in his power to concur in the Address, for at such a moment, and in the situation in which the country was placed, it was by no means his wish to add to the embarrassment of his Majesty's Ministers; but many parts of the Address were extremely objectionable, and they were the more so when the conduct of Ministers during last Session was taken into consideration. They had held out hopes of economy which were hailed in every quarter of the country, but how had they fulfilled their promises? Never but when they were forced by the House. had they adopted one single measure of economy or retrenchment. Without breaking faith with the national creditor, he was afraid it would be found impossible to relieve the country from any of those burdens which now pressed so severely on it. The attention of the country was now anxiously fixed on the House, as their only hope; but all that the House could do, would be far from what the country expected from them. But to bring the country to bear its burdens, it was necessary that they should look into its situation. He was aware that this would be called by some, holding desponding language; but those were the chief promoters of despondency in this country, who kept back from it the state of its real situation. They had been told that there would be no necessity for recurring to new taxes; but was there one man in the country who looked on that as any consolation? (Hear, hear.) Ministers had been frustrated in their attempts to burden the country with the Income Tax; but did they not know that if they had succeeded in their plan they would have been put into the dilemma, that it would have been utterly impossible to have collected it? He dared any of them to contradict this; but he knew it was impossible for them to contradict it. He would venture to say too, that it would not be denied that the revenue, however deficient this year, would not be more deficient in the year to come. The share of the Property Tax falling on land was taken at 4,000,000l.; but admitting the real property of the country to amount to 35,000,000l. a year for the last 12 months, he would take upon him to say, that 8,000,000l. had not been received. The country felt it impossible to support itself under the load of Taxes which pressed upon it. When Ministers said our distress was only what took place at the close of every war, they did not give a fair representation of the case. At the close of other wars the burdens were comparatively moderate, and the recovery easy; but now the country was not merely weighed down by the enormous amount of the public burdens, but the Poor's Rates had also risen from 2 to 8,000,000l. There was no man who believed more than he in the energy and intelligence of the country; but they could not surmount impossibilities. The Tenantry, from the highest to the lowest, were distressed to the utmost. There was not less due from the Tenants to the Proprietors than a whole year's rent of the land of the country; and it was impossible to extract this from them without breaking up our agriculture. The distresses of the country forced all ranks to an economy which kept down whatever enabled the Tenant to pay his rent. Money was not to be had unless on usurious terms, and there was no course left but retrenchment. All the Taxes, Assessed, Customs, and Excise, suffered from this; and next year they would be worse than they were in the present.—The House ought to look into the situation of the country. He was convinced that it was impossible for them to relieve the nation from any burdens, however oppressive to it. It was a painful duty to say this to the people, but the neglect of it would bring us into a situation which would render all remedy impossible. It might be said "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" but the acting on that maxim last year, had already cost the country dear. The view which Ministers gave of our situation was calculated to deceive. It was deceiving us to talk of a deficiency of three millions. If this were all, would this proud country have cause to be disheartened? No: last year the deficiency of the Revenue, compared with the Expenditure, was 17 millions, and this year it would be twenty millions, if the establishment stood as it did last year. It would be a fearful task for Ministers to cut down the establishments, so as to bring them within our income. To talk of issuing Exchequer bills on one hand, while we were liquidating the debt on the other, was a mere mockery. It was not the deficiency of our taxes of which he was afraid, but the enormous excess of our establishments beyond our income. The country would take it better at their hands fairly to state its situation; for nothing would reconcile it to bear its burdens, but shewing the utter impossibility of dispensing with them. What were the subscriptions in aid of the distress of the people, but a drop of water to the ocean? On this subject his Majesty's Ministers had much to answer for. The moment the kingdom was in a state to call for subscriptions, why was not Parliament assembled?—What was 300,000l. compared to the distress which existed? This sum sounded large, but it would not pay the wages of labour for six hours. Were his Majesty's Ministers aware of the magnitude of this machine? It was impossible for any thing in the way of subscription to alleviate the distress.—He reprobated very severely that part of the Speech from the throne which cast unfounded imputations on the people of England, of a desire to subvert the constitution. He had himself had the best means of judging of the disposition of the suffering classes, and he could bear testimony to their patient and unequalled endurance of the many calamities by which they were visited. Much as he had before esteemed the people of England, they had of late become objects of his enthusiastic admiration. (Hear.) That a few might have been misled, he did not pretend to deny; but he did deny most strenuously, that the demagogues of Spafields, who had not themselves intelligence enough to distinguish between right and wrong, or between truth and falsehood, could blind the great proportion of the people, and mislead them to their desperate enterprises. This tribute was due to the good sense of the lower classes, and to the present improved state of their knowledge. Upon the important question of Parliamentary Reform, he had always entertained but one opinion; and the words of Mr. Pitt, at the conclusion of the American war, seemed almost prophetic—"That we could neither have indemnity for the past, nor security for the future, without it." While the people were smarting under present distresses, their language might not always be temperate, but their conduct would always be loyal; and they had too much love for the Crown, and for the benefits they enjoyed under it, to wish for a moment to adopt any of the wild schemes of a few infatuated individuals. Their love did not depend upon the individual whose brow it circled; but if the Prince Regent had been anxious to make himself popular, he ought to have set the example of retrenchment, and to have abridged himself of a few of his luxuries, that his people might not be deprived of the absolute necessities of life. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Banks could not be easily persuaded, that any delusion had been attempted in the Speech from the throne in the prospects it held out: the hon. gentleman who spoke last had failed in establishing this charge; while, on the other hand, he had indulged in a strain of despondency quite as fallacious. The difference was, that the Speech represented the distresses as temporary, while the hon. gent. contended that they were permanent and invincible: such gloomy predictions had, however, already been shewn to be void of foundation. The Speech spoke of a deficiency in the revenue, and recommended inquiries into the income and expenditure of the country; while its opponents took to a subtle distinction, and when a committee was recommended in the terms of the Speech, insisted that the object of its inquiry ought to be the state of the nation. Whatever ingenious distinction might be made out between the two propositions, they came in fact to the same thing, and the dispute only was upon words; for the distresses of the nation arose out of its expenditure, and would be relieved by its diminution. It appeared, therefore, that the principal object of the amendment was to ascertain with precision, in the first instance, who were likely to support one side of questions of this kind, and who the other. (Hear, hear.) For his own part, he thought the difference so trifling and frivolous, that he should vote in favour of the Address. He approved highly of the proposed committee, and he trusted that it would be formed of such men as would attend to their duties sedulously; and, without excluding men in office, he would have a fair mixture of both sides of the house. He admitted that no general disaffection prevailed out of doors; the Speech spoke of no such disposition; but it was certain, that there was abroad a working spirit of disorganization, which had for its object the destruction of all that was valuable and sacred. Was not this to be suppressed? (Hear, hear.) Was it not fit to attempt to cure the disease; or, if the infection were too deep and radical, ought not the ulcerous and cancerous parts to be cut off for the security of the rest of the body? (Hear, hear.) A right hon. member had found out, on the sudden, that there was no sinking fund,—that it was all a mockery; but this was no novelty in his mode of stating it; for it would be admitted on all hands, that while the sinking fund was operating on the one hand, the national debt was increasing by annual loans on the other, in order to equalize the income and expenditure of the country. Surely it was some consolation to be informed, that no new taxes were to be imposed, and when gentlemen talked of the necessity of removing some of those that existed, they should recollect that to take off taxes was not always to relieve, as had been proved last year, when 17 millions were removed. This he would say, and boldly, that at the present moment, the country laboured neither under debt nor taxation, (hear, hear, hear.) for the true causes of distress were far different. He hoped that the establishments for the present year had been calculated upon the lowest possible scale: between a million and a million and a half might have been saved last year, and ought not certainly to be neglected this year.—Much had been said out of doors upon the subject of sinecures, and undoubtedly they ought, as far as possible, to be abolished; he had always said so in times of prosperity and adversity; but if it were imagined that their destruction would be attended with any important relief, it was a gross delusion: the main and only effectual saving was to be made in the establishments. All the petitions from the country would be unanimous on this point, and it would be the duty of Parliament to watch narrowly every disbursement. On the whole view of affairs, he was convinced that the result would be a happy recovery from all our calamities, and that at an earlier period than even the most sanguine now dared to hope.

Mr. Brougham was also an enemy to all delusion, and to prevent that delusion, seconded by the influence of the hon. gentleman, and more importantly by the vote of this night, he now offered himself to the attention of the House. A speech more calculated to mislead, to blind the eyes of the people, and to flatter them with vain illusions of all kinds, than that just delivered, had never been heard in Parliament, even from Ministers themselves. (Hear, hear.) Coming, however, as it did from a neutral quarter, from a gentleman who alternately lent his support to both sides, who made such unbounded professions of impartiality, who opposed Government on questions where his resistance was of no consequence, and who thus had established a reputation for candour and rectitude, it was of the utmost importance that the antidote should be taken with the poison.—

(Hear, hear, and laughter.) To begin with his strongest point, that the American war was to be considered as the standard, and that we were to measure by it our distresses, and the prospect of our recovery: it was said, that the transition (for that had now become the fashionable term) from war to peace, was the source of the national miseries, and that that transition was equally injurious after the American war. It was no doubt true, that at that period there was a considerable depression, more particularly of the agricultural interests; but when correctly examined, the facts supplied even a contrast to our present situation. In the first place, the distresses began before the termination of the American war, and, instead of being augmented after peace, they were gradually alleviated by it; and in the third year after its establishment, (the period parallel with our present situation), Mr. Pitt put into the mouth of the Sovereign, these consolatory expressions—that his Majesty heartily congratulated the country upon the extension of its commerce, the flourishing state of its manufactures, and the amount of its revenues.

(Hear, hear.) Could any such language now be employed: on the contrary, did not our calamities begin with the peace, and had they not augmented in a proportion for which authentic history afforded no precedent? (Hear, hear.) What were the measures of Mr. Pitt, and was not the contrast there equally striking? Instead of taking off 17 millions of taxes, he imposed new ones; and the first year after the peace, the country was able to pay nearly two millions more than had been raised during any year of the war. The Speech from the throne now congratulated the House that no new taxes would be necessary: a mighty subject of congratulation. Only one other word was required, viz. not only that it would not be necessary to impose new taxes, but that it would not be possible to raise them. The right hon. gentlemen on the other side might amuse themselves as they would with vain speculations—they might disport themselves as they pleased in the flowery fields of imagination—they might spend their time in devising new colonial schemes, in maintaining additional military establishments, with all the varieties of dress that fancy could picture; but there was one point upon which they could not touch, one pale within which they dared not tread, and that was additional taxation; for the people had now paid to their utmost farthing, and were equally destitute of money and of hope. (Hear, hear.) This conviction had been pressed upon the minds of Ministers, since the year 1809; and Mr. Perceval, who was anxious to follow the steps of Mr. Pitt as far as possible, there found an insurmountable barrier to his progress, and was compelled to resort to Exchequer bills, loans from the Bank, and all kinds of expedients, because he found by the returns that he had provided to the utmost limit of taxation. Another word would still more plainly exemplify the difference of our situation now and in 1792. During the American war the whole amount of taxes did not exceed four millions, while during the last war the permanent taxes were more than 35 millions annually, and war taxes were besides imposed to the amount of not less than 26 millions a year. Was not this a frightful contrast? and was not any man guilty of a gross, of a wicked delusion, who told the groaning people that they were not burdened; that the national debt was nothing; that taxation was nothing; that the pressure was merely temporary, and that relief would be more speedy than even the most sanguine dared to hope? Were not these insults almost as difficult to be endured as the miseries to which they were exposed. (Hear.) The hon. gentleman who spoke last, was much in favour of the committee to be selected by Ministers, against which he (Mr. Brougham) protested most firmly, since he was convinced that it would be converted into a fresh instrument of delusion. Ministers had nothing to do but to choose their old tried friends, to call for accounts that contained no information, and witnesses who gave less, and near the end of the session to produce a report, which there was no time either to examine or debate. It was the duty of the House to proceed with the utmost dispatch: for while it was delaying, the nation was suffering. It was easy to see how the committee would be formed, if the house did not take care that individuals should be placed upon it who were not merely the tools of Government, but men who were known and esteemed for their honest, uncompromising, unflinching discharge of the duties cast upon them as representatives of the people: men of upright and straight forward integrity; and not those, who, under pretences of silly delicacy, were pursuing a system of shifting policy; and, under the appearance of impartiality, were employed in throwing in the way of justice, artful and advocate like objections. (Hear, hear, hear.) In order, at all events, to prevent procrastination, and that the whole substance of the report might not be smothered in a mass of unimportant papers, he should suggest, that a peremptory order ought to be given to the committee, on the very day when they had come to a decision upon a single point, it should be reposed to the House, for their consideration. (Hear, hear.) A committee so constituted might be productive of benefit. It appeared to him, that a great omission had been made in the Speech from the throne; for, although many unimportant topics were introduced, not a word was said respecting any arrangement with foreign powers, for the improvement and extension of our commerce, which was quite as severely oppressed as our agriculture or manufactures. If a territory had been occupied in opposition to the wishes of its inhabitants; if a new government had been forced upon a nation, or an abolished dynasty restored in spite of resistance by those who had a right to make it, it was sure to find a place in the Speech from the throne; troops were sent out, subsidies provided, and ambassadors appointed to proceed to those countries. (Hear, hear, hear.) But any thing substantially to benefit the nation, to extend her sinking commerce, and find a vent for her manufactures, was disregarded as unworthy of notice, and as inconsistent with the dignity of a great nation. Had the continental markets been opened since the peace? On the contrary, they were more closely guarded than ever: the continental system had been perfected; what Buonaparte had been unable to accomplish, the Bourbons had effected, with this important additional circumstance against us, that it now received the approbation of people which Buonaparte had never been able to procure. One hon. gentleman had often introduced into his speech, the pleasing word retrenchment, but he had pointed out no mode in which it was to be attained; and another hon. gentleman, from the same side (Mr. C. Grant), in a speech where the commonplaces of argument vied with the commonplaces of rhetoric, had contended that retrenchment was impossible, while our colonial possessions were so numerous and extended. This, however, was not an excuse, it was an aggravation; every peace had increased our burdens; besides what we before possessed, we had now Malta, the Ionian Islands, St. Lucia, and the Dutch colonies; and in what way did any of them contribute to the revenues? Parliament ought to teach Ministers, that in these times such unnecessary incumbrances ought to be given to those who would be glad to take them, and would grant us, as an equivalent, competent mercantile advantages.—Having detained the House thus long, it remained for him only to express his satisfaction that the people of England had been vindicated from the foul charges launched against them: a whole people ought not to be judged and condemned for the misguided violence of a few individuals. He had heard with indignation in the preceding debate, from an hon. member, that, in his opinion, it was dangerous to collect the people to discuss subjects above their comprehension; the sentiment had been warmly applauded by the side of the house from which it came; he apprehended, however, that it was a new doctrine to assert, that the people are below the comprehension of what relates to their rights, their grievances, and their sufferings; and from whom did it proceed? From whom, but those wholesale dealers in popular clamour, and in the basest applauses, flowing from the worst passions. (Hear, hear.) From whom, but from the very men who had canted the people of England, in 1784, about chartered rights, and 1807, made them parties in a theological dispute. (Hear, hear, hear.) These were the men who now declared that the people ought not to meet to vindicate the infringement of their rights, because those rights were above their comprehension. He trusted that the House would mark with becoming indignation, this unmerited aspersion, unless indeed, it were so consummately absurd, as to deserve nothing but silent contempt. (Continued cheers.) In conclusion, the hon. member denied that Parliamentary Reform would be a panacea for all diseases, since the great mass of present distress was occasioned by the enormous load of taxation that pressed upon the people.—He hoped that the committee would speedily and anxiously examine the whole subject, and that if it came to the alternative of retrenchment, or national bankruptcy, they would not resort to the last, until they had given a full trial to the first.

Mr. Canning, for himself and his colleagues, put in his claim not to be deemed less alive to the distresses and the perils of the country than honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House. The task of Ministers on the opening of the war, when they had to arm a nation against a continent, was important indeed: not less important was their duty, when having won their way to national safety, they were compelled to gain to renew the struggle: but, if possible, more momentary was the present crisis of domestic danger, when the question was whether the House should or should not lay at the foot of the throne a unanimous expression of a determination to stand by it, and to use every exertion in its support. (Hear, hear.) What was it that prevented this unanimity? Doubtless in the proposed Address there was some expression in which they could not concur without a violation of a sacred pledge to their constituents and their consciences. Were it otherwise, in the present distracted state of the country, when unanimity was of so much importance, and when dissent might be so unfairly misconstrued, they would be most anxious to unite. Nothing but an imperious sense of duty could restrain them from joining in an unfeigned expression of affection and loyalty. But was this the fact? Far from it; for all the mighty difference between the two sides of the House was, that the Address, in the words of the Speech, promised to institute an inquiry into the income and expenditure of the country, while the honourable gentleman thought it better that it should be named a committee on the state of the nation. For this trifling difference the kingdom was to be exposed to the danger that might arise from a misconstruction of the purpose of division. (Hear, hear.) The honourable and learned gentleman, (Brougham) had spoken in terms of the utmost indignation, of a speech delivered by an honourable gentleman, (Baikes,) which the most fastidious would applaud as fair and impartial (hear and laughter): that honourable gentleman did not attach himself to any party: and in theory, therefore, must be considered the perfect model of a representative. (Hear, and laughter.) He had, notwithstanding, been reviled as a man who dared not avow his real sentiments more than those who had actually enlisted themselves under the banners of the Ministry (hear, hear): at least, this treatment was most unjust; for no man could be more sensible of the hardship of the times, or more anxious to relieve them: in this feeling he (Mr. Canning) and his friends cordially participated; nor could he discern any reason why their opponents should exclusively attribute to themselves all sympathy with distress, because they held that none but themselves were competent to afford a remedy. In his opinion some of the causes were beyond human control or remedy. Most anxiously and laboriously had Ministers devoted themselves to the agricultural part of the subject, but without effect; for as soon as a remedy had been pointed out, some insuperable objection had been discovered to it. The honourable and learned gentleman qualified the opinion of one of his friends, that taxation was the radical and sole cause of distress: and he (Mr. Canning) had been led to expect that he would do so, from a pamphlet circulated by him about seven months ago, to which allusion might be made, in which taxation was enumerated only as one of thirteen causes of the existing calamities: it was also there stated, that many were of a temporary nature; and the writer went on to observe, that "he should not be at all surprised if things grew worse before they grew better." This statement in the pamphlet of the honourable and learned gentleman made it a little singular that he should this night have declared his astonishment at the alarming progress which affairs had made from bad to worse. But did not Ministers at all participate in this regret for the present calamities, and had they recently done nothing towards alleviation? This was not the fit occasion for entering into details; but this he would say, that in making a fresh reduction of the military establishment, they had been guided by one principle only, and that was the principle of safety. It was true that colonies had their price, and when the force stationed in them was diminished, the value of the contingent loss of the colony could be ascertained; but of the safety of the country there could be no price, and all hazard ought most carefully to be avoided: above all, in a moment like the present, the remotest possibility of loss was carefully to be guarded against. (Hear, hear.) Having, therefore, carried the reduction as low as possible, consistently with that principle, Ministers were nevertheless prepared to propose the vote of their estimates only for a limited time, revisable in the present session of parliament; and on inspection of them, he was sure that the House would think, that Ministers had gone to the utmost extent in the way of reduction. Having stated thus much, he wished to make a few further observations, upon the arguments used in opposition to the Address; and first, as to what had been said of the American war, with regard to which it had been most singularly and ingeniously contended, that the addition of taxes at its close was a proof of prosperity. It was a fact, that at the termination of the last war, the people had been relieved from taxes to a large amount—no matter for this part of the argument, in what way that reduction had been effected (hear, hear): he would repeat, that for this part of the argument, it was of no consequence in what way the reduction had been brought about, whether by the wish of Ministers, or by the compulsion of Parliament. (Hear, hear, hear.) The fact was, that the reduction had taken place, and the difference between the close of the American war and of the last war was, that after the former new taxes were imposed, and after the latter the burdens of the nation were considerably lightened. In the very first year of the conclusion of war, we had repealed 18 millions of taxes, and now, in the year following, no additional burdens were proposed. It was true, that the state of the country demanded the most anxious investigation, it was equally true that this investigation was recommended from the throne, and that his Majesty's Government was animated by a sincere desire to reduce the expenditure within the limits of the revenue. The honourable and learned gentleman, as well as the right hon. gent. who had moved the amendment, occasionally threw out a verbum ardens, which they afterwards thought proper to qualify; and so it was, he apprehended, with the desire expressed by the honourable and learned gentleman, that the committee for inquiry into the public expenditure should report their proceedings from time to time. A great deal of fault had been found with that part of the Address which referred to the feelings of the people: it had been said, that it accused the people generally of disloyalty. On the contrary we must contend, that if ever pains had been taken to set forth an explicit meaning, to avoid unfair reflections, and to distinguish between the deluders and the deluded, it was in the present Address. The people at large were praised for their patience and fortitude under the pressure of great public distress: but it was at the same time notorious, that endeavours had been made to inoculate upon their dispositions a spirit of violence and insurrection. (Hear, hear.) The honourable and learned gentleman had asked, were those who assembled to petition the legislature to be treated as insurgents? Certainly not. But did those who professed that purpose always adhere strictly to the execution of it? He had heard of a meeting in Spafelds called for the purpose of petitioning; but he had also heard of a waggon loaded with ammunition that was there also, and to him this appeared no necessary appendage to a petition for parliamentary reform. For himself, he could truly say, that he blamed not the innocent men who attended these meetings, and listened to the harangues which were there addressed to their prejudices and passions, but those who, with perverted heads and hard hearts, could retire to their homes, where they felt no suffering, and leave behind them a drenched and starving auditory, before whom they had laboured to stimulate rebellion as a duty, and to execute charity as a crime. (Hear, hear.) Those only were stigmatised by the Address whose doctrines were subversive of all law and order, hostile to all tranquillity, and to every establishment. An honourable gentleman, (Mr. Lambe), who never spoke without making a deep impression by his eloquence and ability, had truly observed, that in calling for reduction and retrenchment, it was not to be supposed that they were calling for an unmixed good. Reduction could not take place, without throwing many individuals on the world, or without sending back sons who had been enabled to provide for themselves, to become burdens on their parents. He stated this not as an argument against reduction, but as a frank avowal, that in cutting deep he could not but feel severely. He could not shut his heart any more than his ears to the cries of poverty and disappointment: he was free to confess himself to this extent an unwilling reformer. But the necessities of the times admitted of no alternative: reduction must take place. The honourable and learned gentleman had intimated, that greater benefits might have been derived from the peace by making our military preponderance subservient to the assertion of commercial advantages. He was surprised that the honourable and learned gentleman, who had the character of looking at these questions with a statesman's eye, should have expressed such an opinion, because he believed no man would be louder than he would be in reprobating the principle of sacrificing to a commercial object, either national glory in war, or national security in peace. The great object of peace was security; a secure peace was itself the parent of commerce; and was it likely, if that point were attained, that the industry, the active enterprise, and the accumulated capital of this country would be far behind? Did it become an enlightened professor of political economy to suppose that a transition, however violent, in the political state of a nation, can long arrest the progress of improvement in a free and great community? Having thus cursorily glanced at some of the topics introduced into the debate, he felt it his duty to take notice of the observation made by the hon. gentleman who spoke first that night, as to a desire for parliamentary reform prevailing among the great body of the people. He should have been glad to have avoided all allusion to this subject, as an hon. baronet, (Sir F. Burdett) had given notice of his intention to bring it formally under the consideration of the House; but whenever the question should be agitated, he was prepared to meet it—not with any objection founded upon inconvenience, not with any suggestions of partial or temporary modifications, but should be prepared to oppose the remedy by a direct denial of the grievance. (Hear, hear.) He denied that that House was not, to all useful purposes, an adequate representation of the people. He denied that there was in the history of this country any practice, or any theory, which could give a sanction to the doctrines of universal suffrage and annual parliaments. Speculative men might invent systems that had greater plausibility about them; nor would he assert that our own existing system would serve as a basis to any other country which was in want of a new constitution; but it had grown up here with the growth of the nation, in strength, prosperity, and renown; it had adapted itself to all their institutions, their habits, and their wants. It was good for every practical object, unless it was intended not to exercise the deliberative faculty, but to represent the express volition of the people. Whenever its character should be so changed, and instead of the deliberative guardian of popular rights, it should be transformed into the mere agent of popular will, there might be some kind of constitution, some untried being, watered with blood, and flourishing to destruction; but from that moment the British constitution was gone. (Hear, hear, hear.) Against all such theories he was determined to take his stand. (Hear, hear.) He warned those who listened to these doctrines, that those who set the stone rolling were not always able to control its impetus. The hon. and learned gentleman had called them wild and visionary reformers, but they were in fact the masters of the hon. and learned gentleman, and of all those who called themselves moderate reformers; they made use of them as far as they suited their purposes, and treated their counsels, when they did not, with contumely and scorn. They well knew what they were contending for, and how far they would choose to go, although, God willing, care should be taken to prevent them. Who could believe that the wish of such persons was merely that the House of Commons should do its duty better, when there was not one act which they were ever heard to approve, and when they were known at all times to describe the last twenty years as a continued period of calamity and disgrace? Whether the blame or the merit lay with the House, it was a period, however, which had immortalized our name, and saved our constitution. The hon. and learned gentleman had said, these radical reformers had nothing substantial in their projects; he begged to differ with him, they had nothing less than the whole land of the country. If the House would submit, like innocent lambs they would soon find that they would be sheared to the very quick. The ruin of France had been accomplished by despising the first indications of mischief as too contemptible to deserve notice. It was indisputable, that the poison of doctrines, at once the most pernicious and the most absurd, had been long circulating through the body of the community: doctrines not expressed in the diction of illiterate men, but penned in the well wrought periods of practised writers. Let them hear the ingenious creed of these patriots of the soil. (A laugh.) Here Mr. Canning read an extract from a publication, entitled "The Spencean Plan." Among other principles it was stated, "that the only security for freedom was the restoration of the land to the people; and without that even revolution would be to no beneficial purpose." Again it was declared, "that the people were the only proprietors of the soil." How far did the plans of the moderate reformers fall short of these principles? and how were they sure that when they set the whirlwind in motion, they would be able to direct its course? They would in all probability be its first victims; and if successful, the country itself would soon follow. The festal blazes of the war were at an end, the sun of peace was scarcely yet above the horizon:—we must take care that during this cold and cheerless twilight, the spoiler and the assassin did not break in and destroy. He could not, he would not join with those who despaired of the fortunes of their country. Great, he admitted, was the exhaustion, and severe, he lamented it, was the distress. In this moment of exhaustion and distress, the enemies of England again sent forth their terrible prophesings, and pronounced her to be lost to herself and to the world. False prophets might they prove,—false prophets they would prove. The stamina of the nation, he was persuaded, were unbroken; the heart, he was confident, was sound. It was not surely at the eve of dissolution, and as in the moment of lightning before death, that he saw visions of future glory! But he could not, he would not believe that the brilliant destinies of England were closed forever.

— "Think you the sanguine cloud

Rais'd by war's breath, hath quench'd the orb of day?

— "To-morrow he repairs his golden flood,

And warms the nations with redoubled ray.

To wait with patience for the turn of these unprosperous times;—to bear and to forbear;—to endeavour to restore what Lord Clarendon somewhere calls, "the ancient good temper and good humour of the British Nation;"—to abstain from hazardous innovations and experiments;—to probe with a tender hand real grievances, with a view to practical remedy;—to cherish the institutions and to foster the resources of the country;—this was the course which Parliament had to pursue; and which, pursued through this Session, painful and laborious as it might be, would, he had no doubt, enable us to look back with self-congratulation at the gloomy phantoms by which we are now discouraged and appalled. As to the vote of this night, he must remind the House, that the Committee proposed by the Address was specifically pointed to its object;—so much so, that if the Address had suggested a Committee on the state of the nation, the gentlemen who now proposed that amendment would probably have accused the Government of endeavouring to keep the true point of difficulty cut of sight; and would themselves have called for the more precise designation of a Committee on Expenditure. There might, indeed, be another motive (a fair parliamentary motive, he was ready to allow) for moving an amendment, and pressing it to a division. The hon. gentlemen, might be desirous of ascertaining by a vote, the degree of confidence which the House of Commons might be pleased to repose in his Majesty's Ministers. If that were the object, he did not deprecate the division. Were it possible that the hon. gentlemen should succeed in getting the Government into their own hands, he should not envy them the inheritance. But so long as the present Ministers remained in office, they would endeavour to do their duty to the country. And that which he had most at heart, and which he ventured humbly to implore of the House of Commons was, that whatever it might be their pleasure to decide as to the merits of individuals, or as to the fate of Administrations, they would be careful to preserve sacred and uninjured, the Constitution which was entrusted to their charge. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham and Mr. Canning mutually explained.

Mr. Tierney observed, that the right hon. gentleman had talked a good deal of sudden transitions, and his speech certainly abounded in examples of them. The whole of his eloquence had been thrown away upon a subject which was not before the House, and to which there was no reference either in the original Address or the amendment. He regretted Lord Castlereagh's absence, as he was once a prominent advocate for reform, agreeing with Mr. Pitt and others, and if he had not changed, might have opposed Mr. Canning's anathemas against reformers. He (Mr. T.) avowed himself a friend to reform, but not to annual parliaments and universal suffrage; but thought it required mature and serious deliberation. Unless he heard something more substantial than Mr. C.'s speech, he believed he should die a friend to it. But let not attention be drawn from the amendment; the whole country was in jeopardy and danger, and if we were to believe the right hon. gentleman, from temporary causes. Having made his profession of faith on reform, he should say no more on it till it came before them. He protested against the doctrine of the duty of the House to re-echo the royal Speech: Mr. C. himself, when out of office, moved an amendment to an Address, leaving out all the words after "That." Mr. C. had quoted Lord Clarendon; he would quote Lord Somers as the seconder of an amendment to an Address, and calling for a committee on the state of national affairs. He wished to shew the public that the House were alive to their distress. Ministers only threw out their committee plan to get a few more votes. Mr. C. had been on his travels, employed under the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (hear, hear): and, therefore, he thought now it was monstrous not to confide in Ministers. How long had he (Mr. C.) confided in them? (Hear.) How long had no hostility existed among themselves? (Hear.) They would be very shy of saying why they confided together now. Arrangements, however, had been made: one was for Mr. C. to defend all that was done in his absence. Now the right hon. gentleman's splendours were a little evaporated, only one way was necessary to make matters intelligible. The amendment went to leave out the statement, that deficiency existed from temporary causes. The amendment stated, that the present evils "were more general in causes, more severe in effects, and more difficult to remove, than at the close of any former war;" yet they were called on to congratulate the country on no new taxes. There was much difference between the objects of the Address and amendment. He believed the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the report ready drawn. In his committee the distress of agriculture would not be entered into. Mr. C. unfairly accused his learned friend (Mr. Brougham) of wishing Ministers to employ the military for commercial purposes. Mr. C.'s new friend, the noble lord, had been employed much in adjusting the state of Europe; but he never heard from any commercial man that he had done one thing for the commercial interests of this country. Our arrangements in France led to any thing but to amicable intercourse: that country was exposed to taxes which the people would believe were to come over here. He could not speak from observation: but look at M. Corvetto's report, which stated there was too much asperity for a commercial treaty. That was an official answer to Mr. C.'s expectations. Trade may revive; but he (Mr. T.) did not think to its former extent; for in the American war, trade had fallen off; but in the last successful war it increased. The recovery to be looked for was limited. Almost all he had said to the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been unfortunately realized; the calculations were always wrong, and the consolidated fund had been yearly starved. His own opinions stood on the journals. Now there was a melancholy prospect. Would that right hon. gentleman say he believed the revenue would soon improve? When had they seen more reductions of expenditure in their neighbourhoods than lately? A diminution of stamp duties must happen; there was a general falling off in landed and commercial incomes; this year's income could not exceed 45,400,000/. Interest of debt, annuities, imperial loan, would, though you take away all the sinking fund, make 26,000,000/; unfunded debt interest he would take at 1,500,000/; charges on consolidated fund, 1,600,000/; Russian loan, 190,000/. In all 29,413,000/. There remained for service, 15,986,000/. If you reduce the peace establishment to 19,000,000/ there would be 3,000,000/ deficiency. What delusion this presented! Were the people of England to be duped by a speech? Could the deficiency be supplied by legerdemain, and hocus-pocus? The Minister must have some dealings with the Bank: but what could he mean with Exchequer-bills this year? Nothing was said of Irish revenue; was any thing to be got from that? Now, 17,000,000/ of expenditure were to be provided for, excepting 6,000,000/ if taxes proved productive. He doubted the consolidated fund on next July. A committee on a broad scale was necessary. This, though a dry statement, was a frightful picture of the expenditure of a great nation. (Hear.) The evil lay in that House, whether from its structure or whatever cause. Had they done their duty, they had not incurred half the expense with which they complimented the extravagance of Ministers. Let the House shew every wish to save the public money. (Hear.) We had concluded a great war with success, beyond any man's expectations; yet the poor were suffering among our bonfires and illuminations. They were told not to use intemperate language; were they to balance nicely their words, like posture-masters in that House? (Hear, hear.) As to Mr. C.'s idea of a man, after great exertions, feeling lassitude, and being desirous of going home to his fire-side, it was natural enough; but what was that to a poor man who had no fire-side to go to? He wished them to gain public confidence. In many London parishes the subscriptions would not hold out two months. What was then to be done? In St. James's workhouse, he was informed, there were 1,000 poor within, and 2,000 without, who were willing to work, and supported by the mere charity of the day! (Hear.) If churchwardens were to go round with the begging box, what was meant by speaking of no fresh taxes? Income and expenditure, as they were treated, differed like light and darkness. They must go deeper into the distresses. If he went into his old office, now Mr. Canning's, he might hear of his diminutions, but all among the lower clerks. Shew him one great man that had suffered—shew him one sacrifice. It was not enough to pare away a clerk: the great must set the example, and shew they shared the common fate. Men are consoled a little in such cases; and the poor dismissed clerks would be more satisfied to hear that the President's salary had been cut off too. (Hear.) People liked to have partners in distress. Had any example come from the highest quarter, the Crown, to whose true dignity he had no objection? The act for increasing the civil list was hardly dry; but had Ministers told the Prince Regent of the way to sacrifices? He saw no sacrifices by the great officers at all. (Hear.) Some officers were removed, but how? He did not mean to speak unpleasantly of any gentleman. He mentioned last year a grant of 10,000*l.* in the Treasury department. From clerks of 100*l.* a year, 30*l.* or 40*l.* were taken away, and 70*l.* left to keep soul and body together. But a careful visitation on all was the best way to prevent discontent. A gentleman was removed from the Commissariat, and reduced to 1,300*l.* a year, half his salary; but Ministers cut out a new office in the civil list, useless, except to ease some minister, and gave it to him at 1,500*l.* a year besides. Was this economy? They proposed a vice-treasurer of Ireland at 3,500*l.* a year, because he must have eminent endowments as a statesman. This was reduced to 2,000*l.* a year by the House; but Sir G. Hill, now appointed, had been a Lord of the Treasury with only 1000*l.* a year; he had a compensation-salary besides. He then adverted to Mr. Croker's receiving about 250*l.* lately, under pretence of war salary. (Hear.) This shewed the principles of Ministers' conduct. If they got out of the clutches of the House, they were not to be trusted out of sight, therefore he wanted to keep them within its clutches. If he had a committee, he would examine the examiners. Lord Castlereagh, by an indecent and disgraceful attempt on that house, did refuse a committee, and then appointed a committee of three gentlemen, members of Parliament. God forbid any excesses should occur; he should never do any thing to promote them: but our only security was in satisfying the public mind, not with a showy brilliant speech, but with actions. (Hear.) Now, when Ministers talked of a committee, it appeared that when any thing was pleasant, they took it on themselves; when it was quite different, they wanted to temporise with the House: for their sole object was to keep their places. (Hear.) How durst they refuse to call Parliament earlier, when the people were in beggary? When could gentlemen be better employed than in their Parliamentary duties at such a period? It would be seen now how some gentlemen would act, who said last year they would not support Ministers, unless they studied and practised economy. What proofs were there of their present and effectual sincerity? With respect to the committee of inquiry, he proposed that it should report from day to day. Let them then make a report on the office of third Secretary of State, an office which was perfectly useless: he would propose, that not one of the Ministry should be members of this committee: as constituted at present, the committee was all a delusion. He should not enter on the topic of our future expenditure, till he knew what line of foreign policy was intended; the House must come to a resolution on the point, whether we had done enough, in point of blood and treasure, for the tranquillity of Europe; if so, Europe must at length be left to shift for herself. It was indeed eminently necessary that the House should consider deeply the whole posture of our affairs, and not vote on a superficial view of things. The object of the Amendment was to shew the country that some confidence might be reposed in Parliament. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had said, he would have adopted the Amendment, if it had not been proposed hostilely; but if the Amendment were deserving of notice, what imported the motives with which it was proposed? He concluded by observing, how little desirable it could be to enjoy office at present, when power was accompanied with so much difficulty, and when a short time must evince the necessity of reducing many of the great offices of the Crown: but that even now office might be desirable, so far as it might enable an individual to render in any manner assistance to his country.

Mr. Canning explained.—He had never said it was the duty of the House to echo the speech from the throne, but its duty not to create unnecessary division. He did not say that he would accept the Amendment proposed, except on the terms of the general committee being relinquished, which he thought would only be a drag-net on their proceedings.

Mr. Saville spoke a few words in favour of the Amendment, and proposed a committee with the doors open, as in the case of the Duke of York, and that Ministers should now be as little screened as then.

After some desultory conversation, Mr. Preston attempted for some time to be heard, but the House at length divided, when the numbers were—

For the Amendment	112
Against it	264

Majority in favour of the Address —152

Lord Cochrane then proposed a second amendment to the address, which, after touching upon the general distress of the country, and beseeching his Royal Highness to rely with confidence upon the loyalty and good sense of the great body of the people, proceeded—"and this House, with great humility, begs leave to assure your Royal Highness that not one single instance can be discovered, in which meetings assembled for the purpose of petitioning for Parliamentary Reform, have been accompanied with any attempt to disturb the public tranquillity." This was succeeded by a loud laugh of derision throughout the House. The Amendment next adverted to the sinecure places and the civil list, and concluded by earnestly recommending Parliamentary Reform. His lordship conceived that the adoption of such an amendment would be more becoming the dignity of the House.

The motion, however, not being seconded, fell to the ground.

The Address was finally agreed to, and a committee appointed to prepare the same, according to the usual forms.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Abercrombie, Hon. J.	Mackintosh, Sir J.
Althorp, Viscount	Madocks, W. A.
Anson, Sir George	Markham, Admiral
Aubrey, Sir John	Martin, John
Bennet, Hon. H. G.	Maitin, Henry
Caillie, J. F.	Milton, Viscount
Baring, Sir Thomas	Molyneux, H. H.
Barnett, James	Monck, Sir Charles
Barnard, Viscount	Morland, S. B.
Birch, Joseph	Morpeth, Viscount
Brand, Hon. Thomas	Mostyn, Sir Thomas
Brougham, Henry	Moor, Peter
Browne, Doin.	Neville, Hon. R.
Burdett, Sir Francis	North, Dudley
Burrell, Hon. P. D.	Ord, William
Cally, Thomas	Ossulston Lord
Calvert, Charles	Peirse, Henry
Carter, John	Pelham, Hon. C. A.
Caulfield, Hon. H.	Pelham, Hon. G. A.
Cavendish, Hon. H.	Philips, George
Cochrane, Lord	Piggot, Sir A.
Coke, Thomas	Ponsonby, Right Hon. G.
Curwen, J. C.	Ponsonby, Hon. F. C.
Duncannon, Viscount	Powlett, Hon. W.
Dundas, Hon. J.	Preston, Richard
Dundas, Charles	Prittie, Hon. F. A.
Douglas, Hon. F. S.	Proby, Hon. Captain
Ehrington, Viscount	Pryn, Francis
Elliot, Hon. William	Rauchsiffe, Lord
Fazakerley, J.	Ridley, Sir M. W.
Fergusson, Sir R. C.	Romilly, Sir Samuel
Fitzroy, Lord John	Rowley, Sir William
Fellowes, Hon. N.	Russell, Lord G. W.
Folkstone, Viscount	Russell, Lord William
Frankland, Robert	Russell, R. C.
Fremantle, William	Saville, Albany
Geary, Sir William	Scudamore, R.
Grenfell, Pascoe	Sharp, Richard
Gordon, Robert	Sefton, Earl of
Grosvenor, Gen.	Smith, John
Guise, Sir William	Smith, Abel
Halsey, Joseph	Smith, William
Hamilton, Sir H. D.	Smith, G.
Heathcote, Sir G.	Stanley, Lord
Heron, Sir Robert	Tristock, Marquis
Howard, Hon. W.	Tierny, Right Hon. G.
Howorth, Hump.	Townshend, Lord C.
Hughes, W. I.	Townshend, Lord J.
Hurst, Robert	Waldgrave, Hon. Capt.
Jervois, G. P.	Warre, J. A.
Lambton, J. G.	Webb, E.
Langton, W. G.	Wilkins, Walter
Latouche, Rob. jun.	Wynn, Sir W. W.
Lemon, Sir William	Wynn, C. W.
Lewis, T. F.	TELLERS.
Lloyd, J. M.	Calcraft, John
Lyttleton, Hon. W. H.	Hamilton, Lord A.
Maddonald, James

PAIRED OFF.

Lamb, Hon. W. Knox, Thos. Dickinson, Wm.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, January 31.

ADDRESS.] The Marquis of Cholmondeley reported, that the Prince Regent had been waited upon by the Lords with white staves, and that His Royal Highness had been graciously pleased to appoint to-morrow, at half-past two o'clock, to receive the Address of the House.

PRIVILEGE.] A message was brought from the Commons by Mr. Wynn and others, stating, that the Commons, taking notice that at the late conference the same accommodation had not been afforded to their Managers, as had been provided on former occasions, and that the seats for the Managers for the Lords had been differently placed, and raised higher than before, contrary to ancient usage, requested that this might not be drawn into precedent, and that the place in which the conferences were held should be fitted up as usual.

The Commons were informed that the Lords would return an answer by Messengers of their own.

Adjourned till to-morrow, for the purpose of going up with the Address.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, January 31.

PRIVILEGE.] Mr. W. Wynn, after complaining that due ceremony had not been observed in the reception of the Commons on the conference with the Lords in the painted chamber, moved, that a message be sent to the Lords to the following effect:—"The house taking notice of a departure from precedent in the last conference, pray that the place of meeting be restored to its former state." The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF SHERIFFS IN IRELAND.

Mr. Ponsonby rose to inquire of the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, what proceedings had been pursued by the Irish Government, touching that most important measure, as affecting the interests of Ireland, the appointment of Sheriffs?

Mr. Peel said, that upon his return to Ireland last autumn, he had signified to the Lord Lieutenant the wish entertained, that the appointment of Sheriffs in that country should be assimilated to the mode employed here. He proposed, therefore, that the judges who went the circuit, should, after their return to Dublin, send in to the Lord Chancellor, the names of three persons for each county, whom they considered fit to serve in that office. That there should afterwards be a meeting of all the judges, who were to compare their lists, and make any alteration in them that might appear necessary, when they were to be sent, through the Chancellor, to the Lord Lieutenant. Such was the course now adopted with respect to the appointment of Sheriffs, in every case where it was possible, and he was not aware of any instance where it had been found impossible. From the names thus returned one was regularly selected, and a letter sent to the individual informing him of his appointment, nor was he excused from serving, except upon good and sufficient allegations.

Mr. Ponsonby expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the answer of the right hon. gentleman, observing, that the course which had been pursued was the best that could be adopted, and he hoped it would be continued. It would prove of the utmost benefit to Ireland.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF GLOUCESTER.]—The Chancellor of the Exchequer called the attention of the House to the marriage of his Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester. He was certain, that all who were as well acquainted as himself with the virtues of the parties, would be ready to approach with the compliments and congratulations usually offered by Parliament on such occasions; he therefore moved, that an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, congratulating him on the happy nuptials of her Royal Highness the Princess Mary with his Highness the Duke of Gloucester.

Mr. Ponsonby was sure it would be satisfactory to the country to see the House offer their congratulations on the present occasion; but he hoped he should not be thought guilty of impertinent curiosity, if he asked why that marriage had not been noticed in the address to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent: he never knew an instance where an occurrence of this nature had not been mentioned in the address to the throne, and he was glad the hon. gentleman had at length recollected the thing, and had not passed by altogether a matter of great congratulation to Parliament.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that the subject had been omitted in the address because it had arisen in the last session.

Mr. Ponsonby added a few words, when

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that a message be sent to his Highness the Duke of Gloucester, and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, to congratulate them on their marriage.

Both the motions were carried nem. con. and gentlemen appointed to carry up the address and the message.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir W. Lemon presented a petition from the county of Cornwall, praying for a Reform in Parliament. He stated, that the petitioners complained of the evils arising from an inadequate representation of the people; that they wished for reform, but had not proposed any wild theory or rash experiments. If a motion should be made for the House to resolve itself into a committee for the consideration of this great question, he should support it, as he had always done in proposals of a similar description.

The petition was then read: it referred all the distress of the times, and the abuses commonly animadverted on, to the want of an adequate representation. That for want of this a war had been entered on, irrational in its object, and disastrous in its consequences; for want of this, the establishment, which after the peace of Ryswick was 7,000 men, was now increased to 150,000; taxation had become insupportable; general search-warrants had again been introduced; the habeas corpus act suspended; and our unhappy fellow subjects in Ireland put to the torture. It then proceeded to shew, in how few hands the representation of the people really lay, and that a majority of the House was actually returned by a small body of opulent proprietors.

Mr. Brand thought the grievances enumerated had been discussed in a temperate manner, and the remedy suggested efficacious and safe.—Many well-meaning persons might doubtless be now alarmed by the wildness and audacity of theories which had never been advanced by the true friends of Parliamentary Reform; but they who had studied these subjects, knew that such theories had no foundation whatever. They did not look to the establishment of annual Parliaments and universal suffrage; they knew that such plans would, in fact, be the destruction of the best part, the popular part, of our system of Government. He had no doubt that the framers of the present petition would have entered a protest against the resolutions which other meetings had come to on this subject, could they have anticipated the nature of them.

Mr. Elliott hoped the anxiety he felt on so momentous a subject, would be his excuse with the House for intreating them to pause before they touched the great and complicated frame of our immortal Government. He hoped, that all would look at the quarter from whence these proposals for reform had arisen. The views of many of its promoters were already sufficiently known, and he trusted that the language held at public meetings, the sentiments expressed in widely disseminated pamphlets, and the venom diffused in weekly publications, would be well examined before we delivered the constitution of our ancestors to the insane speculations of these state architects. He was convinced that we could not, at this moment, even touch on the subject, without adding to the distress of the times, and plunging the country into irretrievable difficulties.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Sir F. Burdett said, he had some petitions to present from Halifax and its neighbourhood, praying for a reform of the representation of that House. He must protest against some doctrines recently laid down, which would be a great and grievous impediment to, and throw an unfair onus upon, every member who, in the exercise of his duty, presented a petition to Parliament, as well as being injurious to the just rights and claims of the petitioners. Every member should be protected, in his own individual privileges; and one of the chief points of the privileges of that House depended on each individual member's right being secured against the attempts of large and overbearing majorities. The petitions he was about to present, he had not felt it his duty to read throughout, but he had read their prayer. He would not presume to intercept or stop a petition to the House, simply by his own judgment of it. He felt it to be the duty of a member to submit petitions to the House, which, after hearing them, might deal with them as it thought proper. He did not consider himself at all answerable for the opinions and doctrines they contained; nor was he bound to maintain the principles they might advance. He should adopt that course which was best suited to his own judgment, for the attainment of the great object of a reform of the representation, to which end he felt most anxious to contribute. The period was arrived when the consideration of this great question could no longer be deferred; and if the House met it, and considered it with fairness and candour, by which he intended to regulate his own conduct, then the public tranquillity and harmony might be ensured; which, if candour and fairness were not observed by the House, would be endangered or destroyed. His wish was to unite all that were within the House, with all that were without, in one bond towards the Crown; and such wishes were now most likely, from circumstances, to be brought to a favourable issue, so universally desired by all honest men. (Hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that the rule of Parliament was, that a member is bound to state the substance of the petition he presents, and so far to identify himself with it as to say that it appears to contain nothing improper or disrespectful to the House. If any other rule than this were adopted, the table might be covered, and the journals filled, with false and atrocious libels. He must, therefore, refer to the Speaker to know whether the hon. baronet had read the petition he was about to present.

The Speaker said, there were two clear points on this subject. The first was, that it was the duty of any member to state the substance of the petition he wished to present. The House could then judge as to the propriety of receiving it. Secondly, it was the member's duty to know if it was respectfully couched; if not, he departed from the line of his duty in offering it.

Sir F. Burdett had certainly not read the petition throughout: he had read the prayer. He understood the substance of it to be a complaint of the want of a proper representation of the people in the Commons' House of Parliament. He did not believe that the petitions contained any offensive or insulting expressions; but he could not take upon himself to say what the House might think of them.

The Speaker observed, that he was thus to understand from the hon. baronet, that he saw nothing offensive in the petitions.

Sir F. Burdett said, he had so many petitions to present on this subject, that to read them all through, would take up the whole time of the session.

The Attorney-General remarked, that the hon. baronet had said, that he had not read the petitions; and that he had not time enough to spare to undertake the reading of all he had to offer. That tedious and painful operation must, however, be undergone by the House itself, which might thereby be compelled to the trouble of hearing them, whether they were gross insults or not. For one, he wished to say distinctly, and he was disposed to follow the highest authorities on the subject, that he was willing to throw open the doors wide for receiving petitions. He had himself that day received a petition, which he thought it his duty to read before presenting it. He then objected to it; not because it affronted the privileges or dignity of the House, but because it stated certain facts of which he had not competent knowledge, and which might convey serious charges against individuals. He might have brought it to the House, because he had read the prayer of it; but he always considered it the practice of Parliament, that a member should read a petition; otherwise he might be instrumental in bringing heavy charges against persons who could not immediately defend themselves.

Mr. Brougham said, the learned gentleman seemed to wish to carry his rule too far. According to his doctrine, it was not merely by reading, but making some rule by which the parties were to come to his chambers, that he might ascertain all the facts. As the learned gentleman appeared to have put himself into a new situation respecting the practice in petitioning the House, he hoped he would consult the best authorities upon the subject, and then he would probably be told, that he was totally misinformed on the matter in question.

Mr. C. Wynne thought, that if it was the duty of a member to present any petition, it was equally his duty to read it. The House had no protection in such cases, but its confidence in its own members, as to whether a petition be offensive or insulting. Respecting the present petition, the House had not that species of security which it had a right to demand.

Mr. Abercrombie understood the highest authority in that House to say, in substance, that the hon. baronet had complied with what was required.

The Speaker observed, with respect to the hon. member's not knowing of any disrespectful language in the petition, that as no member was compellable out of doors to present any petition, so, in doors, he was not entitled to present that of which he had no knowledge.

Mr. Abercrombie said, that the policy which it seemed now intended to adopt, appeared to him very objectionable. An attempt was now made to oppose an additional barrier against the reception of petitions, by a strict examination of every member presenting them, and by interrogating him as to whether he had read them: and if he happened not to have read them throughout, to move for their rejection. The hon. baronet had said, that he had read the prayer and an abstract of the contents; but the question was simply, whether an individual member's opinion on the subject of offensive matter was to be taken. The language of a petition might receive a great variety of constructions from different persons. The learned Attorney-General had said, that he refused to present a petition because it contained charges against individuals; there was nothing to find fault with in that. He (Mr. A.) should wish to follow the example of the late Mr. Whitbread, who occasionally offered petitions which he candidly stated he was not prepared to support. Mr. Whitbread said, that the House ought to be accessible to the complaints and prayers of petitioners, that he would go to the extent of presenting the petition, but that the petitioner had no right to expect any thing more from him. He believed, were Mr. Whitbread fortunately now a member of that House, he would have opposed firmly the sort of examination which the Attorney-general appeared desirous to introduce, with the professed view of finding whether a petition contained any thing disrespectful.

Mr. Canning remarked, that the consideration of what an individual might conceive for his own rule of conduct, was quite beside the practical point. It might be quite right in certain cases for a member to be assured of all the facts stated in a petition, and in others it might not be so necessary. That was a question for the member's exercise of his duty and discretion. But it had been laid down by the highest authority, and had been admitted in practice, that the House had a right to know that members had read the petitions which they presented.

Sir Gilbert Heathcote observed, that the right honourable gentleman had already made his declaration against all reform; and he might therefore think a petition praying for it quite indecorous. (Hear.) But how could it appear so to him (Sir G. H.), who was a friend to reform, and must therefore think such a petition constitutional? The question about presenting petitions must, therefore, in his mind, be resolved into merely a matter of individual judgment as to its exercise.

Mr. Canning said, that the hon. baronet had certainly misunderstood him. He had not stated whether a member ought to use his own judgment or not; but that, by the rule of the House, he ought to have read the petition before he presented it. That was matter of fact, and not of opinion.

Sir Gilbert Heathcote maintained, that the point remained as he had stated it. It was mere matter of private judgment.

On the question being put, that the Halifax petition be brought up,

Mr. Canning rose again, and asked, "Has the hon. member read it?"

Sir F. Burdett observed, it was quite possible that a member of Parliament might not be able to read; in former times it was well known to have been the case, and many put down their marks. However, he should give the right hon. gentleman no answer. He came there with these petitions to represent grievances beyond the ability of the country to bear—not for himself, but speaking the voice of half a million of Englishmen. Would they say, that they would not listen to them in their complaints of the state of the representation, and set up lawyers to make cross-examinations of members, though the signatures to the petitions were undoubted? He had read abstracts or extracts of these petitions, though he had not read all the parchments throughout; and he could prove by reference, if he chose, that the House had received petitions, charging corruption on the present representation, in terms much stronger than some others which they had thought it proper to reject. (Hear.)

Mr. Canning requested the Speaker, as the debate had taken a wider range, to lay down the rule on this subject again.

The Speaker said, the rule was as he had before stated it, a member was bound to have read the petition he presents. ♫

Mr. Canning, upon the high authority of the Speaker, and the necessity of strictly adhering to the rules of the House, must feel himself forced to oppose this unread petition.

Mr. Brougham said, that no member had a higher respect for the Chair than he had, and none was disposed to bow with more reverence to its decisions (hear); yet he must beg the right hon. Speaker, from a regard to the privileges of every member of the House, and the regularity of its proceedings, so closely connected with the safety of the country, to pause, after the zeal, and he might even add, the presumption of the right hon. gentleman opposite. (Hear.) He had talked of rules in that House, as if they were matters decided by vote, and like standing orders. The dictum of the present or of any other Speaker (he meant to say it with respect) was only the opinion of an individual, however high his rank in the House. (Hear.) The rule mentioned could not be shewn to derive its authority from any vote of the House put from the Chair, and adopted. Therefore, the right hon. gentleman opposite could not engraft upon the opinion of the Speaker a right of putting questions to a member. He could shew, that the right hon. gentleman did not know to what extent he was proceeding when he flung out a sort of threat. (Hear.) He endeavoured to give a warning to members, and to tell them, that though they brought petitions from half a million of fellow subjects, or from all England, yet they should have an introductory question put to them before any of their petitions should be received. No individual member had a right to presume to do this; though he might move to refer the point to the Chair, and then it would remain for the House itself to decide. It was for the House itself to protect its own privileges, and not for the right hon. gentleman, or any among his various colleagues. (Hear.) He suspected, that this would be the first time that ever the Chair put such a question of examination, except to a witness, or one against whom charges had been made. It might be denied, that a cross-examination was attempted; but it was at least a new mode and an innovation. (Hear.) If this new interrogatory were submitted to, then it might be attempted to extract an opinion, and to consider the question of a member's judgment. And this novelty was attempted at a period when all England was petitioning, or ready to petition, on the score of their severe grievances and sufferings! He conjured the Speaker and the House to pause awhile before the introduction of a new practice, of which no vestige appeared in the votes or standing orders of the H

Mr. Bragge Bathurst said, the hon. member's speech was addressed partly to the chair and partly to the members, with a kind of threat as to consequences. The only novelty he found was, that a member made a petition a part of his speech, and then said he had not read the petition. He appealed to the House, whether it ever happened that a petition were received under such circumstances. The practice of Mr. Whitbread, now no more, was alluded to: his conduct was correct; for in certain cases, he fairly stated that he was not answerable for the contents of petitions. He had heard that gentleman frequently say, he had looked at a petition, and had seen nothing wrong or offensive in it. This practice was always adopted expressly or implied. Where were they to look for principles of regulation but to ancient practice? It was true enough, that the Speaker was only the mouth of the House; and if his right hon. friend (Mr. C.), speaking of himself, had said, he would do this or that, he was only using language common in Parliament. The cross-examination, as it was called, amounted only to this—whether a member had complied with the rules observed in the common way of doing the public business. It was too much now to go against the experience of ages.

Sir G. Romilly said, though he should vote for receiving the petition, yet he had always thought it his duty to read a petition before he offered it, out of respect to the house. (Hear.) Yet he should vote for it, for the rule was not universal and admitting of no exceptions. (Hear.) There might be an exception in this instance, when the hon. baronet said he had so many petitions on the same subject, and when he stated, that he knew the substance, and did not believe that it contained any improper matter.

Lord Lascelles could not help seeing, from language and conduct of the hon. baronet, that he was placed in a situation by the petitioners and his sense of duty, which he had not himself sought, and which might even be considered as a hardship. Numerous petitions were sent him to present, of all the contents of which it was laborious to attain a knowledge, and of all the principles of which he might not entirely approve. Many of them came from the county he (Lord L.) represented, though the petitioners had rather chosen to communicate through the hon. baronet than through him. He (Sir Francis) had truly stated, that he felt it a great task to read them all, and a rule which imposed this task might be considered as a demand with which he could not comply, consistently with presenting the great mass of papers intrusted to his care. The House, on the other hand, required of every member who brought forward petitions, that he should have read them, and that they should have the security of his judgment and discretion against any offensive or insulting language in which their framers might be pleased to couch them. Here was the point of form; this was the matter at issue between the hon. baronet and the House. It was a matter of feeling or convenience with him (Sir F. B.); and he (Lord L.) confided in the good sense of the hon. baronet, that he would not bring Parliament into a contest with the country, or array the petitioners, whose prayers he presented, against the assembly to which they applied, on a mere point of personal feeling or accommodation. He himself, coming from that part of the country where the petitioners resided, and being well acquainted with their temper and situation, not only from personal knowledge, but from the information of others, might take it upon him to tell the House, that if their language was violent and intemperate there were many apologies to be made for it: and that it was not always a true expression of their deliberate sentiments, or the real state of their minds. In his opinion a wide distinction was to be made between the designs and disposition of the petitioners and the reprehensible terms to which the House had objected. The people were in great distress, without employment, or the prospect of returning prosperity. In the extremity of their trouble they looked about for an alleviation of their sufferings, or a remedy for their grievances: and in this state they were told, that by subscribing their names to a petition for Parliamentary Reform, they might obtain a relief from their burdens, through political changes, and secure themselves against the recurrence of similar evils. (Hear.) Men in distress are not disposed to examine very scrupulously into the truth or propriety of any measure that holds out the hope or prospect of a beneficial change. The petitioners, though they thus subscribed violent petitions, were not violent men, and ought not to be judged of according to the strict import of expressions which many of them did not weigh, and which some of them did not understand. (Hear, hear.) The intemperate resolutions to which they came at public meetings were no index of the real, deliberate, and matured opinions of those who voted them by acclamation. Although he had not been applied to for the purpose of presenting the petitions which were put into the hands of the hon. baronet, he would tell the House the connexion he had with some of the petitioners, and the answer he returned to their inquiries. He had been asked his opinion concerning the propriety of a member presenting petitions which, from his political sentiments, he could not support: and if he himself would present petitions for Parliamentary Reform. His reply was, that he would consider it as a matter of duty to carry to the House any petition for Reform, however far its prayer extended, if it was couched in decent and respectful language, and contained no matter menacing or insulting to the House. He told them, moreover, that he did not agree with them in the necessity of Reform, or the scheme of reformation they proposed; and that if they thought their petition would have more weight when presented by one whose opinions came nearer to their own, he would recommend them to apply to another. The petitioners had taken his recommendation. Such had been his answer, and such was his conduct. He would be sorry that, by any perseverance on the part of the hon. baronet, the House should be driven to appear regardless of the applications of such men as he had described, or be placed in conflict with the misguided, led astray by those who took advantage of their sufferings to inflame their minds. He would regret this circumstance the more, because a refusal of their petitions would answer the very purpose of those who were the chief instruments in forwarding them, and who infused violence and extravagance into them, with the design of securing their rejection. This was a matter, however, for the House to decide upon; and it might not be disposed to allow itself to be approached in disrespectful language, whatever were the motives of the applicants. If the house could reconcile itself to receive them, or if the hon. baronet surrendered his stand on the point of form, he (Lord L.) would be gratified in the present instance, because he believed the real dignity of Parliament was not involved in the question. If he were of a contrary opinion, and conceived that the privileges, or the dignity of Parliament would be compromised by consenting to receive the present petition, he would be the last man to yield an atom, or to retire from his ground an inch, though the House were surrounded by half a million of men, or all the petitioners whose applications the hon. baronet stated would be laid on the table: because he was convinced, that the surrender of one privilege from menace or intimidation would only invite farther attacks.

Sir F. Burdett wished to set the noble lord right in one thing. He (Sir F.) had never declared that he was hostile to the principles of the petitioners: he had only said, that he was not pledged to support them. He meant to steer a moderate rational course, and to endeavour to unite all classes in an understanding of the wishes of the great body of the petitioners, on the subject of reform. He would be sorry to bring the House into contest with the country on a mere point of form, or personal convenience: and he had made the stand that he did against the rule laid down, not from any pertinacity, but because he thought the right of petitioning involved in the question. Some of the petitions which he held in his hand he had read since he came into the House, and would move that they be brought up. (Hear, hear.) He moved, therefore, that a petition which he presented from certain inhabitants of Halifax, in Yorkshire, and its vicinity, be brought up.

Mr. Canning rose to explain, and said, he would not press the reading of the other petitions.

Lord Cochrane objected to the rule that had been laid down, imposing upon a member the necessity of reading petitions before he presented them. Cases might occur in which a member might receive so many, or have so little time, that he could not peruse them all: and thus the subject might suffer because the representatives of the people could not learn their grievances.

The petition was then brought up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Sir F. Burdett presented three other petitions from inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood of Halifax, two of them praying for universal suffrage and annual Parliaments, and one for annual Parliaments and suffrage co-extensive with direct taxation. They were all read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Brougham observed, that after hearing these three petitions, and many others that were offered to the House with the same prayer, he could not help making a few remarks to counteract the absurd and pernicious doctrines that they contained, and to call the attention of Parliament and the country to one of the ridiculous blunders, or wilful misrepresentations, on which they all proceeded. He had the greatest respect for some of the petitioners: he gave them credit for the best intentions, and he could find apologies for all their errors: but he was sure they had never read or considered the petitions which they subscribed; they had never weighed the principles which they contained, or the consequences to which they would lead. They were goaded on with distress: they felt all those sufferings and embarrassments so feelingly described by the noble lord (Lascelles) opposite; and when they looked for a remedy, they were told by those who were too well informed and artful to be themselves deceived, that they could only obtain relief by annual Parliaments and universal suffrage. He (Mr. B.) had no objection that those subjects should be discussed, that they should be entertained as political questions, that applications should be made to the House to support them: but what excited his displeasure was, that those who must have read the history of their country, who were not ignorant men, who had reflected long on what they were doing, urged the uneducated and illiterate to demand universal suffrage as their birthright, to place it in the same rank with personal liberty or security of property, to declare it the ancient imprescriptible rights of Englishmen; and told those whose opinions they directed, as a matter of history, that it was for this right their ancestors fought and bled. The men who made these statements must know they were propagating delusions; and that truth and fact were against them. He was not unacquainted with the history of his country; but he had never read in any historian, or in any account of the constitution of England, that our ancestors fought and bled for universal suffrage; or that in the struggles between the Crown and the people, on two very important occasions, when our rights and liberties were the subject of contention, in the time of King John and Charles I., this political doctrine was ever thought of by our brave and patriotic forefathers. In the former of these periods, so far were our ancestors from allowing universal suffrage, or every man who had attained the age of 21 to vote, that the great body of the people were not represented at all; or if represented, were represented in a way very different from that now contended for, or as the property of their masters. They were, in fact, in the state of the most degrading villanage, and treated rather like beasts of burden than as beings capable of political right. Those who spread the delusive cry of universal suffrage could not be ignorant of these things, and must intend to mislead those over whom their influence extended. But though the people were misled in the present times, their opinions should be treated with gentleness, and their errors corrected with mildness. If, instead of shutting the doors of Parliament to the petitions of public meetings: if, instead of taking any severe methods of preventing these meetings from assembling to petition, an attempt were made to convince them by sound reasoning and rational argument, much would be done to conciliate their minds, and allay their irritation; much would be done for the cause of good order and constitutional liberty. (Hear, hear, from all parts of the House.)

REPORT OF THE ADDRESS.] The motion being made that the Report on the Address be brought up,

Sir Robert Heron rose to oppose it. The arguments which had been stated in support of the amendment, he contended, had not been answered. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Caning) was at first so pleased with the amendment, that he thought of supporting it. He talked even of his own resignation as a possible event. (A laugh.) The remainder of his speech was, however, occupied with a subject foreign both to the address and the speech; namely, Parliamentary Reform. This topic at once overpowered all his own reflections, and filled him with such inspiration, that he poured forth a rhapsody of ensanguined clouds, assassins, robbers, war-blazes, twilight, and hobgoblins.—(A laugh.) If the present system was persevered in, he was persuaded that the interest of the national debt could not be paid. What could be done in this case? Were we to contemplate a national bankruptcy? and how could the House rest satisfied with itself, or justify its proceedings to the country, if it incurred such a risk without first exhausting every resource of retrenchment and economy?—The hon. baronet animadverted on several statements of Mr. Banks, and contended, that he was both wrong in his facts and his inference, when he said that the nation did not suffer under the pressure of taxation, because last year it had felt no relief from taking off 17 millions of taxes. Seventeen millions were not reduced last year, because, though the property-tax was abolished last year, three quarters of it were paid in this. He objected, likewise, to some statements in the speech of an hon. gentleman behind him (Mr. Curwen), who mentioned, that the subscriptions for the relief of the poor did not exceed 200,000*l.* in all the kingdom. This by no means included the amount of the charities applied for the alleviation of distress, as the hand of private benevolence distributed more than ever appeared in a subscription list, or was brought forward at public meetings. But it was melancholy to reflect, that all this was insufficient, and the resources of charity would be exhausted at the very time they would be most required, when those who had at first contributed were forced themselves to be dependent on the contributions of others. This was not the proper time for considering retrenchment; but he would mention a few of the heads in which it should be tried. The army was one: but while our present policy was maintained, any reduction of it that could take place would be of trifling amount. We must withdraw our troops from the support of legitimacy or despotism abroad, before we could diminish our military establishment to any extent: and then our people, who were now irritated by taxes, levied to support a standing army, so as to render a standing army necessary to repress their violences, would, by the reduction of their burdens, return to good order and tranquillity. Another head of retrenchment were pensions and sinecures, which should be entirely abolished, where they were not a reward for important public services.—The hon. baronet next adverted to the enormous amount of the civil list. It had been well said, that the eyes of the people were directed to that House, and there was no point on which they were more anxious, or felt a greater degree of irritation. They were justly desirous that a considerable retrenchment should be made in this branch, more especially as all classes were obliged to suffer unparalleled privations, and even to forego the ordinary comforts of life. (Hear, hear.) But what had his Majesty's Ministers done on this subject in the last session of Parliament? To the utmost astonishment of the nation, and which naturally provoked the greatest indignation, they had increased the civil list by an additional charge of 260,000*l.* It was impossible for any thing to produce more painful reflections, particularly at a period when every Sovereign on the continent of Europe was advised to diminish his expenses. (Hear, hear.) Ministers, however, regardless of the distresses and wants of a suffering people, had thought proper to add the sum of 260,000*l.* to the already enormous civil list. And for what purpose was this great addition made? Was it for any useful purpose whatever, either to support the real dignity of the Crown, or to increase the personal comforts of the Sovereign? No; it was as wanton as it was useless; equally unnecessary to the enjoyments of the Prince Regent, and irritating to the people: in fact, intended for no other purpose than to increase the emoluments of the offices of pageantry. (Hear.) Another cause which had increased the public difficulties was the unfortunate, the narrow, the selfish policy of endeavouring, during the war, to maintain a monopoly of commerce. Ignorant and mistaken in the soundest principles of legislation were they who had recommended and sanctioned this measure. We should keep trade as free and open as possible; but a different course had been adopted, and what was the consequence? It had cemented, as all wise and rational men must have anticipated, the barriers of the continental system against us. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had told the House, that our difficulties were only temporary; but there was nothing in the prospect of things to make us think them so, unless Ministers would yield to the unanimous voice of the country, and reduce our expenditure within our income. Whenever we talked of economy and retrenchment, we were told that we ought to trust to Ministers; but what grounds had we to repose any confidence in them? Did their conduct last year correspond with their promises? The very first thing they attempted was, to renew a most odious, unjust, and oppressive tax, in order to maintain a most unnecessary, unconstitutional, and burdensome establishment. (Hear, hear.) What, then, should we suffer ourselves to be again deceived? Let the House and the people remember, that Ministers would make no reduction whatever, until they were actually forced to do it by the good sense, the wisdom, and firmness of Parliament, assisted and strengthened by the general cries of a suffering and exhausted country. What further assurance, therefore, had we that Ministers would not practise the same delusions, that they would not resort to the same oppressive measures in the present session? The only inducement that we could have to trust in them, the only additional ground upon which they could ask for confidence, was one of the most flagrant and shameful instances of profligacy that had been ever exhibited by any set of Ministers—namely, the appointment of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), who had accepted, with an enormous salary, the sinecure office of ambassador to the King of Portugal, who then resided, and had ever since continued to reside, in the Brazils. (Much cheering.) This, and this only, was the additional ground upon which his Majesty's Ministers could now call on the House to rely on their promises of economy.

The report was then brought up, agreed to, and ordered to be presented by the whole House.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, Feb. 1.

Their lordships met at two o'clock, and, after prayers, proceeded in state to Carlton-house, to present their address on the speech of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, February 1.

The house assembled soon after two o'clock, when Lord G. Beresford appeared at the bar, and informed them, that the Prince Regent had appointed three o'clock this day to receive the address voted on Thursday last.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer presented a message from the Prince Regent, acquainting the House, that he had given directions for laying before the House the state of the public accounts, and the estimates for the current year; and, on the motion of the right hon. gentleman, the message was ordered to be taken into consideration on Monday next.

COLLECTION OF TITHES.] Mr. Saville gave notice that soon after the Easter recess, he should feel it to be his duty to bring the interesting question of tithes before the House.

The House then went in procession with the Address.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, February 3.

The Lord Chancellor reported, that the address had been presented on Saturday to the Prince, who had returned an answer, which he read, expressing the Prince's thanks for the address, and his confidence in the loyalty, wisdom, and exertions of Parliament to meet the difficulties of the times, and to preserve the constitution under which the people of this country had the happiness to live.

The Marquis of Cholmondeley reported the answer of the Queen, and the Duke of Montrose reported the answer of the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, to addresses of the House, on occasion of the marriage of the Duke and Duchess.

On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, it was ordered that a message be sent to the Commons, stating that the Lords had not been aware of the alterations made in the place for conferences between the two houses, and that it should be restored to its former state.

LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT.] The Earl of Thanet presented a petition from Mr. Hunt, which, as it was couched in respectful language, he thought it his duty to offer, without giving any opinion upon it.

The petition was read by the clerk, and stated, that a conspiracy existed among certain persons against his character and his life—a fact which he offered to prove at their lordships' bar; and upon proving it, he prayed that the House would give him its protection.

The petitioner then stated, that he had given proofs of his loyalty and fidelity to his Sovereign and country on different occasions; that when a circular was sent round to the different lords lieutenants on occasion of the first alarm of invasion, during the late war, to ascertain what assistance the farmers could give to the Government for the conveyance of troops, and generally for the public service in case of emergency, he had, being then a farmer in Wiltshire, offered 20 horses, 16 waggons, and every thing he could command, besides his personal services, it being his opinion that property and life itself were nothing in comparison with the honour, independence, and interests of the country; that in 1803 also, on another occasion of an alarm of invasion, when it had been determined to call for the services of volunteers, he had been very active in his district in promoting that object, and received assurances from the Earl of Pembroke, that his activity and exertions would be represented to his Majesty's ministers. That upon the same principle of doing every thing in his power for the interests of the country, he had lately attended meetings, called together for the purposes of petitioning for a reform in the representation of the people in parliament, the only remedy for the distresses under which the country laboured, and had attended a meeting at Bristol, where a petition was agreed to for the above purpose, and signed by 20,000 persons, which petition had since been presented to the other House of Parliament. The petition then stated the circumstance of a boy having been taken by police-officers, and imprisoned for tearing down bills reflecting on the conduct and character of the petitioner, which had been printed by the police printer, and put up at 10 o'clock at night, the police-officers being ordered to prevent their being taken down, &c. All these facts the petitioner offered to prove, and prayed, that on proving, he might have such protection and relief as the circumstances appeared to demand.

The Lord Chancellor said, that attending to the language of the petition, it appeared to be such as there could be no objection to; and as the House was always desirous to receive and pay a proper attention to petitions, he would have been glad that this should be received if it were a petition upon which the House could institute any proceeding: but the petition called upon the House to exercise an original jurisdiction, the constitution having said that it had no original jurisdiction. The law was open, and the petitioner must, in the first place, seek his remedy elsewhere: but their lordships had no jurisdiction in the case, and the petition could not be received.

The Earl of Thanet then presented a petition from Thomas Dugood, of the parish of St. Paul, Covent-garden, in the city of Westminster, which was read, as follows:

"That your petitioner is a parentless and friendless boy, seventeen years of age, who, until lately seized by two police-officers and sent to prison by the police, obtained the honest means of living by the sale of Religious and Moral Tracts, which he used to purchase of Mr. Collins of Paternoster-row.

"That your petitioner has, for more than four months last past, lodged, and he still lodges, at the house of Keeran Shields, who lives at No. 13, Get's-court, Oxford-street, and who is a cater to Mr. White of Mortimer-street, and who is also a watchman in Marylebone parish.

"That your petitioner has never in his life lived as a vagrant, but has always had a settled home, has always pursued an honest and visible means of getting his living, has always been, and is ready to prove that he always has been an industrious, a peaceable, sober, honest, and orderly person.

"That, on the 10th of January 1817, your petitioner, for having pulled down a posting bill, printed by J. Downes, who is the printer to the police, and which bill was entitled, 'Mr. Hunt hissed out of the city of Bristol,' was committed by Mr. Sellon, to the new prison, Clerkenwell, where he was kept on bread and water, and compelled to lie on the bare boards until the twenty-second of the same month, when he was tied, with about fifty others, to a long rope, or cable, and marched to Hicks's Hall, and there let loose.

"That your petitioner has often heard it said, that the law affords protection to the poor as well as the rich, and that, if unable to obtain redress any where else, every subject of his Majesty has the road of petition open to him; therefore your petitioner, being unable to obtain redress in any other manner for the grievous wrongs done him by the Magistrate of the police, most humbly implores your Honourable House to afford him protection and redress, and to that end he prays your Honourable House to permit him to prove at the bar of your Honourable House all and several the allegations contained in this his most humble petition.

"And your petitioner will ever pray."

The Lord Chancellor said, their lordships must be aware that the same objection applied to this petition. The House had no jurisdiction, and could not, consistently with its rules, receive the petition.

No motion was made for either of the petitions lying on the table, and the matter dropped.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRINCE REGENT.] Lord Sidmouth presented a message to the House from the Prince Regent, which was read by the Lord Chancellor, as follows :—

"His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, has given orders that there be laid before the House of Lords papers containing information respecting certain practices, meetings, and combinations in the metropolis, and in different parts of the kingdom, evidently calculated to endanger the public tranquillity, to alienate the affections of his Majesty's subjects from his Majesty's person and government, and to bring into hatred and contempt the whole system of our laws and constitution.

"His Royal Highness recommends to the House of Lords to take these papers into their immediate and serious consideration."

Lord Sidmouth laid the papers on the table, and moved, that the message be taken into consideration to-morrow.

THANKS TO LORD EXMOUTH.] Lord Melville rose to move the thanks of the House to Lord Viscount Exmouth, &c. for the successful result of the attack upon Algiers. His lordship briefly stated some of the particulars of the attack, and mentioned an additional incident shewing the skill and judgment of Lord Exmouth; that his lordship having, previously to leaving London, minutely detailed to the Admiralty his plan of attack, it was found on the receipt of the dispatches that the actual attack corresponded in almost every particular, even the most minute, with the plan previously arranged. After highly praising the conduct of Lord Exmouth, and the officers employed upon that occasion, and the undaunted bravery of the seamen which overcame every difficulty and danger, and also the conduct of the Netherland Admiral Capellen, his lordship concluded by moving the thanks of the House to Lord Viscount Exmouth, G.C.B. to Rear-Admiral Sir David Milne, K.C.B. and the other officers; also a resolution highly approving and acknowledging the bravery of the seamen and the royal marines, and the thanks of the House to Admiral Capellen.

These motions were all agreed to nem. diss.; and another motion to request Lord Exmouth to communicate the thanks to Sir David Milne, and the other officers, after a few words from Lord Viscount Torrington, stating that he had long served under Lord Exmouth, who was one of our best seamen, and whose conduct had, upon other occasions, been deserving of the highest praise, particularly in his saving the public purse, and keeping all his ships well-found, and in a fit state for immediate service.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, February 3.

The Speaker communicated to the House the answer of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to the Address, in which his Royal Highness thanked them for their expressions of loyalty, attachment, and support, which could not fail to produce the happiest effect at the present juncture.

PRIVILEGE.] A message from the House of Lords stated, that their lordships were always desirous to maintain a good understanding with the Commons; that they were not aware, when they requested a conference on Tuesday last, that the Painted Chamber was not in the usual state; that they were not apprised of the elevation of the seats; and that they would give directions immediately, that the place of meeting on such occasions should be restored to its former state.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord A. Hamilton rose to present two petitions upon this subject, one from the inhabitants of Kirkintilloch, the other from the borough of Rutherglen. The peculiar circumstances under which he then addressed the House, required that he should say a few words before he moved that these petitions should be brought up. The short space that had elapsed since the meeting of Parliament had brought forth expressions from the other side of the House, so strong and general, against every species of reform, urged in different petitions, that he thought it incumbent upon him to state, that the present ones prayed for none of those plans; they asked neither for annual parliaments nor universal suffrage (Hear.) He therefore hoped they would not be identified with any of them. They both lamented the exorbitant expenditure of the country: both complained that the petitioners were so harassed with difficulties, they could not exercise any labour which would procure them the necessaries of life; and they concluded, not by presuming to suggest any particular mode of reform, but with hoping that the grievances of which they complained, would be redressed by some plan of reform or other. He should make only one observation more, which he felt it his duty to do when presenting petitions from Scotland upon this subject. He was warranted in saying, that in Scotland there was no representation at all, in any rational sense of the word. (Hear, hear.) A man might possess there 10,000*l.* a-year in property, and another 10,000*l.* in land, and yet not have a single vote of any kind. He must say, therefore, without any disrespect to other parts of the United Empire, that petitions from that country were entitled to the peculiar consideration of that House. (Hear, hear.) The petitions were then read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Sir F. Burdett presented a petition from the inhabitants of Sheffield, praying for a reform in parliament. Similar petitions were presented by Lord Radcliffe, from Castle-Donington, Leicestershire; by Lord Walpole, from King's Lynn, Norfolk; and by Lord Ebrington, from Honiton, Devonshire. Ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRINCE REGENT.] Lord Castlereagh appeared at the bar with a message from his Royal Highness, similar to that presented to the Lords, for which see page 85. His lordship then moved, that the message be taken into consideration to-morrow.

THANKS TO LORD EXMOUTH.] Lord Castlereagh begged to call the attention of the House to the late brilliant and successful enterprise against Algiers. As to the merit of this splendid service, there existed, he believed, but one sentiment, not only in this country, but throughout all the nations of Europe. It was unnecessary for him to go into those particulars which the illustrious commander had himself so well detailed; but it would be injustice to him, if he did not notice some circumstances. Much had been heard of the facility with which Algiers could be attacked by even a single line-of-battle ship, and that, too, from scientific quarters. There were those, also, entitled to the same attention, who entertained very different opinions, and who thought there would be great difficulty, and a great question of prudence in making the attempt which had succeeded, however, so brilliantly. It was fair to observe, that my Lord Exmouth's opinions steered in a middle course between opposing opinions. Guided by his great knowledge as a sailor, he knew that the effort must be attended with considerable peril and loss, yet was he confident that he could perform this arduous service. He had not only stated distinctly what would be the result of his operations, but also pointed out precisely the mode in which he should make his attack, and the very position in which he should place his own ship. He anticipated every thing with foresight and exactness. He (Lord C.) could add nothing by what he could say to the character of the achievement. It was gratifying to know that the navy of the kingdom of the Netherlands partook in the exertions and glories of the exploit. Nothing could be more congenial to our feelings than to find our arms combined with those of another great maritime nation in the cause of justice and humanity. He concluded with moving the thanks of the House to the right hon. Lord Viscount Exmouth, Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath, for his able, gallant, and successful conduct in the attack on Algiers.

Mr. Laav supported the motion, and expressed his satisfaction that the thanks were to be extended to the officers and seamen of our ally the King of the Netherlands.

Lord Cochrane could only state, that the vote had his most cordial concurrence, for he had never known or heard of any thing more gallant than the manner in which Lord Exmouth laid his ships alongside the Algerine batteries.

The motion was then carried, nemine contradicente, as was also a vote of thanks to Rear-Admiral Milne, after a few observations from Mr. Money; another to the seamen and royal marines, and one to the Dutch Admiral and seamen.

SPANISH PATRIOTS.] Mr. Brougham adverted to a motion made by him during the last session, respecting Mr. Arguelles and other suffering Spanish patriots, and wished to know what had been done respecting their situation.

Lord Castlereagh said, that communications had taken place with the Spanish government, but there was no particular intelligence which he had to lay before the House.

Mr. Brougham asked whether the noble lord would have any objection to lay the correspondence that had passed upon the table?

Lord Castlereagh replied, that it might be imprudent, and even injurious to the individuals themselves, if the correspondence were disclosed.

Mr. Brougham said, that a hint from the noble lord on this subject would be enough to stop his mouth, as the noble lord must certainly be the best judge as to what injury might result from making any communication on this business; but from the noble lord's silence, he supposed he must understand, that government had done all in the matter that they could, though not backed by a vote of parliament; but that all their endeavours had completely failed.

LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT.] Lord Folkestone stated, that he held in his hand a petition from an unfortunate youth, complaining of a most serious violation of the liberty of the subject. He had that morning received from the petitioner a very intelligent statement of his sufferings—that he had been, on the warrant of a police magistrate, committed to the new prison of Clerkenwell—had been there in a dismal dungeon immured for twelve days, with no other subsistence than bread and water. The noble lord had also been enabled to obtain a view of the warrant of his committal, which alleged that he was imprisoned as a vagrant, without any visible means of support. In contradiction the petitioner stated, that at the very moment he was arrested, he had property in his possession to the amount of three shillings and sixpence, in money, in his pocket—that he had resided for above three months in the lodgings he then occupied, and obtained an honest livelihood by the sale of religious and moral tracts. Indeed the boy had written from the prison to his landlady, for the purpose of assuring her, that he had not absconded from his lodgings, accompanied with a request that she should bring him some money of his which remained at her house. On the last day of the sessions the boy was brought up with twelve other persons, tied together with a rope, and was then discharged. Such a statement called for the most serious and prompt investigation at all times, but when it was recollected, that during the last year the most nefarious crimes were brought home to police officers, and strong suspicions to police magistrates, and that no notice appeared to be taken of that conduct by the department of state under whose superintendence these police magistrates were, he sincerely trusted, that the House would feel the present case an enormous invasion of the rights of the subject, which loudly demanded its interference. (Gries of hear, hear.)

The petition, which was couched in the same words as that presented to the Lords, (for which see page 84.) was then brought up and read.

Lord Folkestone then moved that the petition be referred to a committee of the House.

Mr. Hilcy Addington assured the House, that he knew nothing more of the case described by the noble mover, and brought forward in the petition, than what he had read in the public papers. None of the facts or allegations had come to him through any other channel. He had seen the examination of the boy stated in a report from one of the police offices, and had afterwards read, that one of two individuals who had taken up his cause had said, that he meant first to have laid the case before parliament, but that upon subsequent consideration he had altered his mind, and meant to make a representation on the subject to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. No communication, however, had been made to the office of the Home Secretary; if there had, he could assure the House that every attention would have been paid to it, and that the fullest and strictest investigation of all the circumstances would have taken place in the most prompt and zealous manner. (Hear, hear.)

The Hon. Mr. Bennet was surprised that the right hon. Secretary had not made one observation about the motion for a committee. Was he against it? (No, no, from several parts of the House.) He could not help, since he was up, making one remark on the place where this poor boy was confined. He thought it utterly disgraceful to the country. (Hear, hear.) No man kept a pack of hounds in such a wretched place, and with such wretched accommodations, as these poor creatures were confined to. (Hear, hear.)

The Attorney-General would ask the House whether it was proper that this case should be examined in parliament in the first instance, or whether it would not be better to adopt a different course, and apply to a court of law for remedy? The petition complained of false imprisonment—of an illegal act. The petitioner stated, that “he had often heard it said, that the law affords protection to the poor as well as the rich;” and when he had heard it so said, he heard what was in this country practically true. (Hear, hear.) Let therefore a legal remedy be first sought, and if unable to obtain redress in the regular manner, let him then exercise his right to petition the legislature. If this petition was received, the application of no person who complained, in similar circumstances, of personal restraint, could be refused, and the functions of parliament would thus be confounded with those of courts of law. The boy, it might be said, was young, but could he not sue by his guardians? If his poverty was stated as an objection, it was open for him to sue in formâ pauperis.

Mr. H. Addington submitted to the noble mover, whether it would not be more correct and becoming to postpone his motion for a committee for a day or two, so as to allow time to inquire into the circumstances. If the noble lord did so, he would pledge himself to enter fully into the investigation, and inform the House of the result. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Folkestone had no objection to postpone the appointment of a committee till a previous investigation of the circumstances by the Home Secretary, provided no delay intervened.—Thursday was then suggested as the time when information might be expected, and his lordship consented to postpone the appointment of the committee till that day.

Lord Castlereagh would not consent to consider the question for a committee as carried, but suggested that the regular course would be for the noble lord to withdraw his motion, and bring it forward afterwards as he should see meet.

Lord Folkestone said, there was only one alternative in which he would consent to withdraw his motion, and that was in case the learned Attorney-General, who had recommended to the petitioner to apply for a legal remedy, and to sue in formâ pauperis, would consent to direct the proper steps for obtaining redress, and pledge himself to be his advocate. This was a case peculiarly demanding the interference of parliament. The petitioner was poor, and could not gain admission to the courts of justice in such circumstances as would excite attention to his sufferings, or obtain good legal advice. There was another reason why it should be considered by parliament. The boy was committed, not by the ordinary magistrates of the country, but by police magistrates, almost new to our constitution, appointed by the Crown, paid by the Crown, and removable at the pleasure of the Crown. The act for which the boy was committed was one connected with political principles. The conduct of these magistrates should therefore be narrowly watched.

The Attorney-General observed, that in his capacity of law officer of the Crown he could not be the advocate of the petitioner, and in any other capacity he could not be required to support his cause by any parliamentary application. He could say, however, that if the course he had recommended were followed, there would be no want of legal advice and assistance. If it were stated to the court that he applied to sue in formâ pauperis, it would not be difficult to find counsel at the British bar, the most eminent and learned in their profession, who would plead his cause with as much zeal, perseverance, and ability, as if he were the richest subject in the kingdom.

Mr. Brougham said, that though the Attorney-General could not be called upon, as law officer of the Crown, in the present stage of the proceedings, to be counsel in supporting the cause of the petitioner, he might subsequently be required to be so by a vote of the House. He (Mr. B.) did not wish to prejudge the case, ignorant as he was of the circumstances. The primâ facie view he allowed was bad, and demanded the most serious consideration and inquiry. The only question at present was, could there be any inconvenience in letting the appointment of the committee lie over for a few days, till the promised investigation was made by the Home Department; it being understood, that in the event of the result being unsatisfactory, the fullest inquiry would take place by the committee? There was a standing committee of grievances to whom the petition might be referred.

Lord A. Hamilton declared, that if the question was pressed to a vote, he should be obliged to support the motion of the noble lord, as leaning most to the liberty of the subject. No one, in the present unparalleled distresses of the country, should be considered as criminal, and sent to prison, because he had no visible means of livelihood. A charge of this kind might be brought against too many of those who were formerly in affluent circumstances, and who had been reduced to a state in which "they had no visible means of support" by no fault of their own.

Sir F. Burdett was of opinion, that the boy could not procure a real effectual remedy by the legal course recommended. There was a considerable difficulty in suing in forma pauperis. The petitioner must have counsel to sign an application, stating that he was a proper person to sue in that capacity; and it would not probably be easy to find a counsel who would expose himself to suspicion by such a transaction, considering that he would be acting against government. (Hebr.) He could call the boy's commitment nothing else than an act of the Government. The real cause of it was for pulling down a handbill, prepared as he was informed, and posted up by the police itself, against an individual obnoxious to Government. Another difficulty in the way of suing in formâ pauperis was this—that the boy, although he had not means to bring an action in any other capacity, might still have so much property as would deprive him of all title to such a mode of obtaining redress. The question involved in this petition was peculiarly fit for Parliamentary consideration, as it affected the liberty of the subject. Although such were his ideas, he would advise the noble lord to wait a few days till the promised investigation took place. If, however, he pressed his motion for the committee at present, he (Sir F.) would be bound to support it; as he thought the principle attempted to be laid down was wrong, that because redress of a grievance could be obtained elsewhere, therefore the House should not be applied to.

The Attorney-General, in answer to Sir Francis Burdett, said, that there were men at the British bar who would do their duty without any regard to the political opinions of those whose interests they were intrusted with supporting.

Lord Folkstone would not consent to withdraw his motion, unless he understood that it would appear on the journals of the House.

The Speaker informed the noble lord, that this and every other motion was entered on the journals of the House, whatever fate attended it. The noble lord might follow his own course: he would give him no directions; but assured him of the usual practice.

Lord Cochrane entered into some charges against the police. The handbills that were pulled down, and the pulling down of which exposed the petitioner to the oppression of the magistrates, had been printed by Doroves, the printer for the offices. Ministers, upon inquiry, would be able to state to the House the most exceptionable conduct; but if there were no committee appointed, the matter could not be sifted to the bottom. The objection made to a Parliamentary inquiry before the case was brought before a court of justice would be still stronger after a judicial decision. It was now said, let there be no committee till the case is tried: it would afterwards be said, with as much effect, let there be no committee, because the case has been tried; so that in neither case could the aggrieved expect redress.

Mr. Ponsonby expressed a wish that the noble lord would withdraw his motion till the promised report was made by the right hon. secretary. The fullest investigation had been promised: and if he would not consent to withdraw his motion, he might move as an amendment, that the consideration of it be deferred till the report of his Majesty's Minister be received. The matter was of the greatest importance. Justice must be done to all parties. Even if a verdict were obtained in favour of the petitioner in a court of law, such a result might not be thought sufficient to render farther Parliamentary proceedings on the subject unnecessary. He did not doubt but that many gentlemen of the bar would be found willing to support the cause of the petitioner; but he was uncertain whether, even though he sued in formâ pauperis, stamp duties must not be paid.

The Attorney-General said, that persons suing in formâ pauperis were not liable to the payment of stamp duties.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table: the motion for a reference to a Committee being withdrawn, under the expressed pledge that the home department would forthwith institute an investigation, and speedily inform the House of the result.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee, the speaker left the chair, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that a supply be granted to his Majesty.

Mr. Calcraft was anxious to know, whether at a crisis so alarming in every point of view as the present, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had any intention to alleviate the intolerable pressure of taxation? It was obvious to every man conversant with the state of the country, that unless some such alleviation was effected, the people could not be maintained by their labour, even supposing they had now full opportunity of labouring. Immense sacrifices had been made by the public; burden after burden had been imposed, and patiently endured with the pleasing, yet now delusive hope, that the return of peace would bring happiness and prosperity. Yet what had been the consequence of making such sacrifices? Our industrious and once prosperous mechanics were now reduced to the humble situation of depending for support on the poor-rates, and were totally bereft of all those comforts to which their industry had intitled them. Now, when such was the case, when there existed not even a probability of labour being paid for, he asked whether his Majesty's Ministers were still determined to persevere in the present system of taxation? and whether it might not be infinitely better for them to remove some of the taxes, by applying part of the Sinking Fund to the services of the present year? This was certainly the more preferable mode of going to work; and he wished to know, whether it was likely to meet with the support of Ministers?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it was premature now to enter into the question: whatever his own opinion on the mode of supply might be, he should deem it his duty to withhold any statement of that opinion till the House were in possession of the accounts.

Mr. Calcraft wished to be informed, whether the noble lord would nominate the committee, or proceed by ballot?

Lord Castlereagh declined any answer till he had time to give his reasons for adopting the line of conduct he meant to pursue.

The House then resumed, when

Mr. Croker brought up some papers formerly ordered by the House, respecting the salaries of the secretaries of the Admiralty.—Ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, February 4.

PRINCE REGENT'S MESSAGE.] Lord Sidmouth (the order of the day being read) rose to propose an answer to the message which he had last night presented from the Prince Regent. Their lordships might believe, it was not without the most painful feelings his Royal Highness found himself under the necessity of making such a communication. It was, indeed, a most afflicting circumstance both to that illustrious personage and to his advisers, to feel themselves called upon by their sense of duty to the country, to inform their lordships that there did exist meetings and combinations in different parts of the country, for the purpose of endeavouring to alienate from his Majesty the affections of his subjects, to bring his person and government into hatred and contempt, to endanger the liberty of the subject, and to overthrow the whole scheme and system of our laws and constitution: and their lordships might easily believe, that such a communication would not have been made without the strongest conviction of its urgent and indispensable necessity. The Address which he would have the honour to propose would pledge their lordships to nothing except to an examination of the evidence; for, as to the ulterior proceedings, he not only did not call on them to give any pledge, but he would not choose to be himself considered as pledged. When this motion should be disposed of, he should propose, that the papers communicated by his Royal Highness be referred to a committee of secrecy; and all that he had to request in the mean time was, that their lordships would abstain from making up their minds until the whole subject should be investigated. There was only one other point to which he felt it his duty to call the attention of their lordships, as it was material that it should be noticed. The atrocious outrage lately committed against the Prince Regent was certainly regarded with the utmost horror and reprobation by an overwhelming majority of the nation; and he felt it his duty to state, that the present communication was not at all connected with that outrage. Though that atrocious, that horrid outrage against the royal dignity had not been committed, his Royal Highness's advisers, with the information in their possession, would have still felt it their indispensable duty to have brought forward this proceeding, originating in a message from the Prince Regent, to be followed by a reference of the papers to a committee of secrecy. He moved, therefore, that an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness, thanking him for his gracious communication, and to assure him that their lordships would proceed to take the papers laid on the table into their immediate and most serious consideration.

Earl Grosvenor rose, not to object to the motion, which was put into such a shape that it could not be reasonably opposed, but merely to say, that this was a most tremendous charge against a majority or a large proportion of the people of this nation, and one which he hoped could not be sustained. Of this, however, he was convinced, that these meetings and combinations, if they did exist, were mainly provoked by the conduct of Ministers themselves, who had set their faces against economy and retrenchment, and every species of reform.

Lord Holland did not rise to oppose the motion, because it was impossible for him at present to determine whether this proceeding did really originate from the existence of meetings and combinations to such an extent, and of such a nature as to call for the extraordinary proceeding of interference by Parliament, or whether it was a practice by certain persons, either in or out of power, to create a false alarm. It was only yesterday that a petition was presented to their lordships, complaining of the hardships endured by an individual, in consequence of an alleged flagrant violation of the liberty of the subject. That petition had been in effect rejected; and on what ground?—that the petitioner had his remedy at common law. He admitted that the rejection of the petition on that ground was proper; but he trusted their lordships would act with due impartiality on this most important occasion, and deal out the same equal justice to the great, the exalted, and powerful, as they had dealt to the humble, the friendless, and unprotected; and it would therefore be necessary for Ministers to prove, not only that such meetings and combinations existed, but that a remedy for the evil was not to be had from the ordinary law of the land; for nothing short of this would justify their calling for the interference of Parliament: that was the principle which ought always to regulate their proceedings in matters of this kind, and more particularly in the present circumstances of the country. They had no foreign war at present to increase any alarm that might be felt from these alleged meetings and combinations, and the distress of the people was such, that nothing, if possible, ought to be done of a tendency to alienate their affections from the constitution: but every thing on the contrary ought to be done that could by possibility be done, to secure their attachment and fidelity, and to relieve their distresses, real and supposed. He agreed that this was not the time to say any thing as to the ulterior proceedings, and he hoped that all their lordships would come to the consideration of this momentous subject with minds impartial and unbiassed; but still he might be permitted most deeply to lament the necessity of this proceeding, supposing it to be necessary, if it should lead to the adoption of any ulterior measures tending to abridge the liberty of the subject. This, under any circumstances, was a great and tremendous evil, and would be so more particularly under the present overwhelming distress of the country. It had been at least a consolation to many, in observing the meetings of great bodies of people during these last five months, to see that they always looked to Parliament for relief, and a remedy for their grievances and distresses: and it would be for the noble lord to explain why, under such circumstances, the meeting of Parliament was postponed from time to time; and why, when Parliament had been at length assembled, the very first measure proposed for consideration was one which implied a distrust and jealousy of the state of the public mind. He would come to the consideration of the subject with an unbiassed judgment; but he confessed he did think it a circumstance of fearful omen, that this should be the first great question to which their attention was called; though the noble viscount had candidly stated, that it had no connexion with that outrage against the person and dignity of the Regent which no respectable member of the community could think of without abhorrence. He had on a former occasion, when a proceeding of this nature was under consideration, (alluding to the proceedings with respect to the frame-breakers), stated, that he considered the circumstance of the noble lord himself being in power, as affording some sort of security that nothing tending to abridge the liberty of the subject would be rashly adopted, and that extraordinary powers when given, would not be abused: but from what he had lately observed, he could not keep his mind entirely free from the suspicion, that in that point he had been mistaken. This however was, as he conceived, perfectly clear—that the danger must be completely made out to the satisfaction of every honest man in the nation, and the necessity for giving some extraordinary powers to the Executive Government ought to be proved beyond the reach of question or doubt, before Parliament could be justified in adopting any ulterior proceedings, tending to abridge the liberty of the subject.

The Earl of Liverpool did not think it necessary to trouble their lordships with more than a very few words in the present stage of this proceeding, as both the noble lords who had spoken before him agreed that there could be no objection to the course now recommended, whatever it might be thought expedient to do when the committee should have made its report: and, as far as the matter had as yet gone, he could not conceive how a more fair and candid course could have been adopted. The general subject was necessarily noticed in the speech of his Royal Highness: but that speech had been framed with an anxious wish not to pledge Parliament as to the question, whether any further measures ought, with a view to the internal peace of the country, or for any other reasons, to be adopted. But their lordships could not but agree, that if the Prince Regent's advisers had important information as to the practices referred to in the speech and address, they would not have done their duty if they had not advised his Royal Highness to communicate the information to Parliament, that it might be at least submitted to the consideration of a select committee; no individual being, by that proceeding, committed, as to the nature of the ulterior proceedings to be adopted, or as to the adoption of any ulterior proceedings at all. With respect to the assertion of a noble earl, that this was a tremendous charge against a majority of the people of this country, there was no such charge either in the speech from the throne, or in the message of yesterday; on the contrary, it had been held out, that the fullest confidence was placed in the loyalty and fidelity of the great body of the people. His noble friend who spoke last had urged the existing distresses of the country as a particular reason why no ulterior proceedings should be adopted, unless justified by the most indispensable necessity. It was necessity alone that could justify them at any time; but that necessity was increased rather than diminished when it was considered that many of the well-disposed, though uninformed, might be misled more easily by the artful and designing in a season of general and severe pressure: and the Executive ought not to be insensible to the dangers that might result to the Government and Constitution of the country from that source. Supineness and indifference in the Executive might be attended with the most fatal consequences; and it had been the care of the advisers of the Crown not to exhibit that supineness and indifference, but at least to call the attention of Parliament to the subject. Their lordships would look at the matter with candour and impartiality, with every disposition to refrain from infringing the liberty of the subject, but also with a resolution not to permit any encroachment on the Constitution.

Earl Grosvenor in explanation said, that the charge must be supposed to have been brought against a large portion of the people, otherwise it would have been idle and unnecessary to have called the attention of their lordships to the subject.

Earl Grey did not know that any reasonable objection could be made to the motion now before their lordships; for, when a message came down with a communication that such practices existed, and threatened such dangerous consequences as were stated in the message, it was the duty of the House to send that information to a committee to be examined. Whether the dangers were really such as required the adoption of any ulterior measures by Parliament, they would have to decide when the whole subject should be examined and the report came before them: and till then he should suspend his judgment: but he could not help lamenting, that under the present circumstances of the country, any necessity should have arisen, even in the opinion of the noble lords themselves, for coming to Parliament with such a communication. They had done no more than justice to the great body of the people, when they had expressed the fullest reliance on their attachment to the laws and constitution, even under circumstances of the severest pressure. While exposed to hardships and distress almost unparalleled, distress extending from the lowest to the highest ranks in the community, the people had displayed a patience, fortitude, resignation, and confidence in the Parliament and constitution of their country, which had never been exhibited, under such circumstances, by the people of any other country on earth. But if such were the effects produced by the constitution of this country, the Executive Government, their lordships, and Parliament in general, ought to consider well before they did any thing that could impair the confidence of the people in that constitution. The noble lord (Sidmouth) had adjured their lordships to come to the consideration of this subject without favour, without affection, and without partiality; and he (Earl Grey) now repeated that adjuration, and called upon their lordships to come to the consideration of the subject with the most rigid impartiality, and with minds as averse to the diminution of the liberty of the subject as they were favourably disposed towards the preservation and security of the Crown. They had lately done much, in addition to what had been done by their ancestors, for the safeguard and protection of the Crown; but he did not know that, in addition to what had been done by their ancestors, they had established one safeguard for the security of the rights and privileges of the people. They had seen the effects produced among the people by the blessings of a free constitution; and he hoped that nothing but the most urgent and the most paramount necessity, clearly and incessantly proved, and the absolute impossibility of applying a remedy by any other means than the interference of Parliament, would induce their lordships to touch the least particle of the liberty of the subject.

The Marquis of Buckingham concurred with noble lords who had already spoken, that it was deeply to be regretted, that the Prince Regent's advisers should have found it necessary, even according to their views of the circumstances, to have come down to the House with this communication; and he should still more deeply lament, that this should have been the case, if it should turn out that any ulterior proceedings were necessary. The responsibility however, rested with the Ministers. They were entitled, by the course which they had adopted, to call upon their lordships to send these papers to a committee, and to have the evidence examined on which they brought forward so serious a charge: and their responsibility would be tremendous, if they failed. He would apply himself to that examination with the same impartiality, with the same freedom from undue bias of any description, as if he were to sit a judge on a trial in a case of life and death. In many instances it was, perhaps, impossible to divest the mind entirely of all party or other partialities: there was no danger, however, of such influence on the present occasion for if there was any subject in the consideration of which the mind must be divested of every feeling of partiality, it was this. The Prince Regent's advisers must prove, not merely that such meetings and combinations existed, but also shew that the ordinary law of the land was incompetent to meet the danger; for if they merely proved the existence of such meetings and combinations, then he would say, that only half the case had been proved. The noble earl (Liverpool) argued, as if he conceived that the greater the distresses of the country, the more necessary it was to add to the power of the Executive Government. That, however, was not enough; for it would be incumbent on the Ministers to prove, that the ordinary law was insufficient to meet the evil. But if it should appear that the evil was of too great a magnitude to be repressed by the power of the ordinary law, then he would say, that it was necessary to arm with extraordinary powers, not that or this particular administration, but the constitution of the country. The constitution itself must then have additional powers for its own defence, and nothing could be more weak, more fatal to the people themselves, than that false humanity which left them exposed to the arts and delusions of those, few in number, but desperate in disposition, who, for the worst of purposes, endeavoured to mislead them; who, under the pretence of calling the attention of the people to their grievances, and the remedies for them, turned away their attention from their real grievances, and the real and true remedies, and filled their minds with imaginary grievances, and the most delusive, visionary, and dangerous plans of relief.

The Address was then agreed to.

Lord Sidmouth then moved, that the papers on the table should be to-morrow referred to a committee of secrecy, consisting of 11 lords, to be then chosen by ballot.—This motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, Feb. 4.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] The Sheriffs of London presented a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, praying for economy, and for reform in the representation. Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane presented a petition for reform from Hamilton, in Lanarkshire. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. W. Smith said, he had a petition to present from Norwich; but he must decline giving any opinion on the contents, because he thought that the claim upon a member to give such opinion was imposing upon him a task which was at the same time both invidious and useless—invidious, because it called on an individual member to state an opinion as to the wording of a petition, which opinion was imagined to have a certain degree of influence upon the House. The claim was useless, since, after any member's declaration, the House might totally disagree with the petition: so that no advantage was to be gained from the individual member's opinion. He then adverted to the case of a rejected petition in 1716, which was refused on the score of improper language. That petition prayed for the repeal of the septennial act, which it styled an overturning of the constitution and subversion of the rights and liberties of the nation. But if the House of Commons would go so far as to double the period of its own existence, he scarcely knew any terms in a petition so strong as to prevent him from thinking it his duty to offer it. It was on the principle involved in the question that he thought it right to decline giving his own opinion with respect to the terms in which the present petition was couched. He moved, that it be brought up, which was ordered.

Mr. C. Wynn said, the rule always laid down by the highest authorities had been, that every member should give the sanction of his own opinion to the matter and expressions of the petition he presented; therefore he could not agree to the principle now maintained. If he looked back to the proceedings of Parliament, he found the great examples of Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt, who were as anxious as any members to support the just rights of petitioners. They had presented petitions of which they stated that they did not approve the prayer; but then they said they had read them, and did not see anything in them offensive or disrespectful to the House. The hon. member (Mr. W. Smith) seemed to treat this as nugatory, because the House could reject a petition: but was it really a point of indifference to the House to act on such questions as a mere matter of course, and thereby be compelled to hear a train of expressions offensive in themselves, and unconnected with the subject on which the petition was founded? At this rate, a petition of the size of a quarto volume might be brought up and read, filled with extraneous and offending matter, till the House was quite tired out with hearing it. He was sorry to be obliged to oppose receiving a petition under the present circumstances. He had said to persons who had brought petitions to him, that he was willing to present them, but sometimes they had run to too great a length, or contained what might cause their rejection, and he had then recommended the parties to amend and alter them. It was much the better way to take any offensive matter out of a petition before presenting it. He saw no one benefit likely to arise from any alteration of the uniform and established practice of the House. There must obviously be great inconvenience in being obliged to sit and hear all sorts of insult. He had, on a former occasion, alluded to the circumstances of the Kentish petition. The House, after hearing offensive language, had no way of animadverting upon it but by the rejection of the petition which contained them. The former practice had been to state objections to petitions on the question of bringing them up. It would be a subject of regret if all petitions were to be read as a matter of course. He should regret deeply if petitions were rejected merely because they contained passages which expressed sentiments contrary to the opinions of the majority of the House. He saw no way more effectual for all desirable purposes, than to inquire the opinion of a member as to the character of a petition: and it was the best mode of avoiding the painful necessity of rejection after being read.

Mr. Lockhart had always understood it to be the duty of a member to read a petition, and to state, if asked, whether it contained any thing offensive: but he did not understand that when the petition was offered it was necessary to say it was not offensive, unless the member was called upon for that purpose.

The Speaker said, the practice and usage was as he had on a former occasion stated it, and as it had been that night stated by an hon. member. It was the right of the House to expect from every member who presented a petition, that he was satisfied that it contained nothing intentionally disrespectful.

Lord Castlereagh said, the practice of the House, on these points, proceeded on wisdom, and a fair view of every principle of order and propriety. They should be very loth to depart from what had been stated by the highest parliamentary authorities to be the established and undoubted practice. A painful doubt might sometimes exist in the minds of Members; but the House must look to the extent of the inconveniences which any alteration of their practice might occasion; and also to the degradation they must experience, if they were to hear every calumny and reproach which the wicked imaginations of mankind might presume to throw upon them, and which might be entered upon their journals. They ought therefore, from a sense of duty, to interpose and prevent themselves from being accessory to libels upon Parliament and the representation in that House. If a member brought a petition and was not quite satisfied with it, the difficulty might be stated, and then, on a motion, the question of hearing it or not could be decided.

Sir Francis Burdett hoped the House would not persevere in a system of refusal that seemed so unjust. The propriety of presenting a petition, as far as it depended on its language, must, after all that could be said on the subject, rest with the judgment of the individual member who undertook to present it. A petition might contain much that was irrelevant or impertinent to the matter of its prayer; but petitioners must use such language as was necessary to state the nature of their complaints, and the objects they sought, however unpleasant such language might be, more particularly when they described the conduct and composition of the House.

Mr. B. Bathurst thought the House had no security from insult, unless one of their own body would undertake to say that there was nothing offensive in the petitions he presented.

Mr. W. Smith said, that few could be more disposed than he was to bow to the authority of the chair; but the doctrine of his hon. friend (Mr. Wynn) went to the extent, that an objection might be made to a petition on account of its length. This would be a difficult matter to arrange. If a petition were too long, there might be a reason for not reading it through; but much must depend on the nature of the subject. They ought to shew great attention to public petitions. One on the subject of Parliamentary Reform could not be supposed to be very agreeable in its statements to many members of that House; particularly when petitioners supposed that all their grievances arose from the want of better representation. He was at the disposal of the House; but must protest against taking away the right of his constituents to petition Parliament.

Mr. Canning deprecated the discussion of the abstract question when unnecessary, but would vote against the bringing up of the petition unless the rules of the House were complied with.

Mr. Brougham observed, that if it was understood to be the duty of every member who presented a petition, that he should have previously read it, there should be an equal understanding in the House, that confidence should be reposed in his discretion, and that no other member, nor even the House itself, should go into that extraordinary, that unjustifiable, and novel practice of putting interrogatories to members in the exercise of their duty, and acting to the best of their judgment. He protested against such questions being put to every member who appeared with a petition—"Have you read the petition, do you approve of its language, is it temperate in its expressions, and respectful to the House; or if it is not, what think you of it?"

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, on the present occasion no one had asked the member for Norwich any question about the petition.

The question was then put from the chair, that the petition be brought up, which was negatived without a division.

Sir F. Burdett presented petitions from the town of Leicester, and Leigh in Lancashire, praying for Reform in Parliament. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Brougham said, he had a petition to present from the county palatine of Lancaster, which, if true, (and the facts were sworn to in two affidavits, regularly taken before a magistrate), demanded the most serious consideration of the House. It appeared, that a petition, the most guarded and temperate, praying for reform, had been signed by about 700 inhabitants of Warrington. To this, one should have thought no objection could have been offered; but it was forcibly seized by Richard Burrough in the street, while being carried round for signature: it was then taken by Thomas Lyon to the house of Mr. Coates, a magistrate, where the petitioners applied for it: but it was not restored to them. They then drew up the present petition, complaining of this obstruction.

The petition was brought up and read.

Mr. Brougham would only at present move, that it should lie on the table, because some farther information might be expected on the subject. Ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE REGENT.] Lord Castlereagh, in rising to move an address to His Royal Highness in answer to his gracious message, was confident, that in the one he meant to propose he should encounter no opposition, nor excite any difference of opinion. It would merely go the length of thanking His Royal Highness for his gracious communication, and assuring him that the House would take it early into its serious consideration. He would not say one word on the situation of the country, that could raise a question, feeling as he did, that the House was not in possession of the requisite information to form an opinion, or to lead to any useful discussion. No hon. member could be at all prepared for any thing that he could say, and he therefore could do no more than beg the House to keep their minds unprejudiced and unbiassed, for perusing the information now laid on the table, and for coming to that decision upon it, which a regard to the interests and constitution of the country would warrant. He was only bound in duty to make one observation in consequence of some erroneous statements that had gone abroad, that the present message originated in the late outrage offered to the person of His Royal Highness. However much that outrage had excited the horror and reprobation of both sides of the House, and of all parts of the Country (Hear, hear,) he could assure the House that the present communication was not made in consequence of it; but that His Majesty's Ministers, in the discharge of their duties to the Country and to the Throne, had thought themselves bound to advise His Royal Highness to make this communication before that circumstance occurred:—The noble lord having again deprecated all discussion on the present occasion as premature, and besought a calm and unbiassed consideration of the information laid before Parliament, moved, that an humble address be presented to His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, thanking him for his gracious message, and assuring him, that the House would early take the information that he commanded to be laid before it into its most serious consideration. The address being seconded, and read from the chair, it was carried nem. con.

Lord Castlereagh then moved successively, 1. That the papers containing the communication from the Crown be referred to a committee. 2. That this committee be secret. 3. That it consist of 21 Members. 4. That it be chosen by ballot. 5. That the Members of the House prepare a list of 21, to be put into a glass, to compose the said committee. 6. That the papers remain on the table as they are, till the said committee be chosen. All which motions were agreed to.

LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT.] Mr. H. Addington said, he had taken the earliest opportunity of enquiring into the facts contained in the petition presented last night by a noble lord, (Folkestone.) He had only yet been able to learn that the boy was committed by a gentleman who was not a police magistrate.—He would make further enquiry, of which he would communicate the result to the House.

Lord Cochrane presented a petition from Mr. Henry Hunt.—It was the same as that presented to the House of Lords, for which see page 83. The noble lord stated, that he had read it, and found nothing offensive in its language.

Mr. Sergeant Best thought the petitioner had taken an extraordinary course in offering his complaint to the House, which could not examine evidence upon oath, when the courts of law were open to him. The circumstance that duplicates of the hand-bills were found in the police offices, was no proof that they were manufactured under the superintendence of the police magistrates. The facts alleged should be examined into by evidence given upon oath, and should not be brought before Parliament in the first instance, otherwise the House would be converted into a court for the correction of magistrates, instead of the usual tribunal for deciding on such complaints.

Sir F. Burdett said, the question at present was only whether the petition should be read; and he could conceive no objection to that, after what had been stated by the noble lord about his reading it, and approving of its language.

Mr. Ponsonby and Mr. Canning spoke to the same effect.

The petition was then brought up and read.

Lord Cochrane moved that it lie on the table.

Lord Castlereagh did not object to its lying on the table, like the petition of yesterday, but would oppose any proceeding that might be moved for on either. Ordered to lie on the table.

CAPE OF GOOD-HOPE.—MALTA.] A Bill was read the first time for regulating the commerce with the Cape of Good-Hope.

The House went to the order of the day for a committee on the Malta trade.

Mr. F. Robinson observed, that there had been originally some objections against introducing the port of Gibraltar into the existing regulations: but it appeared now, that it would be advantageous to do so, and at the same time to extend more facilities to the trade in that quarter. He moved some amendments to the Malta Trade Bill, which were agreed to, and leave was given to bring in a bill to comprehend the port of Gibraltar.

An account of Exchequer Bills was presented: also,

An account of the unfunded debt of Ireland, which was ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, February 5.

At four o'clock, the House proceeded to ballot for the choice of a committee, to examine the Papers referred to in the Prince Regent's Message.

The lists having been put into a glass, a committee of scrutiny was appointed, consisting of the Earl of Aberdeen, Earl Mulgrave, Viscount Hood, Viscount Melville, Lord Douglas of Lochleven, and the Bishop of Oxford.

On their return the Earl of Aberdeen reported, that the choice of the House had fallen upon

The Lord Chancellor	The Earl of Liverpool
The Lord President (Earl of Harrowby)	The Earl of Powis
The Duke of Bedford	The Earl of St Germain
The Earl Graham (Duke of Montrose)	Lord Viscount Sidmouth
The Earl Fitzwilliam	Lord Grenville
	Lord Redesdale

On the motion of the Earl of Aberdeen, it was ordered that the Committee have power to meet when, where, and as often as they please.

The first meeting to be on Friday.

THANKS TO LORD EXMOUTH.] The Lord Chancellor communicated the Thanks of the House to Lord Exmouth, who was in attendance in his place.

Lord Exmouth returned his best thanks to the House for this high, distinguished, and honourable testimony of their approbation. He was sure that the gallant admirals, and all the officers and crews engaged in the contest, equally with himself would feel animated in their loyalty, and in their zeal and devotion to the public service, when they found their exertions so highly appreciated.

The address and reply were ordered to be entered on the Journals.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, February 5.

Lord George Beresford brought up the answer of the Prince Regent to the Address on the marriage of the Princess Mary with the Duke of Gloucester.

THANKS TO LORD EXMOUTH.] The Speaker informed the House, that he had received a letter from Lord Exmouth, expressing the high gratification of his lordship at receiving their thanks, which he should communicate to the officers and crews of the fleet, who, with himself, would consider it as the greatest reward they could receive for their humble services. His lordship would also communicate the same to Admiral Cappellen, and the fleet of our allies.

Lord Castlereagh, advertng to an omission in the vote of Thanks to Lord Exmouth, and the officers and men under his command, in the conquest of Algiers, of the royal artillery and engineers employed in the service, moved, "That they should be added to the list of those to whom the thanks of the House were voted." They, together with the sappers and miners, were accordingly added.

COMMITTEE OF SECRECY.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for proceeding to ballot for the committee of secrecy, which was agreed to, and the ballot ordered to proceed.

The Speaker then desired the clerk to read over the names of the members of the House in the order of their counties: and desired such members as had prepared lists of names for the committee, to deliver them at the table.

The clerk then read over the names of the members in the order of their counties, which occupied a considerable time. Many members deposited their lists in the glass on the table.

The Speaker desired the clerk to read over, in the same order, the names of all those members who had not answered to the first call: which the second clerk accordingly did. The Speaker observed, that it would then be necessary to appoint a committee to ascertain those members on whom the choice of the House had fallen to compose the committee.

Mr. Brougham rose and observed, that there was a considerable loss of time in the present mode of proceeding in the election of a Committee of Secrecy. About an hour had been occupied in receiving the lists, and after this they must appoint scrutineers, who must retire and cast up the numbers, and then decide who are precisely the twenty-one members elected for the committee, as the individuals chosen freely and deliberately for an investigation, which might be so important to the interests of the country. The practice of balloting had unquestionably many recommendations for cases of this description; and the time it occupied was of little consequence when compared with the probabilities of a fair, due, and unbiased election: but, notwithstanding all this, he thought the time of the House might have been conveniently saved on this occasion had the noble lord merely risen, and read over a list of the persons whom he intended to form the committee of secrecy. He believed he might almost venture to predict the names of all the members who would be chosen: so that the business might have been got through without the necessity of any committee of scrutiny, or of going through any sort of arithmetical operation. He should read to the House a list, which he held in his hand, of the members likely to be elected for the committee on a subject of so much importance. Whether that list would turn out to be a true one, the result of the scrutiny would shew.—He then read from paper the names of 21 members, and put it to the House, if this list proved correct, whether the time might not have been saved.

On the question that a committee of scrutiny be appointed,

Lord Castlereagh moved, that Mr. Arbuthnot, Mr. Fremantle, Mr. Macdonald, and another member, be appointed to ascertain the 21 members on whom the election had fallen. Ordered. The scrutineers then withdrew.

After some time had elapsed, (during which the House proceeded with other business) Mr. Brougham appeared at the bar with the report of the Committee. The report was read, and the names of the Committee were as follows:—

Lord Milton,	Solicitor-General,
Right Hon. G. Ponsonby,	Right Hon. G. Canning,
Right Hon. W. Elliott,	Right Hon. C. Yorke,
Lord Castlereagh,	Mr. Wilbraham Egerton,
Lord Lascelles,	Mr. E. B. Wilbraham,
Right Hon. B. Bathurst,	Mr. Willerforce,
Hon. W. Lamb,	Right Hon. W. Dundas,
Sir A. Pigott,	Right Hon. G. Rose,
Hon. Mr. Robinson,	Sir William Curtis,
Right Hon. Sir J. Nicholl,	Admiral Frank.
Attorney-General,

There was a laugh at the conclusion of this list, it being the same as that anticipated by Mr. Brougham.

The list was approved of, and the Committee received instructions to inspect the papers.

FRENCH PRISONERS.—LOAN TO FRANCE.]

Mr. Hammersley moved for the production of accounts of all monies due to this country from France, on account of prisoners of war, and all sums paid on this account during the last ten years. Seeing the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, the hon. gentleman asked him, if Government was a party to the French Loan, at present negotiating in this country?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had no objection to the production of the accounts; as to the French Loan, he replied, Government was no party to it; and in a conversation between him, Mr. Tierney, and Mr. Ponsonby, which ensued, he declared that Government had neither guaranteed, encouraged, or countenanced it in any manner whatever, but that he conceived no law existed against a foreign friendly power negotiating a loan in this country.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Cochrane presented a petition, signed by several thousand persons, who met in Spa-fields, on the 2d of December, praying for Parliamentary Reform, and an Abolition of Sinecures. The petition was couched in respectful language; and he was instructed to say, there was no riot or disturbance. With the exception of a few mad theorists, (the Spenceans), the great body of the people wanted only Parliamentary Reform. He had been surprised to find that a petition had come up from Honiton, presented, and laid on the table, complaining of corruption, and desiring Reform. It was known to the House that these petitioners were corrupt themselves, for they had told him, when he was a candidate for that borough, that “they would vote for Mr. Most,” thereby meaning the man who would give the most money.—The noble lord made some farther observations, and said, he petitioned for Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments.

The petition being read,

Mr. Grenfell said, highly venerating the constitution of the country, which insured the inhabitants a degree of practical liberty unknown to other states, he felt some alarm at the propagation of those doctrines which had been circulated throughout the kingdom, and which he was convinced, if not put down, would lead to revolution.

The petition was then laid upon the table.

Lord Cochrane presented petitions from the borough of Lee, in Lancashire, and from Horsethorth, in Yorkshire, praying for Reform, which were both read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Lord J. Russell presented a petition from the borough of Havistock, complaining of wasteful expenditure, and praying for Reform. It did not pray for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, but left the specific kind of reform necessary, to be determined on by the House.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Harvey presented a petition from the city of Norwich, praying for Reform. The hon. member stated, that it was couched in respectful language, and signed by men of considerable reputation and character, who, whatever were their opinions about the present state of the representation, would support the constitution of the country. The petitioners complained of the magnitude of the civil list, and of the wasteful expenditure of the public money, and prayed for reform as a remedy of the national grievances; but they did not require the wild scheme of Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments. It was read and ordered to lie on the table.

POOR LAWS.] Lord Morpeth presented a petition from owners and occupiers of estates in the parish of Alsted, in the county of Cumberland. It stated, that a great part of the population was thrown out of employment, and prayed for an amelioration of the Poor Laws. Ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House went into a Committee of Supply, when the right hon. gentleman stated, that he had to propose a vote for a very large sum, in order to pay off four distinct classes of bills, amounting in the whole to 28 millions, being 24 millions for England, and 4 millions for Ireland.

The following sums were then severally proposed to the committee, and voted to his Majesty:—

11,000,000*l.* for paying off Exchequer bills issued for the service of Great Britain in 1816, and now outstanding and not provided for.

13,000,000*l.* for like bills, issued in the same year, and remaining unprovided for.

1,435,000*l.* Irish currency, for Treasury bills issued in Ireland, in 1816, now outstanding.

3,080,000*l.*, for like Treasury bills in Ireland, now outstanding.

The House then resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE TRADE ACT.] The Bill for amending the above Act was read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, Feb. 6.

BOURBON DEBT TO THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.] Lord Holland, seeing the noble earl at the head of the Treasury in his place, begged to ask him a question. It had been stated in the journals of this and of every European country, that the French Chamber of Deputies had voted a sum of 12 millions of francs, being about 500,000*l.*, to Louis the XVIIIth, in order to pay a personal debt acknowledged by that monarch to be due from him to the British Government. He wished to be informed, whether this sum had been actually paid, because, if it had, it was highly proper that Parliament should know how it had been applied?

The Earl of Liverpool did not exactly know what debt the noble lord meant. There were sums claimed by British subjects from the French Government, which had been referred to commissioners for examination. Some of them had been acknowledged, and others were under consideration. But except the sums which might have been paid to individuals on this account, and the sums paid on account of the contribution and the supply of the army in France, he did not know that any payment had been made by the French Government, either to British subjects, or to the British Government.

Lord Holland said, the latter part of the noble earl's answer was perfectly satisfactory, and such as he expected. The French Government had not paid the debt. But surely the noble earl could not but know what he meant when he asked whether this personal debt, acknowledged by the King of France to be due from him to the British Government, had been paid. He did not say that it was proper to press for payment of this sum in the present circumstances of France. He had merely asked the question, whether or no the payment had been made, because, if made, it ought to be accounted for. Whether the King of France had or had not cheated the Chamber of Deputies, was a matter for the Chamber's consideration; we had nothing to do with that.

LOAN TO THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.] The Earl of Lauderdale, after observing that negotiations had taken place for a Loan, from some individuals in this country to the French Government, wished to know, 1st, Whether the British Government had either directly or indirectly guaranteed the repayment of this Loan; 2d, Whether Ministers had given information to the contractors, or persons concerned in it, that Government never would interfere, or did not consider itself as under any obligation whatever at any future period, to stipulate for its repayment. This was no slight matter; but, in the present state of the country, one of the most alarming circumstances that could possibly have happened: for, if Government were to interfere, or if it were generally believed that Government would interfere, to secure the payment of principal and interest of sums lent to the French Government, at an interest of 9, 10, or even 11 per cent., it might easily be conceived what a mass of capital would be drawn from this country; and yet without some sort of understanding of this kind, it was difficult to conceive how such a capital of 12 millions should be risked on such a speculation. It was a most serious consideration, even with reference to the laws as they stood. It was well known, that some descriptions of mechanics were liable to punishment, for transferring to other countries, that skill which was supposed essentially to contribute to the value of our manufactures, and the advantage of our commerce, and that in some cases of this sort, the punishment was death. But when such was the law with respect to these poor people, from the apprehension of the effect which he had stated, what must be thought of the consequences of thus transferring to a foreign country, so great a mass of that capital, which formed the nerves and sinews of all manufactures and commerce? The law, to say the least of it, was, in this respect, most inconsistent.

The Earl of Liverpool had not the least difficulty in stating, that the British Government had not only not guaranteed the payment of principal or interest of the loan in question, but had held out no hope whatever, that either now or at any future period the Government would consider itself as under any obligation to interfere for the purpose of securing the fulfilment by the French Government of its engagement with the contractors. There was nothing in the late Treaty which could in the least degree encourage British creditors in the French funds, to look for the interference of Government in their favour at any future period. The French Government wanted a supply of money, and they applied for it to certain bankers, not in London merely, but in Paris, in Amsterdam, in Hamburg. Application was no doubt made to a gentleman of one of the first houses in London to lend his name to the transaction, but the whole was at the entire risk of the parties concerned. The noble earl (Lauderdale) had been only a few hours in town, and had a very erroneous view of the subject. There was no reason to suppose that any very considerable sum would, in consequence of this transaction, be transferred from this country to France. It might be raised at Paris, at Frankfurt, at Hamburg at Amsterdam. One house in London had taken part in the transaction, but entirely at its own risk; and this might be done if the party or parties thought proper. He knew no law to prevent it. The transaction was not new in its nature; for British subjects had been permitted to advance their money, if they thought proper, on Portuguese and other Loans; and while a foreign country was in amity with this country, there was no law to prevent individuals from speculating in loans to its government, which might be considered as a mere commercial transaction.

The Earl of Lauderdale again asked, whether Ministers had officially intimated, that Government would not interfere to procure payment of the principal or interest of this money?

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that all the parties in this transaction, must be fully aware that they acted at their own risk.

Lord Holland was convinced it was an article introduced into the late Treaty, highly objectionable, which had thus encouraged individuals to send their money out of the kingdom.

The Earl of Lauderdale observed, that if it was perfectly known to the parties, that Government was not bound to interfere, that knowledge must have arisen from some official communication, since a private conversation would not have been sufficient for the purpose. He gave notice, therefore, that on Monday he would move that this official communication be laid on the table.

THANKS TO THE MARQUIS OF HASTINGS.]

The Earl of Liverpool said, that in proposing a vote of thanks to the Marquis of Hastings, and to the army which had been engaged in the late campaign in the Nepal territory, he should not call for any opinion on the justice or necessity of that war. The vote he should move was one in which he had no doubt of their lordships' concurrence, as it would merely express their approbation of the plan of the campaign, and of the operations which had led to its successful termination. In reference to what had been said by a noble lord the other evening, as to difference of opinion respecting the prosecution of the war, he must observe, that the statement was founded in error. That noble lord was completely wrong in supposing that any protest had been made by certain members of the Council in India against the war. A series of encroachments had taken place, which no government, valuing its character, could have overlooked. These aggressions, which it was necessary to check, illustrated an evil, not only on the British dominions in India, but on those of our allies. With regard to the conduct of the war, it was not by the force of the enemy, or the value of the country subdued, that the merit of the victory achieved by our troops was to be estimated: the contest took place under circumstances which called for a very considerable degree of ability and military talent, in those who had to carry it on. All the operations were executed in mountainous districts; and long and judicious preparations were necessary to insure a probability of success. The contest, though short, was severe, and in none could exercise of military skill and judgment be more requisite. He would not, however, trouble their lordships with any details of the operations. The accounts were before the public, and to them he should refer for the truth of the character he had given to this campaign. He concluded by moving, that the Thanks of the House be given to the Most Noble the Marquis of Hastings, for the able and judicious arrangements by which the war in Nepal had been brought to so successful a conclusion.

Earl Grosvenor said, he had intended to have troubled their lordships at some length on the subject of the Nepal war, but in consequence of what had fallen from the noble Secretary of State, he should reserve what he intended to say to another opportunity. The noble earl then asked a question relative to transactions between the Government of India, and certain Native Powers, subsequent to the conclusion of the Nepal war, and the signing of the treaty of peace.

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that as Government had no information on the subject to which the noble earl referred, it was impossible for him to say what events might have passed.

The motion was then agreed to; after which, thanks were voted to Sir David Ochterlony, and the troops under his command.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, Feb. 6.

CLOTH-WORKERS.—MACHINERY.] Mr. G. Laughton presented a petition from the Cloth-Workers of Wiltshire, Gloucestershire and Somersetshire, complaining of the introduction of Machinery in making cloth, by which many of them had been reduced to the greatest distress. He would freely say, that the use of Machinery was necessary to enable us to meet our foreign manufacturing rivals in the markets; but some limitation of its use might perhaps be advisable at particular times, and under certain circumstances. He hoped that some member of more weight in the House than himself, would feel it his duty to propose to refer this subject to a committee. Such a proposition should have his cordial support.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

SUPPLY.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the committee of supply. The resolutions were read and agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Cochrane said, he had a petition to present to the House on this subject. He then adverted to the charitable subscription at the London tavern, to which the great sinecurists of the country had not contributed more than a penny in the pound of their incomes from the public. One noble duke had only subscribed one sixteen seven-tenth. Though some words of this petition might be objected to as too strong, yet he should move that it be brought up and laid on the table, that the House themselves might judge of its language, and act as they thought fit. He wished to take no responsibility whatever upon himself. It came from Manchester, and was signed by 30,080 individuals.

Mr. Brougham observed, that the noble lord needed not to have gone out of his way to give his information to the House, on rising to present the petition, before he was asked for it. It would have been enough for him to have moved that it should be brought up and read. Further discussion upon it might afterwards arise. It was the usage of the House, after a petition was read, to decide upon the propriety of its language, but the noble lord had volunteered his observations, and in doing so seemed to have taken the only means in his power, to get his petition rejected. (Hear.)

Lord Cochrane said, he had made his observations with a view to prevent any sort of reproach being cast upon him by the House for presenting the petition.

The petition was brought up and read. In the commencement of it, it stated that the House was not, in any rational or constitutional sense, a representation of the people.

Lord Castlereagh rose, and objected to this language.

Lord Cochrane observed, that the petition appeared to him only to state, that the House did not properly represent the people. Let it be read through.

The clerk then read it throughout. It complained of the constitution being subverted, and of the arts and designs of wicked rulers. With some exceptions, it was the same as the petition from Saddleworth, which was rejected on the second day of the Session.

Lord Castlereagh remarked on the declaration that the constitution was subverted, and put it to the judgment of the House, whether, speaking such language, the petition should be received or not.

Mr. Brougham said, if he had taken up his idea of this petition from what fell from the noble lord, (Cochrane), he should have supposed it to be worthy of rejection; but now he had heard it read throughout, he found that it was not exactly similar to the petition which had been rejected. Here, then, consisted the great advantage of having petitions read. The objectionable passage in a former petition did not occur in this—he meant that which stated, that the debates in that House were repeated, protracted, and disgusting. On that ground he understood that petition to have been rejected. (Hear.) All he could say of the present petition was, that the wording of it was not extremely prudent, or very advocate-like. It contained a statement of the necessity of a Parliamentary Reform, carried to a little too much strength of language. But, then, the grounds on which the friends of reform argued, were precisely, that the House, as at present constituted, was not a due representation of the people. They did not deny the competency of Parliament, nor its legal right to enact laws for the government of the kingdom, till another mode of representation should be adopted. They only stated, according to their views, that the present system of representation was not constitutional or rational. He wished the noble lord opposite to attend more closely to the petition. If the two words “constitutional” and “rational”, which he seemed chiefly to object to, were left out, still the petition would be a general denial of the propriety of the present representation. In those two words objected to, the petitioners only said that it was not so.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that the former petition had been rejected, not merely for the particular and improper allusion to the discussions of Parliament, but on account of almost every part of it. The present petition differed from the former only in the omission of an offensive paragraph. From the present one he then read a paragraph, which stated that the proceedings of the House tended only to keep up the unrelenting lash of enormous taxation, to the utmost limit of human endurance.

Lord Cochrane did not intend to take upon himself any responsibility for the contents of this petition, and he hoped no unfavourable impression as to his motives or conduct would be made, either in that House, or without doors.

Mr. Carver remembered a petition on this subject, in which it was stated, that seats in that House were bought as notoriously as cattle at Smithfield market. It was better to encourage petitioners than to be fastidious. That was the opinion of Mr. Pitt. He (Mr. C.) was an old friend of Parliamentary Reform, and he believed always should be so. Though he might disapprove of the language used, or some of the doctrines advanced, yet he should always be sorry to reject a petition. By rejection, the improper views and bad cause of individuals would be promoted.

Sir John Sebright declared himself a firm friend to the right of petitioning. He also was, and always would be, a friend to reasonable reform, and to measures of public economy; but the House might really expect to lose respect with the people, if it submitted to receive insults. (Hear.)

Mr. Lockhart believed, that the people, left to themselves, would express in a petition, what they considered their grievances, in their own language, much better than by yielding to some of their advisers. The improper terms of these petitions were owing to a sort of manufactory established for the object. They were the work of a few individuals. (Hear.) He had never heard, or read in history, that any legislative body had gained respect with the public, by losing its respect for itself. As to the question of magnanimity, the House had to reflect that they were to consult not only what was due to themselves, but what was due to the constitution and the country; and therefore it was essential for them to preserve their own dignity. An hon. and learned gentleman had endeavoured to construe away the meaning of certain offensive words; but what could the word "constitutional" justly mean, but the government of the country established by law? He believed the object of persons who drew up such petitions, if they had any object, was thus to deny, a priori, the validity of the proceedings of Parliament.

Sir Francis Burdett thought it should be shewn, that something in this petition was stated in stronger terms than what had been used in former petitions which had been received; some of which had certainly contained stronger expressions. Wilful offence might not be imputable to the petitioners in their way of setting forth their complaints and grievances. They might not desire to throw discredit or insult on Parliament. Unless the House really believed that they meant to do so, he thought they would not consider it their duty to reject the petition, but give it a reception similar to others. They would rather endeavour to do all they could to calm the public mind under the present circumstances.

Lord Cochrane thought, that the offensive parts should be more distinctly stated by the noble lord, (Castlereagh).

No answer was given; but the House divided. For rejecting the petition, 50: for receiving it, 17.—Majority, 33.

Lord Cochrane presented a petition for Reform from Macclesfield.—Laid on the table.

Mr. J. Smith presented a similar petition from Nottingham.—Ordered to lie on the table.

BANK OF ENGLAND.] Mr. Grenfell rose to move for a paper, to the production of which he apprehended there would be no objection. It was for an account of the particular periods at which the charter of the Bank of England had been renewed from the year 1695, down to the present period, stating the number of years for which each renewal was granted. His reason for making that motion was, that the market price of Bank Stock had risen 10 per cent. since yesterday morning, and during the last fortnight had risen altogether as much as 15 per cent. It was rumoured in the city, that the cause of that rise was an intended renewal of the Company's Charter, who were to advance a sum to Government to enable Ministers to go through the present year, and to receive as a bonus or bribe, nothing less than that renewal. (Hear, hear.) Such was the rumour, but he confessed he could not believe it had any foundation. The Charter had sixteen years unexpired, and he could not imagine that the Minister would so anticipate the resources of the country, or so prejudice any discussion that might arise upon its renewal, when the proper moment arrived. He viewed it as nothing more nor less than a calumny upon the Government.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, there was no objection to producing the return. With respect to the rumour, he could only say he was utterly ignorant of any such circumstance, and the mention of it by the hon. member was the first he had heard.

THANKS TO THE MARQUIS OF HASTINGS.] Mr. Canning rose to call the attention of the House to the recent transactions in India, and to propose a vote of thanks to the Royal and Indian armies, for their brilliant and successful achievements in the territory of Nepaul. He was confident, however the operations of this short but splendid campaign might be comparatively different from those more important and glorious victories which our arms had formerly obtained in the East, howsoever contrasted it might be with those more recent and matchless exploits which had received the unqualified congratulations of Parliament, there was scarcely any occasion in which the thanks of that House could be more justly bestowed. A want of geographical knowledge, the vast distance from the scene of action, and the important military operations which had so recently and happily secured the peace and tranquillity of Europe, might possibly operate on some minds so as to diminish the glory, and lessen the sense of the great and permanent advantages which would result from this Indian war. The degree of interest which belonged to those actions nearer home had, as it were, absorbed and exhausted those feelings of gratitude and admiration which might have been called forth by other actions. Both justice and policy, however, made it incumbent on the House, that the great and glorious successes of our arms in India should receive the tribute of their thanks. Justice, that noble and distinguishing characteristic of our country, was not local; it extended to every part of the world, and every service performed to the state, deserved the notice of the British Parliament. In whatever part of our extended Empire—on whatever theatre, however circumscribed, our soldiers went forward to battle, they might be confident that their valour and exertions in the field would not be unthankfully remembered by their country. And when it was considered, that of the armies who served in India, there was one of a kind so peculiarly useful, that scarcely any kind of warfare could be undertaken without them, it would also be found by the House, that they were justly entitled to the consideration of the country. Further, he thought it sound policy, that when any achievement had been effected for the security of our Indian possessions, we should neither be sparing of our praise, nor too nice in considering the actual amount of the benefits we derived, contrasted with more splendid and enlarged operations. Before the war was commenced, Lord Hastings had recourse to various arrangements, and the Indian army was allowed to take possession of the districts in dispute, under a treaty which the existing royal power engaged to ratify. But this promise was not faithfully observed, and in consequence, a campaign was undertaken, which ended with so much glory and success. The right hon. gentleman felt himself unable to detail the operations of this military campaign, having no geographical positions to which he could refer; but he thought it fit particularly to state, that although it was the determination of Government, if possible, to detach from the enemy his more recent possessions, no addition whatever to the British territories was contemplated, except where there was no means whatever of restoring the former government. It was impossible, in the review of these brilliant operations, not to mention the names of some distinguished officers whose efforts had been most conspicuous. In the early part of the war the enterprising General Gillespie, in storming a mountain fort, lost his life, rashly it might be thought by some, but if rashly, it was hazarded under the impulse of heroic valour, and atoned for by his regretted fall. (Hear, hear.) Colonel Nicholls, the officer next in command, achieved the object of that division of the army. General Ochterlony, by a succession of splendid and successful operations, which those who had read the Gazettes with a soldier's eye would best appreciate, terminated the war in full possession of the whole western part of the Ghoorga territory. When the war was renewed, on the refusal of the enemy to ratify the treaty, that gallant officer, with full military and political powers, was directed to concentrate all his efforts against the capital, a service which he successfully effected, until within a few miles of that capital he was met with the ratification. No addition was made to the original treaty, derogatory to the honour or disparaging to the interests of the enemy. It was felt by the Governor-General, that the Nepaul power was sufficiently crippled, and its resources sufficiently exhausted. This was the outline of the course pursued, both in the field and in the cabinet, by the Governor-General against this active and daring enemy. The Nepaul power was now reduced to a state which held out no temptation to other powers to look to it as a leader against us. The firmness of the Governor-General had carried this point to an issue; and he might venture to pronounce, without meaning to exaggerate the importance of our victory on this occasion, or to undervalue the former success and glory of our arms, that the head of the Indian government had laid the foundation of permanent security to the British possessions in the East. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving a vote of thanks to the Marquis of Hastings, Governor-General of India, &c. for his military operations, by which the war had been brought to a favourable issue, and permanent foundations of peace established.

Lord Morpeth seconded the motion, and paid some compliments to the character of the Marquis of Hastings.

Mr. Brougham acquiesced in the motion, because it was confined to military operations; had it embraced any thing political, he should certainly have felt it his duty to call the attention of the House to that part of the subject. He had understood that great difference of opinion had prevailed on the policy of this Nepaul war, and that two of the most considerable members of the noble Marquis's government, Mr. Edmonstone and Mr. Dowdeswell, names well known in that House, and who had acquired the highest reputation during the unparalleled administration of the Marquis Wellesley, had differed materially on the course that was pursued. He should, however, abstain from going into this question, further than protesting against passing a vote for any thing beyond the mere military conduct of this war. He took it for granted that a vote would follow to the officers and army; but he could not refrain from observing, that the officers in the Company's service were most unfortunately—he would not at that time say more than unfortunately—excluded from the order of the Bath, with the trifling exception of those who succeeded to the command of battalions. It was certainly much to be regretted, that all the splendid triumphs of that fine army, that those unparalleled services of the Indian officers in the destruction of Tippoo's troops under my Lord Wellesley in 1799, should be thus rewarded. Here, six years might be taken to be the usual period in which a soldier attained the rank of a field-officer; but in the Indian army, he underwent a struggle with the climate, was removed from his family, and suffered many other inconveniences, for twenty years, before he could attain that rank in which, under this new regulation, he was entitled to this honour. Formerly, medals used to be given; but since the great extension of the order, medals were no longer distributed; so that the Indian officers were now excluded from the only honourable mark of distinction to which their great and important services were formerly deemed entitled. Had the Marquis Wellesley and the Duke of Wellington been consulted on that limitation, in its bearing upon the officers of the Indian army, sure he was that the one, acquainted as he was with the merits of his old servants, and the other, feeling for his early companions in arms, would never have advised such a prejudicial exclusion. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Canning, in explanation, stated that he never heard of any difference of opinion existing in the Council at Calcutta.

The motion was then carried nem. con.

Mr. Canning then moved that the thanks of the House be given to Sir David Ochterlony for his military conduct and talents displayed in conducting the Nepal war to a successful termination.—Carried nem. con. It was then voted that the House do highly approve of the courage and conduct displayed by the troops in the course of the campaign.

BANKRUPT LAWS.] Mr. Lockhart rose to move for the introduction of a bill to amend the bankrupt laws. The evil which he wished to remedy was, the multiplication of fraudulent bankruptcies to an extent which threatened the most frightful consequences to the commerce and morals of the country. He was far from meaning that kind of bankruptcy which had been on so many instances of late occasioned by the fluctuations of our currency, or the precarious situation of trade. Neither did he mean, for the prevention of the evil to which he alluded, to propose the formation of any new tribunal, or to throw any onerous burden on the courts that already existed. His remedy should contain very little of novelty in it. The notorious evil to which he now adverted, was defined in the very first statute passed on the subject of bankruptcy in the reign of Henry VIII. The preamble of that statute spoke of the practice of men obtaining possession of other people's property by fraudulent means, and then fleeing into foreign parts. Notwithstanding the numerous statutes which had passed successively since that time, fraudulent practices of this nature were daily on the increase: and this increase he was inclined to ascribe to the mode of examination pursued by the commissioners of bankrupt, which was mainly directed to the point, whether the bankrupt had concealed any part of his property, and only incidentally, if at all, to the arts by which he came into possession of that property, or how he had made away with it. When satisfied on the first of these points, the commissioners generally agreed to sign the certificate; the next part of the process was, for the bankrupt to obtain the signatures of 3-5ths in value of his creditors, and that once obtained, the whole only awaited the fiat of the Chancellor. Thus the bankrupt was again let loose on the world, whatever his fraudulent practices might have been; without any distinction of character being made between him and the honest bankrupt, who had failed in his engagements through unavoidable misfortunes. The mode of remedy he meant to propose was, that the commissioners of bankrupt, instead of investigating merely whether the bankrupt had fraudulently secreted any part of his property, should also inquire into the means by which it came into his possession, and how he had made away with it; that they should examine into the whole of his transactions, and report on his conduct, which report should be submitted to the Lord Chancellor before he granted the certificate, together with their opinion whether it was proper that such a person should go free into the world. This, he conceived, would be attended with little difficulty or burden on the commissioners, who now amounted to about 70 in number. If he recollected right, there had been only two or three persons executed under the act making it felony for a bankrupt to conceal his property; one of these persons, of the name of Clarke, said, on his examination by the commissioners, that the fact was, he had spent the property which had come into his hand, on wine, women, and other extravagancies; but the commissioners, not believing this account, ascertained the fact of concealment, and on the evidence brought forward he was executed. He meant it, therefore, to form part of his bill, that the commissioners should inquire into the means by which the bankrupt got the property into his possession, and how he had spent it; and also, that a particular day should be set apart for such examination. The bill which he proposed was, in fact, founded on the principle of the Insolvent Act, which prevented fraudulent persons from taking the benefit of that Act, and remanded them back to confinement for a period of five years. This was the penalty he proposed for the punishment of fraudulent bankrupts, and which had this additional recommendation, that it introduced a uniformity into our law in regard to fraudulent debtors. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill to make better provision for the repression of fraudulent bankruptcy.—Leave granted.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, February 7.

The Earl of Morton presented some petitions relative to appeals from the Court of Session in Scotland, which were referred to the Committee on Appeals.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, February 7.

SCOTCH LUNATICS.] Lord Binning moved an address to the Prince Regent, praying that he would give directions to the parochial clergy of Scotland, to make returns of the number of lunatics in each parish, distinguishing those who were in confinement, and those who were at liberty; also, their different sexes, &c. The noble lord said, that this motion was merely preparatory to a bill which he intended to bring in, for the erection of mad-houses in Scotland.—Ordered.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—MALTA.] The Cape of Good Hope Trade Bill went through a committee.

Mr. Robinson brought up a bill to extend the privileges of the trade of Malta to the port of Gibraltar, which was read a first time.

WAYS AND MEANS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a committee, observed, that he intended to propose only such votes as would go to the renewal of certain usual annual taxes, and a grant of Exchequer bills, to replace those which were now out. The several duties on malt, sugars, &c. were then moved; as also, that 24,000,000*l.* be raised by Exchequer Bills for the service of the year 1817.

Sir G. Monck wished to know what occasion there was for hurrying that business forward, and how near the period was at which those duties would expire?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was customary to move them early after the meeting of Parliament. The existing acts would expire at different periods, some on the 25th of March, others not till June.

Sir G. Monck observed, that it might be usual to move those duties soon after the assembling of Parliament, but he thought, at the present moment, when a committee was about to sit to inquire into the income and expenditure of the country, it would have been more proper to wait till some report was received from that committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that no inconvenience would arise from voting them at the present moment.

Sir G. Monck replied, that as the earliest period at which any of the duties expired was the 25th of March, there was room enough for delay.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer remarked, that although the duties now voted were of the nature of taxes, yet they were always anticipated by Exchequer Bills, in order to carry on the public service.

Mr. Calcraft considered the last argument as an additional reason for not voting them till the House received some account from the committee about to be appointed (hear.) Afterwards, there would be no opportunity of canvassing them; and he really believed, that one motive for not assembling Parliament earlier was, that there should be no time for previous inquiry.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the present votes had really nothing to do with any questions that might hereafter come forward upon the general financial resources of the country.

The resolutions were then agreed to, the House resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Calvert rose to present a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London, in Common Hall assembled, praying for a Reform in Parliament, for public economy, abolition of sinecures and unmerited pensions, and for triennial Parliaments. How the petition came into his hands, he really could not explain; for it was usual, when the city of London petitioned Parliament, to have it presented by its own members; but he supposed some of those honourable gentlemen would be able to account for it.

Mr. Alderman Atkins said, the city members had all been deemed unworthy of presenting it, because they would not give a pledge to support it right or wrong. Never having a seat in that House when the great question of Parliamentary Reform was discussed, he was unable to come to any satisfactory conclusion in his own mind upon it.

Sir W. Curtis said, he was not in the situation of the honourable alderman, for he had sat in that House on many occasions when the question of Reform was agitated, and he was satisfied the constitution of that House was just what it ought to be, and therefore, to use an old adage, "it was best to let well alone." (hear, hear, from the opposition benches.) Entertaining that view, he had declared he would do all he could to oppose the petition. The honourable member who presented it, was, on the contrary, if he had read it correctly, a friend to annual parliaments and universal suffrage.

Mr. Calvert rose to order. The honourable baronet was misrepresenting him. So far from being a friend to the scheme of annual parliaments and universal suffrage, he considered them as most wild and dangerous. All he wished was, that the decays of the constitution should be repaired.

Sir W. Curtis was sorry he had misrepresented the honourable member, and was afraid it arose from his eyes not being so good as they were (a laugh.) He had at least construed the speeches he had read of that honourable member in that way. He had very little more to say. He was perfectly satisfied with things as they were. (A loud laugh.)

Sir J. Shaw approved of that part of the petition which prayed for economy and reduction; but the reform required, appeared to him visionary. Every thing called for retrenchment, and he thought the magnanimity with which the people had endured the burdens of the late contest entitled them to every relief which his Majesty's ministers could give.

The petition was then read.

Mr. Ponsonby rose merely to observe upon what had fallen from the worthy alderman, (Atkins,) as to the sentiments expressed by his constituents with respect to their representatives. He sure, if the worthy alderman recollected he would not say that all the four members for the city were unworthy of confidence. (Hear, hear.) He might affirm that himself, and two others, had forfeited that confidence; but he would surely add, that there was one, (Mr. Combe) who would not have been declared unworthy of it, if he had been capable of attending the meeting of the Common Hall. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Calvert said, some reform was unquestionably necessary. A noble lord, (Cochrane) on a former occasion, had stated the way in which he got into Parliament for the borough of Honiton, by sending the bellman round the place, and offering ten guineas a piece for votes. He also could state a fact, which shewed the evils of the present mode of representation. He was one of six persons who had sent two members to Parliament, for which each member paid 4,500*l.* (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Alderman Atkins explained.

Mr. Lambton certainly understood the worthy alderman to affirm that all his brethren were convicted of being unworthy to present the petition now before them. He rose, however, for the purpose of stating, that he entirely concurred in every thing expressed by the petitioner: not only in what related to economy and retrenchment, but in all that concerned a Reform of that House. The time was now come when it would be no longer possible to delay the inquiry; and he trusted they would not only correct the abuses which existed, but, in a steady temperate and dignified manner, investigate the causes of those abuses. After what had been stated by a noble lord (Cochrane) it was too evident that seats might be obtained in that House by money, by interest, or, indeed, by any means but that of the fair, unbiassed, and unobscured suffrages of the people. (Hear, hear.) At the same time, he was as little disposed as any individual to sanction those wild, foolish and disgusting principles of Reform which were promulgated by certain persons out of doors—principles (if they could be called so) which were founded upon the subversion of our constitution, upon the destruction of social order, and upon the destruction of all that was wise, permanent, and useful in our invaluable system of law and government.

Mr. Wynn said, he did not wish to take up the time of the House with any observations upon Parliamentary Reform; a notice upon that subject had been given, and when it was regularly brought forward, and some distinct propositions submitted, then would be the time for entering into the discussion. Some allusions, however, had been made to the declaration of a noble lord (Cochrane), who stated, on a former night, the way in which he first came into Parliament for the borough of Honiton: a statement which he heard, and he believed the whole House, with a disgust which it would be difficult to describe. He was aware, from the length of time which had elapsed, that the noble lord was exempt from the penalties he had incurred.

But was that all? He should have thought that no member could have stood up in that House, and gloried in his misconduct—gloried in his violation of the privileges of that House, his violation of the liberties of the subject, and of the principles of the constitution. Could they have expected that the noble lord himself would now turn round, and reproach those whom he had seduced into that crime? for a crime it was against the constitution of the country. Another honourable member had likewise stated, that he was one of six who returned two members to parliament, those members paying each 4,500*l.* for their seats. He knew not what period had elapsed since that transaction; but that also was a great substantive offence, and he owned he could not understand upon what principle honourable members in that House ventured to boast of crimes against the constitution, and common law of the land. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Calvert explained, and regretted he had been misunderstood by the last speaker. He disclaimed the idea of having ever received the smallest emolument for the seats he had alluded to, but he had merely mentioned the circumstance, to shew the absolute necessity of Reform.

Mr. Wynn did not suppose the hon. gentleman had participated in the spoil; but he did say, that the transaction was punishable by the law of the country.

Mr. Brand said this petition was drawn up in the mildest and most inoffensive manner, and reflected high honour on the moderation and good sense of those who had superintended it.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

Sir Francis Burdett presented a petition from the inhabitants of Manchester and Salford, praying for Parliamentary Reform and Retrenchment in the Public Expenditure.—Ordered to lie on the table.—The hon. baronet presented another petition from the inhabitants of Leeds, which was received, and ordered to lie on the table.

He then presented a petition from Bradford, which being read by the clerk, was found to be exactly similar to those rejected by the House.

Lord Castlereagh could not help regretting, that such petitions were manufactured by individuals in town, and signed by persons in the country, who appeared not to be aware of their nature. He felt it his duty, from a due regard to the consistency of the House, to move that this petition be rejected. It was impossible for the House to receive petitions containing such gross insults to its authority, and which he believed did not contain the real opinions of the people, but merely of those who drew them up.

Mr. Brougham warned the House not to believe, that because petitions were thus drawn up, they did not contain the sense of the people. It did not follow on any grounds, that because two petitions were the same in language, the persons signing those petitions were not aware of the real objects for which they petitioned. He had spoken to individuals repeatedly, who attended public meetings for petitioning Parliament, and had been told by them, that finding petitions prepared at those meetings, finding them, if he might use the expression, cut and dried, they had signed them. (Hear, hear.) It would therefore be a monstrous proposition, and he could not caution the House too strongly against receiving it, to suppose that because half a million of the inhabitants of this country had signed petitions in exactly the same words, they were therefore insensible of the grievances under which the country was labouring, and were not desirous for a Reform, and, what was perhaps in the mean time of more consequence, of a complete and radical retrenchment in the expenditure of the public money. (Hear, hear.) This he particularly wished to impress on the attention of the House, and he called on any gentleman to shew him a single instance, where one individual who had signed such petitions had ever come forward to deny his being aware of the nature of what was stated in them. This in itself was surely important, and a pretty satisfactory proof, that however exceptionable the language might be, there existed no intention to offend. (Hear.)

Sir Francis Burdett said, the principal objection to this petition was, its being manufactured in London, and sent to the country. It however was rather singular, that Ministers never made similar objections when the petitions were in their favour, a pretty good instance of which was seen in the petition lately handed about by the merchants, bankers, and traders of London, and which without doubt was manufactured in a corner. It was well known, that at all public meetings, petitions and resolutions, were always prepared before-hand, in consequence of its being understood, that the general principles on which such meetings were convened were agreed on. The people now felt their grievances, and it was, therefore, not prudent to check them on a mere criticism of words. He saw no words in the present petition which could warrant its being rejected; there was no proof whatever of any intention on the part of the petitioners to offend the House, and when such was the case, it certainly was the duty of the House not to reject the petition.

The question was then put, and the petition was rejected without a division.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Lord Castlereagh moved, that that part of the speech of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, at the opening of the session, which was particularly addressed to the House of Commons, be now read, and it being read accordingly; (see page 2,) his lordship observed, that the attention of the House had never been called to a subject in which the vital interests of the country were more deeply involved. It had been the misfortune of those who had for many years past sat in Parliament, to have had that duty to perform in times in which the intervals of peace had been so short that the whole scope of public measures and expenditure had been calculated upon and governed by a war policy. Notwithstanding, however, the burdens which they were under the necessity of imposing on the nation, and the many hardships and privations to which the people had been exposed, they had still the consolation to reflect, that the object and effect of the exertions which they had made, and the course of policy upon which they had acted, had been to protect the country against a far greater calamity than any that, in the progress, or at the close of the war, had visited the nation. After having discharged these arduous duties, he trusted that they would now, with equal resolution, perseverance, and success, apply themselves to those measures which in time of peace were necessary to secure the stability and prosperity of the country, to recruit its resources, and prepare it for any future contest in which it might be called upon to engage. The time was now come when the House ought to consider what would be a proper permanent system for a peace establishment; and he was sure they would go along with him when he laid down this as an incontrovertible maxim, that no country, especially a country with such an accumulation of debt as pressed upon Great Britain, could ever consider its prosperity in time of peace established, on a firm and secure foundation, unless its expenditure was reduced, not only to the level but below the level of its revenue. The circumstances under which they came to the consideration of this important subject ought not to discourage them. It was impossible that, in the course of one year, the consequences of the great change which had taken place could have passed over; but he was not without hope, that the time when the principle of reduction would begin effectually to operate, would arrive at an earlier period after the close of the war, than it had done after the termination of the war in 1783. He trusted that the cause of economy had not lost any thing by delay, or by the course which had been pursued by the servants of the Crown. Proper inquiries had been going on, and he firmly believed, that though Ministers had begun with measures of reduction at the very earliest period that had entered into the contemplation of any man, these reductions could not possibly have been brought practically to operate sooner than they would now do. He was sure the House would be convinced of this, if they only considered, that no less than 300,000 men, soldiers and sailors, had been discharged since the termination of the war, and left to provide an honest livelihood for themselves, without disgracing the glories which they had acquired. The reduction was in fact as great as it could have been; whatever measures had been adopted with that view in the course of the last session. It was not his intention now to go minutely through the several heads of expenditure in the different branches of our establishments for the present year. The House would have the whole matter more particularly under their view when the several estimates should be given in and examined: and, therefore, they would not now be required to vote sums for more than some months, so that the public service might be carried on in the mean time. His only object was to give such a general description of the estimates for the present year, compared with those for the last year, as would bring the difference in a general way under the view of the House. A general statement would be proper, before Parliament entered upon the investigation of that most important subject—the state of the finances of the country. It was the duty of Parliament now to enter upon that investigation, and he assured the hon. gentlemen opposite, that the servants of the Crown were so far from wishing to avoid, that they courted investigation (hear.) Much of the greatness and security of this nation depended on our navy and army: but glorious as had been the exertions of these branches of the public service,—and never before had the naval and military reputation of the country stood so high,—no army, no navy, had stood this country in greater stead, or had more contributed to its security, than its public credit. To support that credit, it was necessary that the expenditure should be placed upon a proper footing; and that, if he might use the expression, the nation should now begin to live within its income. They might differ perhaps about the means, but it must be the object of all to preserve the credit of the country unimpaired; and never had it happened that England, even when struggling under the pressure of distress, attempted to gain relief and ease by a failure in the performance of its honourable engagements. (hear, hear.) Having premised these general observations, he should now proceed, in as summary a way as was consistent with the object in view, to state the reductions in the several branches of the public service, and the estimates for the year, as compared with those for the last year. First, then, he requested the attention of the House to the subject of the army; and, in comparing the expense for the present year with that for the last year, the best mode, perhaps, would be to consider the troops in France and India as out of the question for the present, as these did not bear upon the estimates of the public expenditure of this country. With respect to the land forces, the number for last year for this country, Ireland, and the colonies, was 99,000 men—53,000 for the home service, and 46,000 for the foreign establishment. The number at home was to be reduced by 5,000 men, the reduction of the troops abroad was to be 18,000, making a total reduction of 18,000 men. He did not at present think it necessary to state the particular circumstances which had regulated these reductions: but had no hesitation in stating, that they were made under a strong sense of the pressure of the moment. On that account Ministers had felt it necessary in a great measure to put out of view the military defence of the colonies against any external attack, and to consider merely what was necessary for internal security. He thought that the present circumstances of the country justified that policy, because there might be a price beyond which it would be improper to go for putting these colonies in a complete state of defence. But as to the home defence, there was no price that could be too great for that object; and the only question was, what was the proper and necessary force for the external and internal protection of the State, and the rights and liberties of the people? for events had pressed upon them of late which sufficiently proved, that the magistrates were unable to enforce the laws by means of the civil power alone. The number then for the service of Great Britain, Ireland, and the colonies, would be 81,016 men. The total number for which a vote had been taken last year was 150,000 men; the total number for which the vote of this year would be taken was only 123,000 men. The reason for this was, by the convention with France, the number of our troops there was to be reduced from 30,000 to 25,000 men, and the number of the Government troops in India from 20,000 to 17,000 men. The supplies for the regular land forces would be for this year about 6,513,000*l.*, and including the militia, 7,500,000*l.* The supplies for the commissariat and barrack departments for Great Britain 580,000*l.*, and for Ireland 300,000*l.*, making a total of 880,000*l.* The army extraordinary for this year would be 1,800,000*l.* The total charge for the army, except the ordnance, for this year would be 9,230,000*l.*, instead of 10,564,000*l.*, which was the supply for 1816, making a diminution of 1,334,000*l.* With respect to the ordnance, the supply for last year was 1,696,000*l.* For the present year, it would be 1,246,000*l.*, being a saving of 450,000*l.* This saving was effected by the reduction of 3,000 men, and other reductions in the artillery.

All the half-pay and retired pensions had been included in this calculation; so that the sum required for the regular forces actually on service was only about four millions. Gentlemen, when they talked of reduction, ought to consider, that when reductions took place, the half-pay and pensions for retired services must, on the faith of the legislature, be paid: and therefore the reduction in point of expense had by no means kept pace with the reduction in point of numbers, as compared with the sums paid to the troops when actually on service. When a body of troops was reduced, the expense was still continued to the amount of one shilling and three-pence or nearly one shilling and two-pence. He now came to the naval establishment. The number voted last year was 53,000 men; the number for this year would be only 19,000 men, being a reduction of 14,000 men. On a full view of the state of the navy, and the distresses of the country, those whose duty it was to attend particularly to this department of the public service were of opinion that this reduction might be made without danger. But it was not intended to make any reduction in the marine corps; and the reason was, that such a measure would render the speedy equipment of the navy at a future period a matter of very great difficulty. The vote, therefore, was to be taken for 6,000 men for this year, being the number voted last year. The charge for the navy, last year, was 16,114,000*l*. The charge for this year would be only 6,397,000*l*.; making a saving of 3,717,000*l*. In this charge of 6,397,000*l*. there was a sum of 500,000*l*. which would not appear in the estimate of the following years. It would be proper also to mention, that though the number of men was only reduced to 19,000 men, the charge was calculated with reference to that of last year, as if the vote had been only for 18,000 men. The reason was, that as you reduced the men, you also reduced the ships; so that there was a reduction not only of the expense for the men, but also of the expense for wear and tear. The noble lord then made the following recapitulation.

Army saving	1,784,000
Navy ditto	3,717,000
Miscellaneous	1,000,000

Total saving 6,501,000

SUPPLY.

Army	7,050,000
Commissariat and barracks, Great Britain	580,000
Ditto, ditto, Ireland	300,000
Extraordinaries	1,300,000
Ordnance	1,246,000
Navy	6,397,000
Miscellaneous, Great Britain and Ireland	1,500,000

Total 18,373,000

He had stated the estimate for the whole service of the year at this sum. He was not sanguine enough to suppose that he could form any certain anticipation of what would be required in the following year, nor did he think that either the affairs of a nation, or of an individual, could be so regulated that no contingency would arise. A permanent establishment was not, therefore, within the limits of his calculation; nor did he think that it could be called for, except by those who wished to pledge the Administration to a course of conduct which circumstances might render impossible for them to pursue. Charges might arise from a change of circumstances of which he was not now apprised; and it might be possible to make equally unexpected reductions, of every opportunity to do which his Majesty's Government would not fail to take advantage. He might state, however, some reductions which might fairly be anticipated in next year. In the army there might be

VOL. I.

A saving of	223,000
Extraordinaries	300,000
Ordnance	50,000
In the Navy, under the head of Transport Service	500,000
	<hr/> 1,073,000

which would reduce the charge to 17,300,000*l*. This sum included not only the charges for the public service of the year, but that expenditure likewise required for services already performed, namely, pensions and half-pay. Under the head of the army, the addition to what would otherwise be necessary for this purpose

Amounted to	2,551,000
Navy	1,271,000
Ordnance	223,000
Pensions	400,000
	<hr/> 4,345,000

which being deducted from the estimate for the year, would leave little more than 13 millions for services. When the House took a view of the charges, and lamented the extent of the expenditure, it should always be borne in mind, that a great portion of what was felt as a pressure had arisen during the war from provisions sanctioned by Parliament, and dictated by every principle of justice and gratitude towards the great merits of those who had contributed to bring it to so glorious a termination. This should be taken into the account in every comparison of the expenses of our present establishment with those of any former period. When we looked back to 1792 we should find, that this kind of charge did not exist at all; and the proper comparison therefore of the supplies of that year, with the estimate which he had just submitted, was not between them and 18 millions, but between them and 13,258,000*l*., at which the deduction of pensions and half-pay would leave the latter. The service of the present year could not be compared with that of 1792 without many allowances: the nation had then enjoyed profound peace for nearly ten years; there was no burden entailed on the country for former service; and Mr. Pitt endeavoured to bring down the establishments to as small a scale as possible in these favourable circumstances. The supplies for that year were 5,200,000*l*., a sum small indeed when compared with 13 millions; but it ought to be recollected, in addition to the other circumstances which he had mentioned, that in this vote there was only included the army of Great Britain, whereas the whole army of the empire was included in the present estimate. Ireland had then a separate charge of 1,000,000*l*., to defray which, added to sums voted for Great Britain, the whole army expenditure was raised to 6,200,000*l*. The charge, it might be said, was doubled even upon those data; but when we compared the extent of our establishments at the two periods, we should likewise compare the extent of our empire, and the number of our colonies, the new state and organization of Europe that arose out of the French revolution and the subsequent predominance of French power requiring more constant vigilance and more effective means of defence than were then necessary. Independently, too, of these considerations, measures had been taken by Parliament that would have produced the effect of increasing our charges, though the service had remained the same. The pay of the army was nearly doubled in the interval, and the allowances to officers were greatly augmented. The pay of a regiment of cavalry then amounted to only 28,000*l.*, at present it was 38,000*l.*, making a difference of 10,000*l.* When this was taken into the account, there was nothing in the difference between 6 millions then, and 13 millions now, that would appear extraordinary. Part of the burden of expense which the country now bore might be expected annually to diminish. Of the 4 millions now given for half-pay and pensions there must be a falling in of a considerable portion every year, and a consequent reduction must take place of the public burdens. His Majesty's Government would take care to call officers to active duties who were now on half-pay, to supply the place of those who died, and their half pay would thus be saved. A certain proportion of the pensions would annually be available for the public service by the decease of those who enjoyed them. A hundred thousand men were now in the receipt of pensions and half-pay. He had made enquiries as to what, upon ordinary calculations, might be expected to accrue annually from the falling in of their allowances. By assuming the medium age of 40, one half of the whole would cease to exist in the course of 20 years, making 2,500 annually; and, as the allowances are four millions, the sum becoming available every year for the public service, in the reduction of the public burdens, would be 100,000*l.* His right hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would explain the details of the finances, but he (Lord C.) hoped that he should not err in the great results when he stated, that, taking the estimates at 18 millions, with the interest of the debt provided for, there would have arisen a surplus of a million and a half, if the Consolidated Fund had not fallen off. Even with this defalcation, if we had only the expenditure and income of Great Britain to consult, we might entertain the most sanguine hopes, not only of a complete correspondence, but of a favourable balance. The state of the revenue of Ireland, however, which by the act of last session was consolidated with that of Great Britain, would require assistance, and turn the scale against us. Ireland had borne her part in all the toils and dangers of the war: she had contributed her utmost to its happy conclusion; and the measure of consolidating her revenues with those of Great Britain, though it might throw an additional pressure on the finances of the latter, was both politic and just. But while he deprecated all gloomy views of our situation, he was as little disposed to deny, as he was ready to lament, that the country was suffering under the severest pressure in every branch of its industry and resources; that this distress was as universal as it was severe; and that, from the highest to the lowest, through all classes, the hand of Providence was heavily felt. (Hear, hear, hear.) But no State in Europe was exempt, and in comparison, Great Britain was happy, though this could not lighten our distress. The desire of the affluent to relieve the unfortunate was, however, happily great. (Hear.) And this generous sympathy bound all classes together in this happy land. In the highest quarter, the Head of the Government sympathised with them, and was prepared to share their privations; and from the spontaneous movement of his own mind, had expressed his determination to abstain from receiving, in the present state of distress, so much of the Civil List as he could refuse, consistently with maintaining the dignity of his station, without contracting a debt which Parliament would disapprove of incurring. (General cheering.) His Royal Highness had commanded him to inform the House, that he meant to give up, for the public service, a fifth part of the fourth class of the Civil List; which, it ought to be observed, was the only branch connected with the personal expenses or the royal state of the Sovereign; for all the other charges, except the Privy Purse, were as much for paying public services as any other sum comprehended in the public estimates. (Hear, hear.) That branch of the Civil List amounted to 209,000*l.* and his Royal Highness offered out of this and the Privy Purse 50,000*l.* for the public service. (Hear.) His Royal Highness had directed and applauded the exertions of the people, he had shared in their glories, and now generously sympathised in their sufferings, and determined to share their privations. (Hear, hear.) Liberal, however, as was this grant, his Royal Highness's duty, more than his wishes, compelled him to limit it. But the Civil List had last year been reduced as low as possible, and as no debt was to be incurred upon it, his Royal Highness could not make a permanent tender of this reduction, without contracting a debt, which might lead to a degradation of the Crown, by compelling it to call upon the people to pay it. But he had made a sacrifice which he (Lord C.) was sure they would appreciate—(Hear, hear.)—It was not the saving but the principle, that was important—(Hear, hear.)—The feeling it manifested would be universally consolatory, and would be received as a proof of the warm sympathy which his Royal Highness felt in every calamity that affected his people.—The servants of the Crown had resolved to follow this example of their Royal Master, and to give up that part of their salaries which had accrued to them since the abolition of the Property Tax. (Hear, hear.) This would amount to a sum not unworthy the public acceptance, nor unbecoming their station. The only other branch of the subject which he had to bring under the attention of the House related to the formation of a committee for the purpose of inquiring into the income and expenditure of the country. The course he had at first proposed to pursue was that of appointing a secret committee by ballot. He certainly found, on a former night, that this course of proceeding had created great alarm among hon. gentlemen opposite; and he found this alarm especially expressed in a speech of an hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham), in which there was an anticipation of the names of the members of the committee then chosen by ballot, which was certainly not distinguished on account of its novelty (a laugh): for he believed, that an ingenious and witty member of former Houses of Commons (Mr. Sheridan) had been in the habit of making similar anticipations when committees were formed by ballot, to the great amusement of the House. It could not be denied, however, that the mode of ballot had been the old practice of Parliament, and was perhaps to be preferred to any novelty of more recent introduction. It was the way, in fact, in which the Finance Committees of 1791 and of 1797 were formed, which had published such a voluminous mass of able and useful reports. He was aware that in 1807 a different course of proceeding was followed: that a Finance Committee was then formed not by way of ballot; but really, if he took a view of the mode in which that Committee was framed, he thought it not much in favour of the mode of appointment by ostensible nomination in the House. It would be in the recollection of many gentlemen, that the Committee of 1807 originated with Mr. Biddulph, who brought forward a motion for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the emoluments of all public offices, for the purpose of ascertaining what retrenchment could take place in their expenses. Now it was naturally to be expected, from the principles of independence and absence of undue influence so strongly recommended by gentlemen opposite, in such appointments, that they who formed the government of that day would have left the honourable member (Mr. Biddulph) to name his own Committee. But what was the fact? The Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day (Lord H. Petty) took the whole matter into his own hands, and did not allow Mr. Biddulph to name any member at all. (A laugh, and hear, hear.) What then was the material difference between this course of proceeding, and that by way of ballot, which had been held up to ridicule? He did not think that the balance of argument was at all against the ballot. He would not deny that this proceeding by open nomination had been followed in several other instances since 1807: and as there was nothing which he more deprecated, on an inquiry of such vital importance, than a want of liberality on either side; as it was a subject not in his opinion of political contest, but of deliberate and solemn investigation; if by any admission on his part he could avoid a contest, he was prepared to do it on the present occasion, and to nominate the committee openly in the House. (Cries of hear, hear, from all sides.) But before he mentioned any names, he would endeavour to describe what the qualifications of the members ought to be. As to their being perfectly impartial, and without feelings of preference to this or that side of the House, it was not to be expected; for he believed he could hardly name 21 individuals who came under this description. (Hear.) But he confessed he had not observed, that the sentiments of that small class of men who wished to be considered as neutral and independent were treated with any respect by gentlemen on the opposite side; on the contrary, the House must have remarked, that if any class of persons were treated by them with more contempt, asperity, or sarcasm than another, it was that which set up a species of claim to independence and impartiality. (Hear, and a laugh.) This kind of claim seemed, indeed, to be resented by gentlemen opposite with peculiar acrimony; so that he could not expect to form a committee out of that rare and pure class of members which would be at all acceptable to them (A laugh). He must frankly confess, that though he did not share that spirit to its full extent with which gentlemen opposite seemed imbued, yet he believed, that the splendid and comparatively happy situation which the country enjoyed was produced in a great degree by the fair, manly, and liberal conflict of parties, and that it was by their determined competition that truth, wisdom, and public virtue were often elicited. (Hear, hear.) It was from that conflict of opinion that he expected the proper sifting of the important questions relative to the income and expenditure of the country that would come under the examination of the committee; and when the spirit now abroad, which aimed rather at destruction, under the pretence of reform, had evaporated, he had no hesitation in thinking, that the sober good sense of the country would settle into an approbation of what was right to be done in its present situation, and that it would be materially assisted by the investigations and recommendations of the committee. With regard to its formation, he was aware that no proper confidence would be placed in it, if official men, or the expectants of office, predominated in its formation. But, on the other hand, he was confident that no Judge sitting on the bench would wish to decide any question without the assistance of the opinion and arguments of gentlemen at the bar, so, in like manner, it was desirable that the country gentlemen who were on the committee should have the assistance of that class of public men who were in office at present, as well as of others who might aspire to fill the same situations on the event of any change of administration, as men best calculated to afford a variety of useful information on the public revenue and expenditure. Hence, he had selected a variety of members from the two latter classes, as well as from gentlemen who were not looking forward to office. The House, however, would not trust implicitly to the investigations of their committee; which was rather intended for the purpose of probing the circumstances to the bottom that might come before it, than of dictating measures for the adoption of the House. Parliament, of course, could make no abdication of its own peculiar functions in favour of the twenty-one gentlemen who would go to form the committee. He should rejoice if gentlemen of both sides of the House went into it with an ardent wish to contribute their best services to the salvation of the country, amidst its present difficulties, rather than to obtain any temporary triumph over one another. (Hear, hear.) He should propose, that there be referred to the committee all the papers relating to the proposed reductions in our establishments for the present year, together with a view of all the reductions made by Ministers in the course of last year, and which would shew that they had not been neglectful of their duty to the country. He had to notice, however, as one cause of the delay with which these reductions had been attended, the great mass of unaudited accounts with which the different branches of the Government were incumbered. When these were in some degree cleared away, there would be more opportunity for operating with effect. He likewise proposed, that a statement of the income, charge, and expenditure, of the country for the last year, should be laid before the committee, together with the estimates for the present year, and similar estimates of their probable amount for the years 1818 and 1819, so far as such estimates could be framed at present. The committee might also probably extend their researches into other years, until we could fairly look to the formation of a peace establishment on sound principles of public economy. He should be unwilling, indeed, to fetter the proceedings of the committee in any degree, especially into any part of the expenditure and revenue of the country for the three years to which he had more particularly referred. He should conclude with proposing the appointment of a committee, to consist of 21 members, "to inquire into and state the income and expenditure of the United Kingdom, for the year ended the 5th of January 1817, and also to consider and state the probable income and expenditure (so far as the same can now be estimated) for the years ending the 5th of January 1818, and the 5th of January 1819 respectively, and to report the same, together with their observations thereupon; and also to consider what further measures may be adopted for the relief of the country from any part of the said expenditure without detriment to the public service." Before he sat down it would be right to mention, that he proposed the committee should be invested with full powers to send for persons, papers, and records (hear, hear); that they should possess all the means of pursuing their inquiries to the bottom.

The noble lord concluded with reading the following list:—

Lord Castlereagh,	Mr. Arbuthnot,
Chancellor of the Ex-	Mr. Frankland Lewis,
chequer,	Mr. Huskisson,
Mr. Ponsonby,	Mr. N. Calvert,
Mr. Banks,	Mr. Davies Gilbert,
Mr. Long,	Mr. Cartwright,
Mr. Tierney,	Mr. Holford,
Lord Binning,	Mr. Edward Littleton,
Sir J. Newport,	Lord Clive,
Mr. Peel,	Mr. Gooch,
Mr. C. W. Wynn,	Sir T. Acland.

Mr. Tierney begged the House to recollect, that he had last year assumed the probable estimates for this year at 19 millions, so that he had not been far out, the necessary documents being before the House. The noble lord, however, had left out rather a material feature in his case (a laugh), which was the income which was to meet this expenditure. He was far from wishing to encourage a spirit of despondency; but he felt most strongly, what it seemed his Majesty's Ministers were at last brought to feel, that now was the time for probing the subject to the bottom. He was glad that Ministers at last saw what every body else had long seen—that the expenses of the country should be reduced to some reasonable proportion with its means. From the best estimate which he could make, and he had no reason to believe that his results differed from those of the noble lord, there would be, under all circumstances, a sum of 3 millions to be made good; and he was quite sure that, in the main, the taxes would be found to have diminished rather than increased. He was glad to find that the Sinking Fund was to be spared. He had always maintained one uniform opinion on the necessity and excellence of that deposit; in the midst of the warmest hostility against Mr. Pitt, he had always done justice to the usefulness of that measure; and in spite of all that was now said against it, notwithstanding all he heard and all he read in opposition to that plan of finance, he still retained his original opinion. Nothing but evident and absolute danger, nothing but the prospect of peril, threatening the very existence of the State, could induce him to consent to have recourse to that sacred fund. (Hear, hear.) The example of reduction in the highest quarter had certainly come late, but it was well that it had come. There could be no doubt that the Regent had all along been disposed to make this sacrifice to the sufferings of the people; and it must surely be matter of deep regret, that Ministers had not sooner advised this honourable step. They must the more regret this delay, because the timely offer of such a concession on the part of the Crown would have allayed much of the discontent which had displayed itself in so turbulent a manner. He was glad also to learn, that a reduction was to take place in the salaries of the principal officers of the Crown. Ministers, however, must not take credit to themselves for this proceeding: it had been extorted from them, and did not come in that shape or season to entitle them to praise. The noble lord, in treating this part of his speech, had lowered his voice as if the subject was not particularly agreeable to him (a laugh); but he understood the noble lord to say, that this scheme of reduction could not be made without an Act of Parliament. It might be so, but yet he could not help thinking that the noble lord was mistaken. He recollected an instance in point: Sir James Pulteney, when in office, had given up the whole of his salary without calling for the sanction of any statute. And here he would take the opportunity of saying, that he did not at the time, nor did he now approve of the circumstance of a man of large fortune accepting office, and refusing any salary: it was an invidious precedent, operating to the prejudice of official men of moderate incomes. But though he thought it unfair that a man of great wealth should make a parade of receiving no salary at all, yet he conceived the quantity of salary suited to the duties of an office to be a very different question, and he certainly could not see the necessity of passing an Act of Parliament to enable men to give up part of their salaries if they thought fit so to do. Surely they might be indulged in so laudable an inclination, without the intervention of legislative authority. (A laugh.) He would say nothing as to the mode of this intended reduction, except merely to urge that the rate of charge for the property tax was no criterion as to what ought to be its amount. With respect to the main object of the noble lord's speech, the formation of a committee of financial inquiry, the noble lord had thought proper to abandon his favourite scheme of ballot: he had admitted, that a sudden change had taken place in his opinion on this point; and yet, most inconsistently, he was very angry that any other person should find fault with what now appeared untenable even to himself. He had, very unnecessarily, rated an hon. and learned friend of his for reviving what he was pleased to call an old joke of Mr. Sheridan's. To be sure, his hon. and learned friend knew quite as well as the noble lord that it was an old joke; but it was also a very good joke, and never could have been applied more fairly than on an occasion where the noble lord had made such a parade of an impartial method of choosing a committee. The fact was, that the noble lord had selected his committee, not from any wish to accommodate the views of the Opposition, but from delicacy to the feelings of certain members of his own side of the house. There was, indeed, a considerable number of members in that house belonging to that class of persons who "do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame." (A laugh.) This respectable body of representatives, though for the best of reasons doubtless they lent their aid to Ministers, yet were not without their feelings (a laugh): they had a sort of sense of decency, and it required sometimes a good deal of management to keep them in good humour. Their scruples made them sometimes a little restive, and unless certain forms of decorum were preserved to satisfy their consciences a little, they were apt to say to a Minister—"If you don't do so and so we shan't vote for you." (A laugh, and hear, hear.) It was from delicacy to the sensibility of these gentlemen, that the noble lord had found it necessary to make show of candour in his mode of choosing the committee; though with what reluctance he acted might be judged from the long funeral oration which he had pronounced on his poor departed friend the ballot. (Laughter.) What he (Mr. T.) wanted, with respect to a proper and efficient committee, was different from what the noble lord seemed to wish. There was business and labour enough on this subject, not merely for one, but for three or four committees. The House must set their shoulders to the task of examination, and go to work in a determined manner. A separate committee might be necessary to examine the accounts and state of the affairs of the army, and the commissariat, and other branches connected with it, and to probe them to the bottom. Another committee might be requisite to inquire into the affairs and expenditure of the colonies. Another would be also desirable and requisite to inquire respecting the civil offices, and report on the practicable reductions in them; which last object he had particularly in view. He considered that there was nothing efficacious to be granted; but that it seemed intended to draw a curtain to prevent the public from obtaining a full view of the public expenditure. (Hear.) The numerous and important subjects which might come before this proposed committee, if it devoted its labours to them, might render it impossible for them to produce a sufficient report till a period of the session when it was not likely that there would be a full attendance. Another point to which he wished to advert was, the principle of the nomination of the committee. The noble lord said, that the committee should comprise gentlemen of all descriptions, those on all sides most conversant with public topics. He was ready to agree with what he had heard of party men being useful to the country: it was useful that there should be such men acting on honest principles, and clinging together for great objects: no great good could be done to the country without it. (Hear.) As to what were termed the neutrals, there had been one neutrality, an armed neutrality, which joined one of the belligerents, and were all directly promoted and placed upon the staff. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord knew very well that such neutrals went out to fight with double colours in their hold. (Hear, hear.) He had also contended, that a great advantage was to be derived from having gentlemen in office placed upon the committee. Now he (Mr. T.) had no objection upon a new committee of finance that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and others should sit in it: they would be able to make many statements and explanations, and therefore might be useful to the labours of the committee. They could not, with all their ingenuity, make much alteration in figures, and therefore so far he would trust them. But the matter was widely different when it turned on the question of abolishing offices; since the holders perhaps of these offices were themselves to sit and vote in the Committee. He thought it his duty to object to any of the officers of Government being appointed members of the Committee, when other members possessed a sufficient judgment on the subject in this particular. He did not, however, want the Committee to be without their valuable assistance; he did not at all object to the Committee hearing them as counsel, but he did object to their making part of the jury. They might be very respectable gentlemen, and he had an unfeigned respect for some of them, but in such an inquiry he would rather have the honour of a different company. (Hear.) The noble lord had made some allusions on the subject of influence, to the committee appointed on the motion of Lord Henry Petty, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. The fact on that occasion was, that Lord Henry Petty had proposed one more member than was usual. There was only one minister in that committee, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose name, in the customary manner, as the mover, was first put to the vote. There were 22 members instead of the usual practice of 21. Mr. Biddulph, he believed, moved for an additional member to the committee (a gentleman who then represented Lincoln); and the answer to that motion was, that there was already one more member on it than usual, and therefore the proposition was not necessary. Now it was his (Mr. T.'s) intention to take the sense of the House on the question, whether, on this occasion, the holders of offices should sit in the Committee. All might probably agree to their presence in a committee as far as it related only to financial statements; but he wished to stop the second instruction, in order to have a committee named that night to consider what reductions could be made of offices or salaries, and composed of members unconnected with office, and who were commonly called the independent members. (A laugh.) By the appointment of committees, dividing the examinations, the House might have a tolerable certainty of getting the reports during the session: but if not, they could never satisfy the minds of the public, who would only see that they had appointed a Committee of 21 with no great probability of doing any thing effectual, and who would not out of doors express themselves with as much courtesy as he felt obliged to shew within. (Hear.) If nobody else did, which he hoped some one would, he should feel it his duty to propose a second instruction for the naming of a committee, by a good and fair selection, which ought to be met by Ministers honestly, fairly, and above board. He must, in honesty, tell the House, that one great object with him, respecting the Committee, was the reduction of the influence of the Crown. The fourth class of the civil list, he understood to be the only class in which the Prince Regent had a direct personal interest. He wished, however, to examine the third class, and probe into the various recent arrangements concerning foreign ministers, and their pensions. (Hear.) He wished to know whether, under all the circumstances, the House would entertain the idea that they were not to look into the establishments—the expenditure of the double court of Windsor and Carlton-house, with all the extra grooms and lords of the bed-chamber. (Hear.) He did not desire to take away any thing from the real splendour and dignity of the Crown: but if none of these offices were abolished, there would arise a question as to the propriety of such officers holding their seats in that House. (Hear.) There were not less than 60 of these gentlemen, all of whom were liable to be dismissed at pleasure. (Hear.) If they deducted their number from some of the ministerial majorities, the result would appear, that the fair and free sense of the House was against the measures of ministers. He did not mean to say that gentlemen holding offices acted unjustly and unconscientiously in their votes: they acted with their party, and he threw no blame upon them for that. But yet, it must in fairness be observed, that they had an additional stimulus. (Hear.) He remembered what the late Mr. Fox had said on this subject: he had observed, that a gentleman's holding an office during pleasure might not be a reason for his vote; but that it was a symptom of the vote he might be expected to give. (Hear.) The only real road to the certainty of economy was by taking away this kind of influence. Many members were connected by the ties of relationship to those who were in power. He hoped, therefore, that the noble lord would agree to a practical mode. Opportunities would, of course, arise for objections to be made to any particular names proposed: but let the House desire the noble lord to leave out the names of the holders of public offices, and to act with downright honesty. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not agree with the right hon. gentleman that, instead of one committee, there ought to be different committees for the separate investigation of every branch of the public services. With respect to the financial statements of the right hon. gentleman, he would endeavour to set him right in one or two instances. And first, as to the gracious communication from the Prince

Regent, it could not have been made at an earlier period of the session, as his Royal Highness had not been able to ascertain or compute what reduction he could make in his expenditure. Upon what personally concerned the members of his Majesty's Government, he was only anxious that the sacrifice which they meant to make might not be construed as in any way admitting a principle of taxation upon office. What they had done was merely voluntary: and he had no doubt that other gentlemen who held offices under the Crown would follow the example which was set them from the highest quarter. As to the Sinking Fund, he had heard with great pleasure the sentiments which had been expressed, that steady and inviolable faith ought to be kept with the public creditor. But although the right hon. gentleman was very wrong in his details with respect to that fund, it was much more important to notice an error which he had made in summing up his account of the income and expenditure. In making up his account of the income, the right hon. gentleman had stated only that of the British Consolidated Fund; but in the charge he included the whole of the expense of a great part of that of Ireland, to the amount of 3,000,000*l.*; so that he was wrong in no less a sum than this 3,000,000*l.* In regard to the balance between our income and expenditure, it was very satisfactory to think, that during the last year, notwithstanding the heavy disadvantages under which the finances of the country laboured, the navy debt reduced to the extent of 1,000,000*l.*, while that of the Exchequer Bills was increased by exactly the same amount. In the Consolidated Fund there had certainly been a considerable deficiency. For the four quarters ending the 5th of January, 1817, the total amount was about 1,000,000*l.* The actual deficiency was 400,000*l.*, to which was to be added the arrear of the property-tax unappropriated, which made it up to the sum which he had stated. During the year there had been a deficiency in most of the branches of the public revenue, which on some branches was more, and on others, might on the whole be fairly calculated at a diminution of 10 per cent. on the whole revenue. In the Customs it was as much as 20 per cent.; but in the other branches it was much less, taking it on the whole at what he had stated it to be. He would ask whether, considering all the circumstances of the last year, this deficiency was to be wondered at, when it was considered that, in former years, there had been a deficiency of 10 per cent. occasioned merely by a bad harvest. It must certainly be a great satisfaction to the House to know, that, notwithstanding the diminution of the income which had rendered it necessary to anticipate the taxes by issuing Exchequer Bills to a very considerable amount, yet great progress had been made last year in the diminution of the public debt, a progress much greater than under all the circumstances of the case could have been expected, and certainly greater than he had felt himself last summer warranted in holding out to the House. The amount of the public debt paid off in this country was 19 millions of stock, and in Ireland one million, making together 20,000,000*l.* of stock, or about 13,000,000*l.* of money. Under these circumstances it might naturally be supposed that the unfunded debt must have been greatly augmented; but he was happy to say that such was not the case. On the 5th of January, 1816, the amount of outstanding Exchequer Bills was 41 millions and a half, and on the 5th of January, 1817, 38 millions and a half, besides six millions which the Bank held in consequence of an advance which it had made to Government. There was therefore an increase of about three millions in the unfunded debt: but there was at the same time a diminution of two millions of navy debt, and of 500,000*l.* of army bills; so that, in fact, there was no actual increase of the unfunded debt in this country. In Ireland the unfunded debt had been increased by the issue of three millions of Exchequer Bills; so that deducting the increase of the unfunded debt in Ireland from the decrease of the funded debt in England, it would appear that the actual diminution of the total debt of the united kingdom was about 10 millions, not of stock but of money, in the course of the last year. This statement would afford solid grounds of hope for the future; and he thought it necessary to say thus much, in order to take off any unfavourable impression made by the speech of the right hon. gentleman. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Grenfell was convinced it was highly desirable to keep up the Sinking Fund, under the meaning of its being a fund to provide for the extinction of public debt: but the hopes of the noble lord appeared to be confined to making income square with expenditure. The honourable gentleman (Mr. Tierney) had stated his opinion, that it would fall short; he (Mr. G.) wanted to know what could be applied this year to extinguish debt, except by borrowing money.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer hoped that a considerable sum would be paid off in the course of this year, though not so much as in the last. The amount of the estimate was 18 millions odd. The interest of the unfunded debt was 1,900,000*l.*: the whole 20 millions odd. Taking old naval stores, the lottery, and other branches, there would be eight millions odd, applicable; to which add 14 millions, and there was a total of 22 millions, exceeding the supply by about 1,400,000*l.*

Mr. Grenfell observed, that if any excess of expenditure should take place, he could not conceive how the Government could manage without resorting to a loan.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer repeated that his calculations as to the present year were founded upon the produce of the fund alluded to within the last year.

Mr. Saville expressed the fullest confidence in the views of his Majesty's Ministers; but said, that he should rather wish to have the proposed Committee nominated like an ordinary election committee; or if that plan were objected to, that the names of all the county members only should be put into the glasses.

Mr. B. Shaw asked, whether it was to be understood that the produce of the Sinking Fund would be applied bonâ fide to the reduction of the public debt, or to the payment of the current expenses of the year?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that the produce of the Sinking Fund would be applied solely to the purpose for which it was destined, conformably to the several acts of Parliament.

Sir C. Monck opposed the resolutions of the noble lord, as unconstitutional and unsatisfactory.

Mr. Brand said, the confidence of the country could be regained by no measures so effectually as by a motion for the appointment of a committee; but it must be a very different committee from that of the noble lord which would produce such an effect. The people of England did not place confidence in the gentlemen on the opposite bench when they professed economy—they remembered too well that they had made the same professions last year, and yet that they had immediately after such professions created useless offices, and increased the salaries of many officers. (Hear, hear.) It was at this very moment proposed to continue an office vacant by the death of Lord Buckinghamshire, that of clerk of the pleas in Ireland 4000*l.* a year, which, in a report of a finance committee of the House, was declared to be one which ought not to be continued. (Hear, hear.) When the vice-treasurership of Ireland was created, that measure had been reprobated as one of the most barefaced jobs which had ever come before the House. This office of clerk of the pleas was continued with the very same views which had given rise to the vice-treasurership of Ireland, and would, in all probability, be bestowed on the same individual for whom the other office had been created. (Hear, hear.) He would again warn the right hon. and honourable gentlemen opposite, if they persevered in this measure, if they did not yield to the feelings of the people, and allow a fair inquiry to be instituted as to what retrenchments might be effected, what useless places abolished, what pensions enjoyed by undeserving individuals withdrawn, they would never regain the confidence of the people, nor be able to execute with effect the functions placed by the constitution in their hands. He should move as an amendment, to leave out all the latter part of the motion of the noble lord, and in lieu thereof, in the first place, move, That the select committee to be appointed should inquire into what reductions since 1798 had taken place in the salaries and emoluments of the different persons holding public offices, and consider what other measures might be instituted for further reducing the expenditure of the country.

The Speaker said, it would be necessary for the hon. gentleman, in the first place, to move, by way of amendment, that the second part of the motion of the noble lord should be omitted; and if that was agreed to, then the hon. gentleman might move that his amendment be substituted.

This suggestion having been adopted, the Speaker put the question accordingly.

Mr. Gipps then rose, and said, that he disapproved of allowing men in office to have seats in the committee; and although it was with considerable reluctance that he objected to any part of the noble lord's motion, yet he could not vote in favour of that part of it. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, nothing could be more absurd than for the House to agree to such an amendment.

Mr. Brougham would venture to predict, that every salutary object would be evaded by the overwhelming mass of papers with which the committee would be inundated. A separate investigation by a committee confined to any specific object, was the point to which all eyes were turned—an investigation how far useless places could be abolished—how far sinecures could be destroyed—how far the patronage of the Crown, in or out of Parliament, could be abridged. (Hear, hear, hear.) At a time like the present, when the last shilling was wrung from a suffering people, it became of importance that no burdens, however small, should be sustained, but such as were absolutely necessary. A great deal had been said by the noble lord against the manner in which the committee of 1807 had been appointed; but a more unfounded clamour never had been raised. His noble friend (the Marquis of Lansdowne) had acceded to the committee the moment it was proposed by Mr. Biddulph; and Mr. Biddulph, feeling satisfied that the subject was about to be taken up by abler hands, waived the further prosecution of the measure. The subject for inquiry was the same then as at present, the reduction of useless expenditure. The charge now brought against the noble marquis was, that, in striking the committee, he had not chosen any of the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House—that he did not seek for destroyers of sinecures and abolishers of useless offices among those gentlemen who then happened to sit on the side where he now sat. But had his noble friend done so, he would have frustrated the very object which he had in view, and Mr. Biddulph would never have consented to withdraw his motion. This would have made the very gentlemen judges who were parties, for they were either holders of the offices and sinecures which it was proposed to abolish, or expectants (hear); they expected that they would soon fill them, and they grudged every moment which his noble friend and those in office along with him held their places: and they contrived by a base manœuvre to trip up their heels. (Hear, hear.) His noble friend had, therefore, taken the appointment of the committee out of their hands, and appointed a fair committee; and if they wanted an eulogium of that committee, they would find it in what speedily followed. When the noble lord opposite and his friends came into office, nothing more was heard of that committee, and others were substituted to them, because it was feared that they would have done their duty, and proposed to cut down all sinecures and useless places. He had a light suspicion that matters would go on very differently in the present committee. The noble lord had proposed six gentlemen from his own side of the House, and then six gentlemen from the other side; and certainly nothing could, arithmetically speaking, be more exact, with reference to the two parties; but then it would be found that the six individuals taken from his side of the House would be without any followers; whereas the other six from their office would be found, somehow or other, to possess more influence among the nine neutral men, as they had been called. Of the other nine members, he would not say that all would follow the six ministerial members: but this he would say, that they would not follow the other side; and that in all questions of reductions which should be opposed as trenching too much on the influence of the Crown, the six opposition members would stand alone, or at most gain over one or two members from the neutral side. It had been said that men in office were necessary to be on the committee, for the sake of affording the necessary information; but when there was a power of sending for persons, papers and records, he could not see that they were required in the committee as members. No man had ever opposed more strenuously than himself that groundless clamour which accused public men of receiving too great a proportion of the public money. It would be much nearer the truth to strike a balance, and say that some were paid at too high a rate, while others were paid moderately. But former times were different from the present, and a different rule of conduct ought to be adopted. It was not merely, as had been stated, the defective harvest which had caused the deficiency in the revenue—there was a falling off in the quarter before it was known that the harvest could be bad—there was a falling off in the produce of the customs, the excise, and the assessed taxes, and the deficit was gradually increasing, and would continue to increase. This shewed that something was rotten in the State, though he hoped it was not incurably rotten. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, the House ought not to be astonished at finding only such and such a deficit, when they recollected the circumstances of the country, and the extreme distress which prevailed. Why, certainly there could be no doubt that it was because the trade and industry of the country had fallen off, that taxes and every thing else had fallen off in the same proportion. They had either the prospect of not being able to pay the interest of the national debt, or they must cut down the establishments still more, and, under the present distressed circumstances of the country, diminish the salaries of the great Officers of State. The communication of the intended reduction on the part of the Prince Regent, as far as it went, was of a nature to give great satisfaction. He trusted, that this example would have imitators among all those in the immediate neighbourhood of that illustrious personage (a laugh): he trusted that the Officers of State would go and do likewise—that they would give up somewhat to the difficulties of the times, and the unprecedented embarrassment of the finances. He understood that the noble lord had intimated a reduction of a tenth—but that was not the proportion which ought to be given up—he hoped the example of his Royal Highness would be followed to the very letter. It did not signify to talk now about keeping up dignity and splendour. If he were consulted at this moment of apprehended danger to the constitution, he should reply, that the best safeguard of the monarchy was the reign of the monarch in the hearts of the people. (Hear, hear.) He should add, that it was not by tawdry and expensive decorations that the good-will of the people could be conciliated: that desirable object could only be attained by acts which shewed a sympathy between the higher and the lower classes, and joined wealth and poverty in a friendly bond. The Ministers themselves would be more deeply rooted in their stations, if, instead of supporting the vain splendour of the court, they would prosecute the great object of economy in all its various branches, and in every department of the State. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Canning doubted whether the proposed estimates were not rather lower in some points than it was proper they should be. If any danger was now likely to arise, it certainly was not from the extent of our military establishment, but from the very reverse. The influence of the Crown had been for years on the decrease—from the days when those saviours of the country, the Whigs, had passed the Septennial Act. Gentlemen opposite had no right to assume, that the object of the committee was to diminish the influence of the Crown, and to state that as a reason for excluding official men. If a committee were specifically formed to inquire whether that influence had not been increased, and ought not to be diminished, then, indeed, it might be right to reject the members of Government—but he denied, that the committee now contemplated, had any such object in view. This committee was to be appointed to consider what could be done in the way of reduction, although probably no very considerable relief could be expected from its labours. In observing on that part of his noble friend's speech, in which he stated, that he and his colleagues meant to give up a part of their income, the learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) had observed, that the House should call for something more extensive than this voluntary sacrifice. This way of receiving such a proposition, was not very encouraging to any fresh instance of self-denial. Never, till the learned gentleman had stated his sentiments, had reduction in the salary attached to office, been considered but in one of these two ways; 1st, as taking its share fairly with the other burdens of the country; or, 2dly, as manifesting sympathy and commiseration for the sufferings of the people. But the learned gentleman seemed to think, that considerable relief might be effected by the reductions he spoke of. If, however, he looked to the labours of former committees, and examined their opinion on the subject, he would not see any great reason for supposing, if his suggestion were complied with, that it would produce the effect which he seemed to imagine. He did not mean to say, that every possible reduction ought not to be made. They ought to take all that they could, on the principle of quantum valeat potest—but still, he was convinced, the effect would not be such as the learned gentleman expected. The only point they had to consider was, whether any reduction could be made in the public expenditure—and, in that view of the question, he contended, that official men, in a fair and reasonable proportion, were necessary to the correctness of such an inquiry. But, it was said, if official men sat on the committee, it would put an end to any inquiry that might now be set on foot, with respect to irregularities in their offices. But this was not the case. If gentlemen looked to the Order-book, they would find, that notices of four motions of that description were given for four different days, with which the Finance Committee could not interfere. The present time was not advantageous or proper for going into a discussion on the duties of this committee; but, with respect to its formation, it did appear to him, that no ground was stated to shew why the House should not repose the same confidence in it, that they had hitherto placed in committees of finance and expenditure, nor could he see in the names of that committee (and he could speak without reserve, his own not being in the number) any one that could excite the smallest suspicion of an improper bias.

Mr. Wilberforce, after the best consideration of the subject, could not give an entire approbation to the appointment of the committee. It would be unfair not to acknowledge, that the sacrifices which the Prince Regent had offered to make, presented an example worthy of imitation by the Ministers of the Crown. The appointment of a committee to inquire into the reductions possible in the civil and military establishments was highly expedient; but he was much afraid that no report could be made to the House in sufficient time to be useful for present purposes. His mind was pretty fully made up on this point, when he heard the noble lord say, that it might sit one year or two years, or perhaps three years. If this were the case, what benefit could be expected to result from its labours? Could it be even expected to last out its full time? Was there not one idea intimately associated with such a committee—namely, that the dissolution of Parliament would put an end to its existence? If only the length of time were considered, that alone was a great objection to it. On a former occasion, on which you, Sir (addressing the Speaker), sat with so much ability, no report was made till a considerable time after the formation of the committee. His right hon. friend had said, that official men were improper persons to sit on such a committee; but it would be highly injurious to the constitution and to the welfare and interests of the country, if official men had not seats in that House. But the question now was, whether on a committee appointed to consider what reductions could be made in the national expenditure, official men were proper persons to assist: and surely, where one great subject of discussion would be the possibility and mode of reducing offices, no persons could be so proper to advise as official men who possessed the best information. With respect to the influence of the Crown, he contended, in opposition to the right hon. gentleman who spoke last, that it had increased very considerably of late years. When he considered the great increase of our establishments, military, naval, and fiscal, together with our vast colonial possessions, it was impossible not to see that the influence of the Crown was exceedingly augmented. It in fact met every man every where; and while he deprecated as much as any man those attempts which had been made to inflame the public mind, and excite a contempt for our excellent constitution (which, as the hon. and learned gentleman had said, was the only form of Government that could secure the happiness and independence of a nation), he by no means granted that the way to reconcile the people to their sufferings, and to quiet their minds, was by refusing to make such reductions in every department, as could be effected without injury to the public service. It was of extreme importance with regard to the estimation in which Parliament was to be held by the people, that we should act in a way to secure their good opinion and confidence. Their tempers might be a little soured by their sufferings; and they might, under the influence of such feelings, look with jealousy on a committee so appointed, as not to hold out any hope of substantial relief. He concluded by observing, that so great was the influence of the Crown, that it would be very difficult for any members of the committee to maintain opinions different from the wishes of the Government; and therefore, while he acceded to the first proposition, he could wish that both sides of the House should concede something towards forming a committee, in which party interests might not predominate either way. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Lascelles conscientiously believed, that the intentions held forth this night would be carried into practice. The country, however, would be better satisfied with the committee, if there were not so many official men upon it. For himself he would say, that if any member of that committee should come down and complain of any obstruction to the furtherance of any object of retrenchment, he would support any motion founded on that complaint. With respect to the expenditure, he could not but hope that we had now seen the worst times: commerce seemed to be improving, and he hoped that the relief of the agricultural interests would follow. With these explanations, he should certainly give his vote for the committee as at present composed.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald (in reference to what had fallen from Mr. Brand), defended his conduct as Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland, and said, that whatever situation might be intended for him, he could at least say, that no one had ever retired from office who was less liable to the charge of being mercenary than himself. He had not, however, the slightest reason to suppose that the office of Vice-treasurer for Ireland was intended for him.

Sir Thomas Acland thought it impossible for any person not to feel, that a great part of the benefit to result from any investigation, must depend on having men on the committee who were acquainted with business. As little should he expect any success, unless those in the habits of Opposition also formed a part of it. The noble lord had stated that his real object was the reduction of our expenditure, and he believed him to be sincere; for if insincere, what an awful responsibility did he incur in the eye of the House and of the country!

Mr. Ponsonby said, the question before the House was, how it should attain that object, which all agreed was one of great anxiety, both within and without. The proposal of the noble lord (Castlereagh) had been to appoint a committee for considering the income and expenditure of the country. The proposal of the hon. member for Hertfordshire, was to divide this labour—to have one committee for considering the income of the country, and another for considering the expenditure: and the question was, which of these modes would prove the best. The hon. baronet, (Acland) and the noble lord (Lascelles) thought that the assistance of official men was essentially necessary to the committee. He would ask them, which was most likely to convince the country that the House was in earnest, the appointment of 21 or 42 individuals to perform the same quantity of labour; the appointment of one committee for the consideration of two objects, or two committees who might each confine their attention to a more limited inquiry? The fate of the country was in the hands of that House, and it was necessary to shew, that they were determined to reduce the burdens of the people. On the score of reduction, the noble lord had stated what had given him great satisfaction: approved of the resolution of his Majesty's servants to abate a portion of their salaries; they owed it to the country: but he would go farther, and say, that there was no individual whatever receiving a salary, that ought not to be willing to reduce it. He spoke this as an interested person, and he thought the reduction proposed was not sufficient: for his own part he was ready to go farther. (Hear, hear, hear.) To be sure, the private means of others might not enable them to go so far this way as his own happily enabled him; nor did he think that any thing he could contribute, would be sensibly felt as a diminution of the great public burden: but if he were followed by others, he was certain something might be done to alleviate the pressure of that burden; and above all, to shew that the servants of the Crown were not such as ignorant and unprincipled men had represented them to be. In estimating the amount of the reduction to be made, the rise in the value of money should be taken into consideration: 90% now, was more than 100% a year or two ago, and this difference of value should be a criterion of the reduction. But there were many situations held under Government, where the emolument was so small, that it would be cruel to propose a reduction, and cruel to receive it. (Hear, hear.) The parties who would relinquish in such case, would be more distressed than any portion of the community that might be benefited by their deprivation. He again repeated, however, that it was the duty of his Majesty's Ministers to make such a reduction as might relieve, in some degree, the sufferings of the nation: but above all, it was their duty, in making the reduction, to shew, that the members of that House were not such as they had been represented by the partizans of a turbulent faction.

Mr. Gooch professed himself a strong advocate for economy, and declared that the statement which had been made by the noble lord, was completely satisfactory to him.

Mr. Calcraft was surprised beyond measure at the hon. gentleman who had just sat down: he had expressed himself a friend to economy and to speedy reform and relief; and yet he was satisfied with the committee of the noble lord, which was to sit three years; this he deemed a speedy relief. He congratulated the constituents of the hon. gentleman: but he should be much surprised if they were satisfied with such tardy retrenchment, and such ambiguous reform. He thought the proposal of a noble lord (Lascelles) to support any member who proposed an amendment on the proceedings of the committee, wholly inefficacious.

A division then took place upon the original question; when the numbers were,

Ayes - - - - - 210

Noes - - - - - 117

Majority for Ministers - - 93

While strangers were shut out for the division—

Sir J. Sebright said, that he had been named by the present Ministers a Member of the Civil List Committee, but he found he could do nothing, as they refused the powers necessary to render it effective, and made it, in fact, a gross delusion upon the public. He considered the present Committee to be also a gross imposition, and would not put his foot into a Committee so constituted, as by so doing he should be lending his aid to mislead and delude the country. He declared that he was as hostile as any man, to the factious and misguided part of the community; but that now was the time when it became the imperative duty of all independent members and country gentlemen to come forward, and to support such measures as would conciliate the rational and moderate part of the community. He therefore declined to be a member.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the present Committee had the powers which had been refused to the Civil List Committee.

Sir J. Sebright.—I am aware of that; but I owe it to my country not to contribute, to practise a gross and scandalous delusion upon the public.

Lord Morpeth said, his health would not allow of regular attendance; but that, even if that objection did not exist, he thought the constitution of the committee was such, as not to merit the confidence of the country.

A second division subsequently took place, upon the question, whether Lord Binning or Mr. Tremayne be appointed on the committee.

The numbers were,

Ayes, for Lord Binning - - 178

Noes, for Mr. Tremayne - - 136

Majority for Ministers - - 42

A third division occurred on the question, whether Mr. Huskisson or Mr. Tremayne be elected to form one of the committee.

The numbers were,

Ayes, for Mr. Huskisson - - 180

Noes, for Mr. Tremayne - - 129

Majority for Ministers - - 51

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, February 10.

FRENCH LOAN.] The Lord Chancellor stated, that the noble earl (Lauderdale) had sent him an intimation that it was not his intention to bring forward this day the motion of which he had given notice relative to the loan to the French Government. The intimation that the noble earl would not make the motion to-day did not imply that he would not make it to-morrow; and therefore, in order to give him the opportunity of bringing forward his motion to-morrow, if he thought proper, he moved that the House be summoned for to-morrow. Ordered accordingly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, February 10.

The Speaker informed the House, that he had received an answer to the vote of thanks to the engineers and artillery, sappers and miners employed in Lord Exmouth's fleet. This head of service was omitted in the original vote.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] General Ferguson presented a petition from Dysart, in Scotland, praying for Reform and Retrenchment. The hon. member could not refrain, on this occasion, from adverting to the unparalleled distresses of the people: and must declare, that the measures adopted by the noble lord (Castlereagh) and his colleagues, by the mockery of a committee, was only an insult to the feelings of the people. He must also observe, that he had always been a friend to Reform: at the same time, he should ever oppose the visionary scheme of universal suffrage. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Bennet presented a petition from the town of Kilmarnock, praying for Parliamentary Reform. The hon. member stated, that the meeting at which the petition was agreed to, was most numerous; and the conduct of those assembled at it was most peaceable.

Mr. Brougham felt the highest satisfaction at this statement. In general, however, the numerous meetings which had taken place had been most praiseworthy and peaceable. This conduct on the part of the people, and the numerous petitions presented nightly, signed by hundreds and by thousands, proved what the general sense of the people was. With respect to the proceedings of the committee now sitting, to inquire into the reality of the disaffection said to exist in various districts, he trusted the report of that committee would prove the rumours unfounded. He however wished to refrain from saying any thing till the report should come before the House, when it would be their duty to give it a full discussion. He trusted every one would come to that discussion with an unprejudiced mind. One thing, however, he must advert to, and express his regret at; it was a circumstance which had taken place within the last twenty-four hours. He did not consider it necessary to speak more plainly; but he must express regret at seeing politics introduced into a place where no secular consideration ought ever to be suffered to intrude. (Hear, hear.) This course had been adopted in the worst times of our history, and for the worst purposes. He hoped such a course was not now to be adopted.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

IRISH DISTILLERIES.] Mr. Fitzgerald (the Knight of Kerry,) moved for an account of the quantity of grain used in the distilleries of Ireland, since the last commencement of distillation as likewise the quantity exported from Ireland since last September. He thought that Government should look into the subject, with the view of ascertaining whether policy did not require, in the present circumstances of Ireland, with respect to the means of subsistence, that the existing laws both regarding distillation and exportation should be suspended.

Mr. Peel would not object to the production of the accounts, though it might be difficult to make them up so as to give the requisite information from the lateness of the period at which distillation commenced. He did not hesitate to say, that all the inquiries made by Government shewed the impolicy of interfering with the existing laws, and the unfounded nature of the censure directed against the Irish administration. The suspension of distillation was not necessary, nor would it be of any service to Ireland. At present, illicit distillation was nearly checked, and he deprecated the adoption of any measures which might excite it to additional activity, with all its baneful influence on the morals, the peace, and the tranquillity of the people.

The motion was agreed to, and the accounts ordered accordingly.

LEATHER TAX.] Mr. Bennet moved for an account of all drawbacks on leather, as likewise the duties charged upon leather in the four last quarters. Ordered.

Mr. Brougham hoped his hon. friend would not content himself with moving for the accounts but would found some proceeding upon them. When it was considered that the additional tax was last year carried with a smaller majority than almost any other tax, there might be some hopes of its repeal. Nothing could tend so much to quiet and sooth the minds of the lower orders in this season of irritation, than to take off some of the burdens that peculiarly affected them.

Mr. Bennet said, he had moved for the papers, that the House might be in possession of the requisite information for future proceedings. A noble lord (Althorpe) might take up the subject, as he did last session.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—MALTA.] The Cape of Good Hope trade bill was read a third time and passed.

The Malta trade bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, February 11.

FRENCH LOAN.] The Earl of Lauderdale stated, that he found it would be inconvenient for some lords, if he were to make his motion relative to the French loan on this day. He therefore moved, that the order for summoning the House be discharged, stating, that he would bring forward the motion on some other day, after having ascertained what day would be convenient. The order was discharged accordingly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, February 11.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Folkestone presented a petition voted yesterday by a numerous assembly of persons in Spa-fields. He knew none of the parties who signed it, and from some parts of its prayer he dissented; yet, as the language was respectful, and as in these days of suffering no obstruction should be offered to the petitions of the people, he willingly performed his duty in presenting it.—The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane presented a petition from a numerous body assembled at Portsdown-hill, in Hampshire. The meeting, he said, was respectably attended, and the utmost harmony prevailed, though the troops had been called out, ball cartridges distributed, and the guns of the garrison loaded. (A laugh.) This petition prayed for universal suffrage: that was, for the right of every man aged 21 to vote. Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane then presented a petition from the journeymen tailors of the metropolis. The petition was read. It complained of the want of business, owing to absentees, and the pressure of taxes, which prevented their customers from wearing so many clothes usual; and prayed for redress, for reduction of Expenditure, and Reform, stating, that this was the first time the petitioners had ever interfered in political business. (A laugh.) Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane presented a petition for Reform from Lymington. It was read, and when the question that it be received was put,

Mr. Lockhart wished to hear a passage of it read over again by the clerk, as it appeared to him objectionable. It was accordingly read, and alleged in substance, that the state of the representation was so corrupt and perverted, that the House of Commons, instead of being the guardian of the people's rights, was employed in nothing but levying burdens upon them; and instead of exercising a control over Ministers, became the tool of Ministers in controlling the people.

Lord Casilereagh objected to this language.

Lord A. Hamilton thought, that as it was not intentionally disrespectful, and contained no direct or studied insult, it should be received.

The House divided, when there appeared

For receiving the petition . . . 43

Against it . . . 72

Majority . . . —29

Lord Cochrane then presented a petition for Reform from the town of Wick, in Scotland, and animadverted with warmth on the scandalous conduct of an hon. member, who had voted against receiving the last petition without having heard a word of its contents. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) If any one circumstance more than another furnished one of the strongest arguments and motives for Parliamentary Reform, it was this—that an hon. member should go to the question, and divide against the petition, without having heard it. He trusted the House would hear again of no such lamentable example of disregard to the prayers of the people, and of neglect of the chief duties of a member of Parliament, “otherwise, I hope,” said the noble lord, addressing himself to the Speaker, “it will be marked and reprobated by you, Sir.” (Loud shouts of hear, hear.)

Sir Francis Burdett said, how could this House, with any fairness, be considered as the representatives of the people, if, when a Minister pronounces his dictum against the reception of a petition, this dictum should be taken as a sample of a House falsely calling itself the Commons’ House of Parliament? (Order, order.)

The Speaker spoke to order. It was unpardonable to say that this House was not the Commons’ House of Parliament; such language was not to be endured from any gentleman. (Cries of hear, hear.)

Sir Francis Burdett.—Whether it was language which the House would not endure he could not say: “but at any rate,” addressing himself to Mr. Speaker, “I may be permitted to add, that after what you yourself once said, as to what would be the feelings and language of our ancestors with regard to practices which had been proved to exist in the mode of procuring seats in that House—after a noble lord opposite had been himself detected in one most nefarious and disgraceful practice, that of bartering a public office for a seat in that House, (loud and tumultuous shouts of hear, hear,) we may surely be permitted to drop a little our pretensions to unsullied purity of character. Unless indeed the people complain specifically of that abominable traffic in which the noble lord was detected, unless they may venture to complain in words as decent as the act itself was vile and indecent, I know not how the question of Parliamentary Reform can be brought under the consideration of the House or of the public. (Hear.) And here he could not help expressing his displeasure at the attempts made both within and without that House, to throw obstructions in the way of petitions. Magistrates had not contented themselves with warning the populace of the danger they were exposed to from riotous, violent proceedings, but they had in the basest manner calumniated the people, for they had done every thing which malice itself could devise, to throw obloquy on public meetings; nor were such attempts without their reward. There had, unhappily, been some parts of the kingdom disgraced by riots, but he defied any man to say, that these riots had proceeded from the friends of Reform. Yet exertions had not been wanting to give such riots the most alarming aspect, and the late attack on his Royal Highness had furnished a favourable opportunity for so doing. (Hear, hear.) To support such exertions, we had the solemn mockery and impiety of a prayer to Almighty God, for the preservation of his Royal Highness’s life from the traitorous attempts made against it. (Hear, hear.) Every temple in England was made to ring with falsehoods and base insinuations against the people in consequence of this prayer, or, to express it more properly, this most solemn mockery, this gross insult to common sense! That an attack had been made on his Royal Highness none could doubt, but, for one, he expressed his decided conviction of no plan whatever being formed against his life; and he was certain, had that illustrious individual been allowed to follow the dictates of his own mind, he would never have adopted the measures which had since taken place. He could assure the House, that there at this moment existed a well-grounded dissatisfaction in the country with the system so long, unhappily, carried on, which might lead to scenes not different from those in a neighbouring country; which perhaps the noble lord had seen without disgust, but which he (Sir F.) could not witness without dismay. Alarming, indeed, was the very supposition, (God forbid it should ever be realized) that such scenes should ever take place here; but he was afraid they could only be prevented by a radical reform of abuses, and by a timely attention to the desires of the people. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Samuel Thornton, the Bank Director, said, that having heard the first part of the petition, the language of which he did not approve, he happened to go out before it was finished, but having frequently attended and heard similar language in petitions which had been rejected by the House, he conceived himself justified, on his return, in voting for its rejection.

Lord Castlereagh was confident the House would always consult its dignity respecting the petitions presented to it, and would always see, with the greatest jealousy, that these petitions were expressed in at least proper language. He could not avoid stating his firm opinion, that the hon. baronet on the other side was actually endeavouring to mislead the country by the line of conduct he was now following, and by his attempts to persuade the country that the House would not receive their petitions. (Cries of order, order.)

The Speaker remarked that the noble lord was entitled to be heard out; though it would be best to confine himself to what was immediately before the House.

Lord Castlereagh.—The reason why he had objected to the petition, was its assertion that Parliament was assembled solely for the purpose of imposing burdens on the people. As to the hon. baronet, he (Lord C.) was glad to remark, that the reproof he received from the chair had made him recant his aspersions on the House. [Sir F. Burdett, "I did not recant."] Why, then, it might be safely said, that the hon. baronet came there that night to atone, by a studied insult on the House, for the reproaches which had been cast upon him elsewhere for his absence from these meetings. He should never feel himself called upon to reply to any personalities levelled against himself when mixed up with an attack on the House. (Hear.)

The petition from Wick was ordered to lie on the table.

CLOTH-DRESSERS.—MACHINERY.] Lord Lascelles presented a petition from a numerous body in Leeds, and the parts adjacent, cloth-dressers, who complained that the introduction of machinery had thrown many of them out of employment. They prayed that some relief might be afforded them by the wisdom of Parliament. The noble lord had explained to the petitioners themselves, that the question relative to machinery was a matter of deep consideration; nor did he flatter them that Parliament could be able, considering the state of the woollen manufacture in other countries, to afford them any relief on this head. There was another prayer in the petition; these people entertained the impression, that if driven to emigrate to other countries, the existing laws threw obstructions in their way, as being manufacturers. The noble lord told them, that considering the state of manufactures in other countries, neither could he give them much encouragement on this head; but at any rate their petition should be submitted to the deliberate consideration of Parliament.

The petition was then brought up and read.

Mr. Brougham said, that to adopt any measures to check the use of machinery, would be as impolitic as it was impracticable; but it was surely very hard on the petitioners that any impediments should be thrown in their way so as to prevent them from bettering their situation by emigration, if they were so disposed. This branch of the ancient policy of the country required the serious consideration of the House. Nothing could be more wicked than attempts to destroy machinery, such as the country had lately witnessed; yet at the same time the feeling which existed against machinery must be a ground of formidable alarm; for it shewed that, instead of now being, as it lately was, a source of wealth, it was the cause of the most severe distress to a great body of the people, because the hands thrown out of work by the introduction of machines in one branch could not now find employment in other lines. This was a serious evil, well deserving the attention of Parliament.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

SINECURES.—MARQUIS CAMDEN.] General Ferguson.—As almost all the petitions which have been presented to this House on the subject of Reform, pray for an abolition of sinecures, and as I now see a noble lord (Castlereagh) in his place, I beg to ask, whether the report in circulation is true, namely, that a noble marquis, one of the greatest sinecurists in the country, has, in consideration of the almost unanimous feelings of the nation, and the general distress, surrendered his sinecure?

Lord Castlereagh.—I am happy in answer to state, that the noble marquis alluded to (Camden) has, in lieu of the fees of office, accepted the regulated salary of 2700*l.* a-year. (Hear, from all sides.) The noble marquis had wished for the opportunity; but considering such offices in the light of vested interests, and that the example might be viewed as imperative on others under similar circumstances, had not communicated his decision. The example of the illustrious personage at the head of the Government had, however, put an end to every objection, and the noble marquis at once availed himself of the opportunity. (Hear, hear.)

General Ferguson.—I am exceedingly gratified with the intelligence now communicated to the House, and I trust in God that the example would be followed by others. (Cheering.)

POOR RATES.] Mr Peter Moore presented a petition from the city of Coventry, praying for a reduction of the public burdens. Such had been the increase of the poor rates in that town, and so severely was their pressure felt, that there was hardly a house in which a distress had not been levied for their collection.

Mr. Butterworth likewise bore testimony to the enormous and almost intolerable burden of the poor rates in Coventry.

Mr. Lockhart could not help availing himself of this opportunity to express his conviction, that unless that branch of taxation which immediately affected the necessities of life was greatly diminished, or funded property made, as it ought in justice to be made, equally contributory to the poor rates, they could not long continue to be paid. Their payment was, however, intimately connected with the whole system of public credit, and the stock-holder might be assured with the due discharge of the interest of the national debt. Unless something substantial was done, and the present system entirely altered, it was clear that we must proceed from bad to worse, and that the most alarming consequences would ensue.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

DRAWBACK ON PAPER.] On the motion of Lord A. Hamilton, there was ordered to be produced, a memorial from the University of Glasgow to the Treasury, dated March 15, 1816, setting forth the hardships imposed upon them by an act annulling the drawback on paper formerly allowed for books printed at the University press.

UNFUNDED DEBT.] Mr. Curwen moved for an account of the unfunded debt on the 1st of January 1817. Ordered.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.] Sir C. Monck moved for various papers relative to the rental of the estates of Greenwich Hospital, lying in the counties of Northumberland and Durham, for several years back, as well as accounts or the repairs made on the same estates during a similar period. Ordered.

CUSTOMS.] Mr. Brougham remarked, that in consequence of the enforcement of the Continental system under the influence of Bonaparte, the usual annual accounts of the shipments made to the Continent during the war had not specified the ports to which the various vessels sailed from this country. There could now, however, be no objection to such specification; and he should therefore move for an account of the number of vessels which had sailed during the two last years from the various ports of this country to all parts of the world, up to the latest period that the account could be made up, distinguishing British from foreign vessels.

The papers were ordered: as were also accounts of the produce of the annual customs for one month, ending the 5th of February, 1816, and 5th February, 1817, respectively; together with similar accounts of the produce of the excise for the same period in each year respectively.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] Mr. Brogden brought up the Exchequer Bills Bill, which was read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, February 12.

The Cape of Good-Hope trade bill, brought up from the Commons, was read a first time.

A person from the Bank presented the annual accounts respecting the reduction of the national debt; and a person from the Treasury presented accounts of the pensions on the Scotch Civil List. Laid on the table.

CATHOLICS.] The Earl of Shaftesbury moved, that message be sent to the Commons, to request that they would communicate to the House of Lords the report of the select committee, relative to the laws and ordinances of foreign states respecting Roman Catholics, their intercourse with the Holy See, &c.

The report was afterwards brought up, and ordered to be printed.

USELESS PLACES—REFORM.] Earl Grosvenor, after expressing his hope that it would soon appear that there was no foundation for the alarm which had been felt from apprehended dangers to the constitution, stated his anxiety that what he was now about to say should not be misrepresented or misunderstood. Petitions had lately come to Parliament from all quarters of the Country, the object of which might be classed under four heads:—1st, Retrenchment in the military expenditure; 2nd, Retrenchment in the civil expenditure; 3d, the abolition of useless places and sinecures; and 4thly, Reform in Parliament. With respect to the first, two points, he had called their lordships' attention to them in the course of last Session; and entertaining, as he did, a constitutional jealousy of the Ministers of the Crown, he had endeavoured, but without success, to persuade their lordships to refer the matter to a committee of their own, instead of leaving it to a committee appointed by the Ministers. He had hoped, that the office of third Secretary of State, with all its train of minor offices, would have been abolished; but in that he had been disappointed. As to the military expenditure, Ministers, when they brought that first under the notice of the House, appeared to think, that it could not be further reduced; but rather that it might be necessary to increase it. In six or seven days after, however, they altered their tone on that subject, and the expenditure was further reduced; and now a committee had been appointed in the other House, to investigate the state of our finances, from which he had no great expectations—a committee which was already known under the name of the humbug committee. That committee might last for the whole Session: it might last beyond the period of the existence of the present Parliament. The consequences of a dissolution of Parliament were known, and all the labours of the committee might be rendered fruitless. On that subject he might feel it his duty in the course of the Session to submit a motion to their lordships. With respect to the next point—the abolition of useless places and sinecures—he was clearly convinced that it was his duty to submit a motion to their lordships on that important question; and gave notice, that on this day fortnight he would bring forward that motion. It was his object to have the opinion of their lordships on the principle; and with that point he meant to couple that of granting offices in reversion. He would submit that motion in the hope of meeting with the concurrence of their lordships; but if he should stand alone in that House on this question, that House would stand alone in the opinion of the Country. On the subject of Parliamentary Reform, also, he felt that he ought to state his opinion. He had never entertained but one opinion, which opinion coincided with that stated by a man who had rendered the most essential services to the Country, the last time he brought the subject under the consideration of the other House—he alluded to the late Mr. Pitt; whose opinion was favourable to a moderate Reform. If, therefore, a bill should come into their lordships' House for carrying into effect a Reform in the shape proposed by him (Mr. Pitt,) he would support it. With respect, however, to universal suffrage and annual Parliaments, he thought that these objects, if attempted to be carried into effect, would produce only confusion, and were besides utterly impracticable. But he did not, therefore, think that those who entertained such notions ought to be punished for them—that they ought to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

He did not think that a Judge Jeffries ought to be sent among them; nor that the mouths of men, like Major Cartwright for instance—a very respectable individual for any thing he knew to the contrary—should be stopped, not by argument or persuasion, but by force. But though he was adverse to annual Parliaments, it did not therefore follow that he was friendly to Septennial Parliaments. He had well considered the subject, and looked upon Septennial Parliaments as a direct infringement of the liberties of the people. The Septennial Bill passed at a time of danger—of danger to the succession. It might be a proper measure at such a time; but when the danger was past, the Septennial Act ought to have expired with it, and to have been erased from the statute book. With respect to useless places and sinecures, he had heard that one of them had been given up, and this proved how happy it would have been if such places had been long ago suffered to sink in emolument to the level of the duties to be performed. He concluded by again giving notice of his intention to submit a motion on the subject of useless places and sinecures on that day fortnight, and moved that the House be summoned accordingly. Ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, February 12.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Milton presented a petition from Leeds, in Yorkshire, praying for Parliamentary Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The noble lord then presented a petition from Dewsbury, praying for retrenchment, and a more extensive representation of the people. In the latter part of the petition he could not join, though he would strenuously support every measure of retrenchment.

Lord Castlereagh, observing on a passage in the noble lord's speech, said, there had been much misrepresentation respecting the office of Registrar of the Admiralty (Lord Arden's sinecure,) for since the cessation of war, the profits of it were extremely diminished.

Mr. Brougham was sorry to hear this remark of the noble lord's, which seemed made for the purpose of quieting the minds of those sinecurists by whom he was supported, and to allay the fears of those who expected places in future. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Cochrane presented a petition from Glasgow, for Reform, and urged the necessity of granting the honest desires of the suffering people. He believed that the noble marquis (Camden) had given up the larger part of his sinecure, purely from what had passed at public meetings, and from what he had thence collected of the general feelings of the nation.

Mr. Wilberforce observed, that the office of Teller of the Exchequer was not given to Lord Camden personally: it was given to his illustrious father, with the general approbation of the nation, as a reward for his great public services, and a compensation for his pecuniary sacrifices by the relinquishment of great legal emoluments, in accepting the office of Lord Chancellor, which, partaking of the nature of a political as well as judicial office, was held only during pleasure. (Hear, hear.) For his part, he had always been unfriendly to the mode of rewarding public services by sinecures, and had uniformly voted against them: but he could not forget that some distinguished men had argued that they were not an ineligible mode of paying for services in high offices, for which no half-pay on retirement was provided. They had argued, that perhaps the cheaper way of rewarding such services, was by retaining a small number of sinecures, similar to that conferred on the late Lord Camden, than by providing pensions on retirement. No person, aware of the propriety of paying such a high officer properly, could avoid seeing that this argument was of great weight in the scale; and so strongly was Parliament impressed with this, that they had provided a pension of 4,000*l.* a year on retirement to every person who had filled the office of Lord Chancellor. If ever there was a public man who merited the enjoyment of such a reward, and the continuance of it in his family for another life, by his zeal for the public liberty, it was the late Lord Camden, (Hear, hear.) who had held the office of Chancellor only for a short time. This office of Teller was given him only for one life, when he was far advanced in years, when the emoluments were by no means so great as they afterwards became, and his lordship was advised to procure the reversion of it for his son, from a regard, no doubt, for the interests of his family. It was given to the late Lord Camden, not as a matter of court favouritism; it was not the result of court intrigue, but the reward of long-continued and disinterested public services. (Hear, hear.) He rejoiced, however, in the sacrifice which had been made, and was sorry that his honourable and learned friend (Mr. Brougham) saw only one star in the horizon, while in reality, there might be many others following it, though they had not yet come in sight.

Mr. Brougham received the last observations of his hon. friend as a spark of light bursting through the darkness, and gladly hailed the rising of more such stars than had yet appeared in the horizon: which, when they did, should certainly make him retract the expressions of despair and dependency he had previously used. Nothing could be more just than the eulogium which his hon. friend had passed on the late Lord Camden; and if that noble lord had not obtained his sinecure through any Court intrigue, surely this ought to sink deep into the hearts of those who received and held such offices, without any shadow of such a title to reward as all mankind agreed to ascribe to Lord Camden.

The petition was then brought up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PRISONERS.] Mr. H. Addington presented a copy of the rules and regulations of the King's Bench prison.—Ordered to be printed.

The Hon. Mr. Bennet asked, whether the report on the Fleet and Marshalsea prisons were yet ready?

Mr. H. Addington replying in the negative, or at least that it had not come to the office to which he belonged,

Mr. Bennet observed, that he had the same answer from the right hon. secretary last year. (A laugh.)

CATHOLICS.] A message from the Lords requested a copy of the report laid before the Commons in the last Session of Parliament, on the jurisdiction exercised by the Pope in the different states of Europe.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the message was complied with.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.—COLONIAL AUDIT-OFFICE.] A person from the Exchequer presented accounts of Exchequer Bills deposited with the Bank. Accounts were likewise presented of the sums given to the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt during last year; and of the different periods at which the Bank of England charter had been renewed, with the terms of renewal.

Mr. Lushington, from the Treasury, presented accounts of the sums paid to France for prisoners of war. Also a return of all warrants by which colonial accounts were transferred from the General Audit-Office to the Treasury, or the Colonial Audit-Office. They were all ordered to be printed. When the last papers were presented,

Mr. Huskisson thought himself called upon to make a few observations, with the intent of removing an imputation on his character which the present papers would sufficiently clear. He was not present when they were moved for, but he felt obliged to the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) who had done so, for the opportunity which he had thus given him of correcting a misstatement or misrepresentation that had gone abroad through the usual channel, affecting deeply his character or integrity. In that statement it was mentioned, that 50,000*l.* had been issued to him by order of the Treasury, as agent for a colony; that no account had been required of him how that money was expended; that the Treasury, out of favour to him, had issued a warrant to the General Audit-Office, not to intermeddle in auditing his accounts, but to transfer them to the Treasury. It insinuated a charge of gross corruption on the part of the Treasury, first to favour and then to shelter him. The accounts on the table would shew how grossly unfounded such charges were.

Mr. Brougham declared, that in moving for the papers, he acted under no conviction of the truth of this charge, nor had he made any allusion to the right hon. gentleman. His object was different. At a late period of the session, two years ago—at a period when the House was generally thin, when there was no great desire to canvass proposed measures, when no important business was expected, and when, for that very reason, the most important business was often transacted; he knew that an office for auditing colonial accounts was formed, and such accounts were to be transferred from the General Audit-office of Public Accounts, at Somerset-house, to this new board. A chairman and three members were appointed to this board, at a time when an expensive establishment, that cost the country 80,000*l.*, existed for a purpose of the same kind. The duties of the Audit-office of Somerset-house were important indeed, and expedition was of the greatest consequence. The multiplicity of their business was made the ground for this new establishment; and though he always was averse to the creation of new offices, if expedition was attained, his objections would be diminished. His motion for papers, therefore, was directed to the object of gaining information what the new board had done; how it was proceeding; what relief it afforded to the office of Somerset-house; or, in short, what we had gained on this additional establishment towards the dispatch of public business.

Mr. Lushington took the opportunity of stating, that when he was asked, on a former evening, about the number of officers in the Colonial Audit Department, and if the place of the President was filled up, he was not quite correct in his answer, when he said it was not filled up, as he had since understood that it was.

Mr. Brougham then asked, if the President, on whom the most important duties devolved, did not go out to Malta to examine one account, and whether he had not there died?

Mr. Lushington replied, that he had died at Malta, and he believed had gone out to audit one account.

Mr. Brougham.—Then the House and the country are to understand that this office is a sinecure, and that Government has filled up a sinecure. (Hear, hear.)

GAME LAWS.] Sir Samuel Romilly rose to move for the repeal of an act which had been only seven months in existence, which had been hurried through the House at a very late period of the last session, amidst a multiplicity of other public bills, had been read a third time at one o'clock in the morning, then sent up to the Lords, where it equally passed without any remark, and finally received the Royal Assent at the very close of the session. It was an act of the most unjustifiable severity, upon the merits of which, the deliberate sense of the House ought at least to have passed: though he believed that the great majority of the House did not even so much as know of its existence. (Hear, hear.) The act to which he referred was on the subject of the game laws; and it put the illegal destruction of game on the footing of felony, by rendering the offence liable to the penalty of transportation for seven years. Nay, it did still more: for it made not merely the act, but the mere attempt to kill game by night, in an enclosed place, a felony, rendering the offender liable to transportation for the same period. The bill enacted, that if any person be found in an enclosed place by night, not merely with a gun, but with a net, or any other engine for killing game, he shall be liable to the above penalty, at the discretion of the magistrates met at the quarter sessions. It was not his intention to represent the game laws in an odious point of view: but he must remind the House, that there was this obvious distinction between them and other penal laws, viz. that the latter were made for the protection of the poor as well as the rich: but this was not so with the game laws, which affected only the former, and therefore ought not to be clothed with such extraordinary severity. Let us next see, said the learned gentleman, how the act defined the period of night. Now the night of these wise legislators extended from eight at night till seven o'clock in the morning, from the month of October to the month of March. He had heard much of the omnipotence of Parliament, but he never understood that it could change day into night (hear, hear, and a laugh); though every gentleman must be aware, that the sun was up three-quarters before seven in the month of October, and, therefore, three-quarters of an hour before these legislators still pronounced night. This definition rendered almost every qualified man in the country liable to the operation of the act; for, as the sportsman was generally an early riser, if found in any enclosed place for game before seven o'clock, he became liable to transportation. It was also to be considered, that this discretionary power of infliction was left to the country magistrates, a body of men whom he highly respected, but who, considering their personal feelings on matters of this kind, ought not to be trusted with discretionary powers which were too large to be intrusted even to the judges of the land. In this instance, he could not be justly charged with any desire to innovate, or any contempt for the wisdom of our ancestors, the usual bugbears which had been conjured up when he proposed any alteration of the law: on the contrary, this act itself must be viewed as an innovation, not the fruit of ancient wisdom, but of a wisdom only seven months old. He moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the said act.

Mr. Frankland Lewis said, he thought the act ought to be moderated, not entirely abolished.

Colonel Wood was in favour of the repeal, but suggested, that lords of manors might be enabled to appoint deputations, and grant licenses to the occupiers of land for taking game.

Sir Ed. Knatchbull had no objection to the repeal, provided some other measure were to be substituted for it.

Mr. Panorby said, it was very fit that another bill should be introduced, and that no question could be more deserving of consideration.

Mr. Bankes agreed, that there were objections to the act as it was now framed, but considered them to be so partial that it would be better to amend than to repeal it.

Mr. Curwen thought sufficient ground had been laid for repealing the act. The whole system of the game laws had long been admitted to be unjust and tyrannical, constituting the party judge in his own cause, and investing him with extraordinary powers. He should rejoice by seeing this act done away, a new one introduced for the purpose of making game private property, and enabling it to be sold legally. He trusted, too, that it would induce a necessity of revising the whole code.

Mr. G. Bankes, as one of the committee by whom the bill had been framed, exculpated himself from any possible imputation of precipitancy in preparing it.

Sir M. W. Ridley by no means meant to cast any imputation on gentlemen acting as magistrates in the country, for whom, on the contrary, he entertained great respect: but certainly they were more interested on the subject than he wished them to be. He most cordially supported the motion for the repeal of the act.

Mr. Lockhart expressed his anxiety to see the act very considerably amended. That could not effectually be done by any interpolations; but would best be accomplished by a repeal of the act, while the bill repealing it might contain a clause to punish poachers for such proceedings as led to felony and murder. As to making game property, he had always opposed, and should always oppose any attempt at a measure so visionary and impracticable. Where a large and continued extent of ground was possessed by one lord of the manor, it might be done; but where, as in most cases, a manor was interspersed with small freeholds, the only consequence of it would be to beget a system of trespass and ill neighbourhood in every parish, as well as eventually to cause the total destruction of the game itself—a circumstance that would be extremely injurious to the community, as the amusement of sporting frequently, at present, induced gentlemen to reside on their own estates. He had observed in France the evils resulting from an abandonment of the sports of the field by the gentlemen of the country, who had in many instances, substituted for them amusements of a description very unfavourable both to their fortune and to their character. He should be sorry to see English gentlemen driven to make such an exchange; and he should also much regret to see them deprived of the means of shewing civility and attention to their neighbours, who did not enjoy privileges similar to their own. He allowed that the game laws were anomalous (for the subject was anomalous); but he denied that they were unjust. Their general tendency was to attach country gentlemen to their homes, and to preserve those links that bound them to their tenants and to the poor.

Mr. Wilberforce admitted the many benefits and the constitutional advantages which resulted from the residence of country gentlemen on their estates; but he must still maintain, that the game laws were both severe and unjust. It was a sufficient condemnation of them that they inflicted heavy punishments on acts which were not in themselves criminal. He concurred with his hon. and learned friend in thinking, that the House should be extremely careful in legislating on this subject, when it was considered that it was one with regard to which they had an interest as well as a power peculiar to themselves. He could not help thinking, that the preservation of game might be effected without so many invidious enactments. If game were criminally obtained, it must be criminal to allow it to be openly sold. If the selling were unlawful, the purchasing must be unlawful also. (Hear.) But it was not right to make up in severity for a defect of power, in cases of mere amusement; that was a principle which ought ever to be confined to crimes and offences of a high magnitude. No doubt, however, if it were enacted, that licenses might be granted, no person in a liberal situation of life would purchase in future, except from those who were legally authorized to sell.

Colonel Wood, in consequence of what had been thrown out, gave notice of his intention to move for leave to bring in a bill, empowering magistrates to grant retail licenses for the sale of game. This power of selling game had, indeed, never been entirely taken away before the 28th of Geo. II. He had understood from some of the largest proprietors of game in the kingdom, that they would undertake to supply the public with game, and to undersell the poacher.

Mr. Huskisson agreed, that the enacting part of the bill was wholly repugnant to the preamble: but though its repeal might therefore be necessary, considerable inconvenience might take place, unless some measure were immediately to follow, providing against the danger of armed combinations invading private rights at night.

Sir S. Romilly had not the least objection to the introduction of some other measure. He only hoped that some other gentleman would feel it his duty to undertake the task: but the repeal of the bill of last year was a necessary previous proceeding.

General Mitchell recommended, that the clause which made it a felony to carry arms at night should be preserved in any bill that might be proposed.

Sir E. Brydges thought the present bill very objectionable, but should be sorry to see it repealed without a pledge for the introduction of some enactment against persons carrying arms at night.—The question was then put, and leave given to bring in a new bill.

On the motion of Sir S. Romilly, an account was ordered of the number of persons who had been confined in gaol since May last (for England, Scotland, and Wales) under the operation of the game laws.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, Feb. 13.

No public matter of any importance occurred: after some routine business, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, Feb. 13.

TITHES.] Sir James Shaw presented a petition from that portion of the City of London which is subject to the payment of Tithes, praying for a revision of the Tithe Laws.

A petition to the same effect was presented by the Sheriff of London from the Common Council. Both the petitions were read and laid on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Stanley presented a petition from the town of Crompton, in Lancashire, praying for annual parliaments and universal suffrage.—He would give his hearty vote for a moderate Reform, but could not go the length of this prayer.

The petition was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Stanley presented similar petitions from Fairesworth, Oldham, and Great and Little Bolton, in Lancashire.

They were all read, and laid on the table.

Mr. B. Wilbraham presented a petition from Thomas Lyon the younger, of Warrington, containing a justification of the conduct of those who had been charged the other night, with forcibly seizing a petition which had been agreed to be presented to the House, praying for Parliamentary Reform. (see page 103.) The facts of the case were, that about seven o'clock in the evening of the day mentioned, the petitioner was engaged in his counting-house, and on a sudden heard a hue and cry in the street; being a constable, he ran out to give his assistance, as he thought he was in duty bound to do. He saw a crowd of persons there assembled, and a man of the name of Richard Burrough in the custody of two constables. After inquiring into the cause of his apprehension, he took him to the House of Mr. Coates just by, when Burrough acknowledged that he had, "by way of joke," carried off the petition. It being believed that Burrough had not acted with any criminal intention, he was permitted to go at large, and the petitioner took the petition so seized into his own custody. He was applied to for it afterwards, but did not give it up, conceiving that the application was not made by competent persons. The petition concluded with praying, that the House would dismiss from their minds any prejudices which might have arisen from the vile, malignant, unfounded, and false attack which had been made upon the petitioner and his uncle, the magistrate.

Mr. Brougham thought that the attack which had been made by the petitioner upon those who in the mildest way had brought forward the accusation was entirely unjustifiable. (Hear.) He trusted the House would observe the great nicety of the petitioner's conscience, who had been afraid to give the petition back to its right owners, though they had made a formal demand of it. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Stanley thought it due to the petitioner to state, that from all he had heard of his character, it was most respectable. He had no concern in this transaction and never interfered until he heard a cry in the street. As to the subsequent retention of the petition, he certainly was not justified in that. (Hear, hear.) He was also much to blame, when he took Burrough into the House of Mr. Coates, for neglecting to call any of the parties who knew the whole transaction, at once acquiescing in the statement of the party concerned. He also should have considered, that if the petition were not delivered up immediately, it became useless, and mere waste paper.

Mr. C. W. Wynn said, there could be no doubt but that the petitioner, in the exercise of his office, should have taken both the person who committed the outrage, and the property seized, before a magistrate. When the transaction was discovered to have been a mere joke, he should have released the prisoner, and have returned the property to the right owner. He was, however, very much surprised that the petition now presented to the House said not one word, whether the other petition had, or had not been returned to its right owners. He believed that the petitioner was only chargeable with an error in judgment, and thought that no further steps should be taken in the business.

Sir F. Burdett asked, whether the petition had been restored or not?

Mr. B. Wilbraham could not give any positive answer. It was most obvious that no plot had existed to seize it.

The present petition was then laid on the table.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.] Mr. Casberd obtained leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate the progress of business in the Court of King's Bench, by making it competent to one of the Judges of that Court to sit apart from the others, for the purpose of taking justification of bail: and enabling the other judges in that interval to sit in banco.

COURT OF CHANCERY.] Sir John Newport moved for an Account of all Sums paid for Copies of Proceedings in the Court of Chancery, in this country, and to whom paid, for the last five years. Likewise an Account of the Sums paid on the same account, in the Court of Chancery in Ireland.—Ordered.

SAVINGS BANKS.] Mr. Rose brought in a Bill for the Better Protection of Savings Banks, which was read a first time.

SALT DUTIES.] On the motion of Mr. Cal-craft, it was ordered, that there be laid before the House an Account of the Duties on Salt, for the last year, together with an Account of the Drawbacks on the Exportation of Foreign Salt.

ASSESSED TAXES.] Mr. Saville moved for a Particular Return of the Receipts of the Assessed Taxes for the years 1815-16-17.—Ordered.

MADHOUSES.] The Madhouse Regulation Bill was brought up and read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, Feb. 14.

There being no business of importance before the House, on the motion of the Lord Chancellor, their lordships adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Feb. 14.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] Mr. Robinson observing that a formal omission had occurred in the instructions given to the Committee of Secrecy, who were appointed to examine into the papers referred to them, but were not instructed to report, begged to move that that inaccuracy be corrected. The present committee, from that omission, though they had finished their labours, could not lay them before the House. The motion that it be instructed to report, was accordingly agreed to.

SAVINGS BANKS.] Sir J. Newport rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to protect and encourage Provident Institutions, or Savings Banks in Ireland. The English bill for similar purposes was necessarily modified to the peculiar circumstances of a country where poor laws existed, and had in its provisions peculiar reference to them and other local details. In Ireland the case was different. There was no system of poor laws, and consequently there could be no enactments in the bill which he moved for leave to introduce, connected with them. There were other sources of distinction between the state of the two countries, which evinced the propriety of separate measures, and rendered one plan inapplicable to both. There was a statute still in force in Ireland; which precluded a banker from giving interest for balances in his hands. This restriction, so far as it would affect Provident Institutions, he would propose to repeal. Another provision, which he regarded as quite necessary to the protection and encouragement of such institutions, would go to secure those who deposited their savings in them, from being endangered by the bankruptcy of the banker in whose hands they were placed, and he would do this by making them first creditors.—Leave granted.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Cochrane, in presenting a petition from Dumbarton, in Scotland, praying for reform and retrenchment, wished to know whether the same facility should not be given to petitioners to have them sent up free of postage, as was allowed to the Benevolent Institution at the London Tavern.

The Speaker said, there had been a legislative provision passed two years ago, and which he found in an Act where he would not have thought of looking for it, namely in the East India Ship Letter Act, which allowed all petitions to come free, not exceeding the weight of six ounces.

The petition was then laid on the table.

Lord Cochrane next presented petitions from Bridgetown, Anderston, Gorbals, Baronry Parish, Bonhill, Campsie, Govan, all in the vicinity of Glasgow. They prayed for a reduction of taxes, and radical reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Brougham presented a petition from the Ward of Aldgate, stating that the grievances under which the country laboured, arose from the inequality of representation, and the gross inattention of Parliament, in not checking the enormous expenditure; and praying the House to take the situation of the country into its early consideration. As to Universal Suffrage, as a right, Mr. B. said, there was but one opinion in the House, or among rational people out of it. How far the duration of Parliaments should be curtailed, was a matter for future consideration. The delusion as to Universal Suffrage should be dispelled before it was too late.

Lord Cochrane thought, that lists of the people, as taken for the Militia service, might be kept up, and all such as were liable to serve should be allowed to vote. He would, on such a subject, rather trust to the wisdom of the people, than to that of this House; for the people always judged coolly. (A laugh.) He held it essential to the interest of the people, that Parliaments should be annual, and chosen by house-keepers at least.

Mr. Ward said, the coolness of the people was sufficiently proved by the petition from Hampshire, presented by the noble lord, who appeared every night with petitions, like a merchant with his commodities under his arm. Charges of corruption were easily made; but, perhaps, they were none of the purest whom the people had chosen to carry their petitions to the House, for the noble lord himself had given a gratuitous avowal, that it was to the bellman of Monition that the House was indebted for the honour of his company, and the city of Westminster for the advantage of his talents.

Mr. W. Wyndham could not extend his charity so far as to believe that the persons who sent forth such delusions among the people, believed what they said. The Parliament of 1694 was now revivied, because, they, it was said, extended the duration of Parliaments to three years. Now the wisest child could tell, that before that time, Parliaments were unlimited.

Mr. Brougham said, that on all occasions he had gone as far as he could in support of the rights of the people; but he would not be a party to delude the people with falsehoods, such as that 1200 years ago, (that is the monstrous assertion) their ancestors enjoyed a perfect constitution. Good God! Sir, we have no annals of such a period. Yet these were the doctrines of these wiseacres out of doors. He did not accuse the people of England, but those who manufactured petitions with so much historical and antiquarian research, and then brought charges of ignorance and dishonesty against those who did not subscribe to such absurdities. These petitions proved nothing less than that the people were the victims of these delusions.

Lord Cochrane said, that knowing the honour of the man in whom these petitions originated, (Major Cartwright) he could not help stating, that he knew him to be sincere, however mistaken. As for any allusions to himself, they would fall as the stone that was thrown at a carriage the other day. All that he would say was, that he knew not, nor was he connected with, any one who entertained a desire of overturning any part of our constitution.

The petition was then laid on the table.

Lord G. Cavendish presented petitions from several places in Derbyshire, praying for Reform.—Laid on the table.

The Malta Trade Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Exchequer Bills Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 17.

A person from the Carnatic Commissioners presented another report from these commissioners, which was laid on the table.

A person from the Treasury presented papers relative to Davis' Straits.—Laid on the table.

The Malta trade bill, and Exchequer-bills' bill, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Cape of Good-Hope trade bill was read a second time.

The Earl of Lauderdale gave notice, that he would to-morrow move for any official intimation given by Ministers on the subject of the French loan; and moved that the Lords be summoned, which was ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, Feb. 17.

Papers were presented from the commissioners of the Herring and Whale Fisheries.

Sir James Graham brought up the report of the City Gas-light Committee, and a bill pursuant to the recommendations therein contained was afterwards brought in, and read a first time.

The Exchequer-bills' bill was read a third time, and passed.

GAME LAWS.] Sir S. Romilly brought in his bill for repealing the act of last session relative to the game laws, which was read a first time.

Sir Edward Knatchbull intimated his intention to introduce some new measure for the purpose of providing against the evil which it was the object of the act about to be repealed to have remedied. He hoped, however, that the honourable and learned gentleman would not press the second reading so early a day as Monday.

Sir S. Romilly said, he did not intend to press the second reading on Monday, but was willing that it should be deferred from time to time, in order to furnish an opportunity of receiving such amendments as the measure might appear to require.

Mr. Banks wished to know certainly when the second reading would be moved, as it was his intention to oppose it. He thought it not advisable that the whole act should be repealed on account of one or two objectionable clauses; and was persuaded, that in the larger part it was a measure essential to the interests of the country.

Sir S. Romilly consented to put off the second reading till Tuesday fortnight; but was somewhat surprised at the intended opposition of the hon. gentleman, as an hon. baronet had already announced the introduction of some new measure in consequence of this repeal.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.] Mr. Casberd brought in his bill for facilitating the progress of business in the Court of King's Bench, (see page 169,) which was read a first time.

PUBLIC EXECUTIONS.] Mr. Holford presented a petition from a person named John Thomas Waters, complaining of the frequency of public executions, and praying the House to enact some other mode of punishing crimes.

This petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Bennet called the attention of the House to the subject of this petition, which though only signed by one individual, expressed the sentiments of many benevolent persons. On the important subject of inflicting the punishment of death, it prayed the House to consider whether it might not, in all cases except murder, be commuted for imprisonment. Although we boasted that we were the most civilized people in Europe, our criminal code was the most severe of all. Neither in America nor France was death ever inflicted, except for the crime of murder. In the latter country, the practice had been, for the last 30 years, to send delinquents to penitentiary houses, where their morals were reformed, and they came out valuable members of society. It was seldom, he feared, that persons committed for offences in this country came out of prison with any improvement whatever in their moral sentiments. As the public attention was now drawn to the general subject of this petition, he trusted that it would speedily fall under the consideration of the House.

CONDAMNED PRISONERS IN NEWGATE.] Mr. Bennet adverted to the notice he had taken last year of the condemned persons in Newgate. He now found that three sessions had passed without a report being made by the Recorder, and on Wednesday the fourth session would commence. There were 73 men and 15 women under sentence of death. He believed there was a proverbial tardiness in every thing respecting the law officer who was to bring these matters before the council, except on political subjects. In all cases that met him, the tardiness of that noble lord was highly inconvenient. He hoped not to hear again that no practical inconvenience had arisen. It was not a question of the sufferings of the unfortunate wretches; that was clear enough; but it was a blot on the administration of justice. Persons were executed at periods when their crimes were forgotten. Of those under sentence, some probably would yet suffer, and scarcely any of the thousands of spectators would remember the cause. This was a great grievance. Why has not the report been made earlier? He moved for an account of the number of convicts under sentence of death in Newgate, and of their crimes, and dates of their conviction.

Lord Castlereagh could hardly believe a member wished for information, when he applied without notice, and brought with him such means of information: making a speech at the same time of the most inflammatory tendency, calculated to infuse a notion that the laws were not administered in justice and mercy; and mixed up with pregnant insinuations against the conduct of the highest legal character. Delays were attributed to the noble lord (Eldon), whose name, it was said, was always accompanied with tardiness in justice. This was a most unfounded charge. No man who had held that high office had been more respected even by those who entertained political differences. All had borne unequivocal testimony to his purity, and to his merits. In the hon. gentleman's inquiries into the state of prisons, in which he had, no doubt, meant to do good, he must have learned that the delay did not rest in that quarter. The Recorder made the reports, and waited till all the cases were properly examined into. If there were any delay, it must have been in the usual course: he entreated the hon. member, that in the next tale he had to tell, he would give notice, that the servants of the Crown might procure information. Neither himself nor his learned friend (the Attorney-General) could at once give all the information.

The Attorney-General assured the House, that he did not rise to defend the character or conduct of the noble lord (the Chancellor), which would be both unnecessary and offensive. It was not by his lordship's delay that the report was not made earlier. Of his own knowledge he could say, that if the hon. member had sought proper sources of accurate information, he would have found that the great number of convicted persons made one reason for the delay. They were, it seemed, no less than 88. He remembered the Old Bailey Sessions, when beginning on Wednesday, were seldom attended by the judges after Saturday: now they lasted a fortnight, or longer, and the Recorder had to attend all the time, frequently trying prisoners. He was happy to say, that no part of the public administration during this long reign had been attended to with such uniform anxiety, care, and deliberation, as what related to the cases of unfortunate criminals. After sentence was pronounced, it was the employment and the duty of the Recorder to examine the particulars, to consider the character of the evidence, to read all through and digest it, and to communicate the result with his own detailed opinions to the Lord Chancellor. Each individual case then went before the King or Prince Regent in Council. He had lately conversed with the Recorder, who regretted much that he had not had time enough to prepare his report for the Lord Chancellor. He had stated his immense labours, and the time which the sessions occupied. There were then 60 unreported cases; and he could state, on the Recorder's authority, that he was not then in a condition to make his report satisfactorily. There was not an unnecessary delay, but only a delay as far as was consistent with justice to individuals.

Sir M. W. Ridley regretted any circumstances that occasioned delays in justice. Certainly, they were indebted to the hon. member for the notice he had taken of so important a branch of public administration; and he did not think the grounds assigned of sufficient weight to warrant the conduct complained of. Whatever might be said respecting dilatoriness in the Lord Chancellor in the public business, he could say, from his own personal knowledge of him, that the last proceeding in which his lordship could be dilatory would be in a case in which he might have to recommend mercy. (Hear.)

Mr. Abercrombie said, that of all the strong arguments in support of the alterations recommended by his learned friend (Sir S. Romilly) he had heard none more convincing than the statements and explanations now made. It appeared necessary accurately to inquire into all the circumstances of the convictions of which he could not be supposed to doubt the justice. Inquiry was made with a view to see whether a commutation of punishment could take place: but if they were commensurate with the offences, there need be no difficulties or delays. Too large a discretionary power was given, instead of providing adequate and appropriate punishments for offenders.

Mr. Benner did not impute want of ability, honesty, integrity, propriety, acuteness of decision, or intelligence, to any decisions of the Lord Chancellor. He only complained of delay: and in all committees of inquiry he had found instances of the delay. What the Attorney-General said might be a reason for reporting last sessions, but none against reporting for the first of the three sessions. It was high time that the system should be changed, and that adequate punishment should be inflicted speedily. If the Recorder was unable to go through the duties, some one else should be employed. The duty had clearly not been done. He had no other opportunity of noticing the subject, as the sessions began on Wednesday. There were several hundred convicts waiting to go to transportation or the hulks. Delays were always to be met with. The city members could say whether they had not complained, and found no redress. He made no apology for what he had said, and he should not be deterred either by the compliments or the censures of the noble lord from doing his duty on this subject. The account was ordered.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett gave notice, that he should postpone his motion on the subject of a Reform in the representation of the people, till after Easter. The hon. baronet then presented three petitions in favour of Reform: the first from the parish of Christ Church, Spitalfields; the second from Rippon and its vicinity; and the third from Carlisle and its vicinity, which were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Sir C. Morgan presented a petition from the freeholders, clergy, &c. of the county of Monmouth, praying for economy in the public expenditure, and a radical Reform in Parliament. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Brougham presented a petition, signed by a number of most respectable inhabitants of the Ward of Castle Baynard in the city, praying for a Reform in the representation. The petitioners deplored the intemperate manner in which too many of those who pretended to be friends to the cause of Reform conducted themselves. They prayed for a return to the ancient usage of triennial Parliaments, and such other Reform as should be deemed most advisable. Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane observed, that he held a petition in his hand, which prayed for annual parliaments and universal suffrage, and it would therefore, he imagined, incur the disapprobation of an honourable and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) who had lately thought fit to attack not only the opinions, but the character of the reformers. Their opinions had been described as chimerical and absurd, and such as must originate in sinister designs. He should say something more of this presently; but in the mean time he should content himself with the words of Blackstone, who maintained, that the right of inflicting punishments was founded on the consent given by every individual to the law which ordained it. How, then, could the present system of representation be deemed adequate? In Scotland there was a population of two millions, and only 2,700 voters; and according to the theory laid down by Blackstone, the representatives of the people so elected could not legislate so as to bind the country at large. (Cries of order, order, chair, chair.)

The Speaker said, he must appeal to the House whether this was language which ought to be permitted. (Hear, hear)

Lord Cochrane was sorry that the House had not heard the whole of the sentence, as he apprehended that then there would have been found nothing to offend.

The Speaker regretted to say, that the sentence had been too complete.

Lord Cochrane contended, that he had done nothing more than draw an inference from the principles laid down by Blackstone, and that such opinions might be entertained without any danger to the constitution. He had himself reflected deeply on the existing system of representation, and the result was, a conviction that any system must be better than the present. The hon. and learned gentleman, indeed, might have had a little consideration for the errors of the reformers, as it was not long since that he had professed the same principles. The hon. and learned gentleman who now represented a rotten borough, had on the 23d of June, 1814, at a period when it was a question as to his (Lord Cochrane's) expulsion from that House, and a vacancy for the city of Westminster was expected, declared at a public meeting, in a speech which was considered as a statement of his political creed, that annual parliaments were necessary, and that representation ought to be co-extensive with taxation. He had not the smallest doubt in his mind that these words were used; but in order to leave no doubt on the minds of the House, he would read them, not from any report taken by others, but from the learned gentleman's own hand-writing, in a copy furnished by himself two days after the delivery of the speech. (Here the noble lord read a paper, which was in substance as follows):—"That as often as the reformers had called for annual parliaments, they had been told, that the enemy was at the gate ready to take advantage of their political contests. This argument was now gone by, and he conceived that it would be superfluous for him to reason on a principle, with respect to which they were all agreed, viz. that suffrage should be co-extensive with taxation. He would mention, however, as a fact, for the truth of which he might appeal to his hon. friend the member for Middlesex, that a great improvement always took place in the conduct of their representatives in the last year of the duration of a Parliament, inasmuch that more good was often done in the last year than in the five or six which had preceded it. Such a fact must necessarily induce the suspicious to believe that this amendment was produced by the knowledge that they were in a short time to return to their constituents. He begged also to correct a toast which had been given, viz. "a full, fair, and free representation in Parliament," by adding the words "of the people;" for he held, that the nobility was adequately represented, and that the court was fully represented, but that there was very little representation of the people." The noble lord, after reading these extracts, remarked, that there was no man in the country who wore shoes, or who eat bread, that did not contribute to the taxes. It was pretty clear too, that the hon. and learned gentleman who had fallen foul of the reformers, had once entertained opinions which he now denounced as chimerical and absurd.

Mr. Brougham trusted, that a very few words would be necessary to shew, that a more groundless aspersion never had been cast on the consistency or character of a public man. He charged, not so much the noble lord, as those who had put a brief into his hands—not with having made a false accusation, but—with rashness in not waiting till the time should arrive when that ample discussion should take place which would supply the proper opportunity for stating his opinions on the subject. He had reserved the disclosure of his opinions for that occasion, and he knew not how those, in whose hands the noble lord was an instrument, were justified in launching imputations against him, or in asserting that he had abandoned the principles which he formerly avowed. This was a gross misstatement: the speech which the noble lord had thought proper to refer to, had been made at a dinner at the London tavern of the friends to Parliamentary Reform. In addition to the late Mr. Whitbread, the member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng), and the member for Hertfordshire (Mr. Brand), were present, and he could appeal to them for the accuracy of his statement. He freely admitted that he had made use of the words ascribed to him, and he had subsequently committed them to paper, in order to guard against misconception on questions of such constitutional nicety and importance. He then thought, and continued still to think, that with a view to the integrity of the constitution, it was expedient that the elective franchise should be co-extensive with direct taxation. No man could suppose that direct taxation was to include the beggar in the streets, or every one who, in purchasing the necessities of life, paid more for them in consequence of the taxes. The noble lord might call this universal suffrage, and he would not dispute with him about the meaning of a word; but he ought to know that there were two classes of reformers, one of which held the opinions of which he was an humble advocate, and the other which maintained the justice and policy of extending the suffrage to every individual. With regard to his more early opinions in favour of moderate, gradual, and he might add, rational Reform, he was not conscious that he had ever departed from them. He had always contended in that House, and out of it, that the present system of representation might be greatly improved by throwing open various close boroughs, and by extending the suffrage, particularly in Scotland. He had always maintained, that those who wished to go farther ought to be content with gaining these points in the first instance, because they would be so much nearer to their object, and have so much the stronger ground to stand upon. As to the miserable motives which had been imputed to him for the supposed change of his opinions, as if he could prostitute himself to the avowal of principles other than the genuine sentiments of his heart, or as if he wished, like some others, to ride into the House on the shoulders of the rabble, (Hear, hear,) he should merely say, that he treated them with the contempt which they deserved. The only pain which he felt at this discussion was from the observation of the follies, the madness, the false practices, and the base expedients resorted to, in order to separate the people from those who wished them best, and for no other purpose that he could imagine, but to gratify personal spleen, or to attain some private object in which the people had no sort of interest. (Hear, hear.)

The Hon. Mr. Ward was satisfied, from very long acquaintance with the hon. and learned gentleman, that he could not be justly accused of any culpable inconsistency. He rose, however, only for the purpose of marking his declaration, that he had told the reformers, that if they had ulterior objects, they ought, nevertheless, to support a limited Reform in the first instance, for that would do very well for a beginning. (Hear, hear.) These were memorable words, coming from such authority: and whenever the question should be agitated, he should remind the House of the expression, and oppose himself to every project of moderate or of radical Reform, however specious, that might be brought forward by any party.

Sir F. Burdett trusted, that few persons in the House would be found disposed to agree in opinion with the hon. gentleman who had just sat down.—It was somewhat satisfactory to him to find, that the hon. gentleman who expressed himself so alarmed at any alteration, who complained that inroads were making on the constitution, that this very gentleman was sitting behind those who had themselves made more alterations, and been guilty of more inroads on the constitution, than any other set of persons whatever: and who, besides all this, had actually bought up the Irish parliament: this was not mere rumour, not a vulgar error, it was offered to be proved by the then Speaker of the Irish House of Commons. The hon. gentleman had been a supporter of all those inroads, and yet he was so determined to oppose the removal of the most disgusting blot in the government of the country, that when any amendment was proposed, when any abuse was to be driven from its strong hold, he immediately alarmed us with the terrors of alteration and inroad. With respect to the unfortunate subject of the present discussion he should only add, that the hon. and learned gentleman

(Mr. Brougham) had clearly explained what he meant by the expression that representation should be co-extensive with taxation: by this he meant direct taxation, and he (Sir F.) was convinced that a right of suffrage to that extent would be quite sufficient. (Hear, hear.) Indeed he was persuaded, that such a measure would be perfectly satisfactory; that it would answer every useful end; and that, if it were adopted, we should hear no more of universal suffrage; but he could not but lament that gentlemen who knew that there ought to be some Reform, who knew that a majority of the House was returned by about two hundred members connected with the Treasury Bench, that those gentlemen should lose themselves in animosities and bickerings, instead of uniting together for the common cause they had so much at heart. After the practices carried on in the present mode of representation, and the exposure of abuses too notorious, he did lament that those who opposed these abuses should waste their strength in acrimonious disputes wholly unconnected with the real merits of the cause they embraced.

Mr. Brand animadverted on the expressions of the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Ward), that he should ground many observations on a future occasion, on the imputed design of those who advocated Reform, to aim at obtaining small points at first, in order that they might thence proceed to objects of greater importance. The hon. gentleman had chosen to take great alarm at this idea, and to discover in it the commencement of an attack on all that was established in the constitution; but whatever that hon. gentleman might insinuate, they who had the cause of Reform at heart were the very last who meant, by ostensibly professing at first constitutional amendments, to bring about ultimate revolution; and therefore he must enter a protest against such imputations as had been cast on them by the hon. gentleman. He agreed with the hon. baronet in lamenting the differences that had arisen between the common friends of Reform: but he lamented much more, that among those who professed to be friendly to it, some had broached chimerical systems which were only likely to mislead the multitude, and to be productive of inconvenience and mischief. (Hear, hear.) He agreed, that all who were acquainted with his hon. and learned friend would allow, that with his enlightened understanding he was the last person likely to fall into errors of this description, and that it was most injudicious in the noble lord thus to level against him an attack so unfounded. He hoped that the noble lord would at least abstain from personal reflections against those who were disposed to co-operate in the cause, and that in the great discussion of it which must shortly take place, he would come to the House without any feelings of individual hostility.

Mr. Carwen reprobated the means taken to inflammé the public mind at large meetings, and to impress an idea that the House was hostile to the welfare of the people.

Lord A. Hamilton took occasion to remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ward) what had been his former sentiments, and to ask whether he could find no abatement of his severity, when he recollected that he had been the supporter of those who once advocated Reform. The question was shortly to be brought forward; but he begged to say, that in nothing which had passed on the subject in that part of the country with which he was connected, was there any ground for the insinuations that had fallen from the hon. gentleman. He himself was as decided as any man could be against annual parliaments or universal suffrage; he knew them to be impracticable, and the very proposal could be productive of nothing but mischief.

Mr. Ward entered into an explanation of his former opinions. It was very natural for one so distinguished as the noble lord to be ignorant of the opinions of one so little distinguished as himself; but they who knew him would say, that he had always, even at the hazard of offending those with whom he acted and sat, distinctly disclaimed any Reform in Parliament such as had hitherto been proposed: he now protested against the logic of the noble lord, that because he (Mr. Ward) had acted with Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Pitt had admitted the necessity of Reform, he (Mr. Ward) must do the same.

Lord A. Hamilton explained. All that he contended was, not that the honourable gentleman had actually supported Parliamentary Reform, but that the recollection of his former connections should have prevented him from contending that all those who supported moderate Reform had some ulterior object in view.

Mr. Canning could not avoid making some observations on what had fallen from an hon. baronet (Sir F. Burdett), who deprecated the circumstance of the true reformers thus disagreeing among themselves, and failing to unite for the general cause. It was indeed very natural that they should wish to remain friends till they had extorted something from the House, though perhaps none of them knew exactly what. Five or six different plans had been proposed, but the hon. baronet did not wish any farther exposure of these political haberdasheries, till the question should come on to be discussed in earnest. Now he differed altogether from the honourable baronet, and he entreated any gentleman who might have a pocket plan of Reform, to produce it forthwith, in order that the House might have some opportunity of judging of its merits: he was sure that no man who saw into what beautiful experiments he was to be initiated, could be so foolhardy as not to accept immediately the advantages that were offered. He was not present when the dispute alluded to by the hon. baronet arose; but as far as it involved the question of Parliamentary Reform, he thought the noble lord (Cochrane) exceedingly ill used, and he exhorted him to adhere to his plans, whatever might be the consequence. But where was this Reform, so much insisted on, to take place, or what were we to gain by it?—The additional attachment, it would be said, of numbers who were now dissatisfied, and the consequent accession of strength to be derived from unanimity and numbers. Certainly, if he were to count the signatures of petitions, the demands for universal suffrage were out of all number the most important; but he knew that they who endeavoured to browbeat the house at first into the reception of these petitions, were now come round to caution the people against the adoption of principles which would prove not only the ruin of that house, but of the country itself. He therefore warned the House not to give way in the smallest degree to any of the proposed plans for Reform.

Mr. Tierney believed, that the right hon. gent. opposite was the only gentleman in the country who thought that no practical good could arise from any possible alteration in the frame of Parliament. That he should be alarmed at any extensive or sweeping plan was perfectly natural; but to say that every possible plan of amendment must be viewed with alarm was indeed too much, and he did not think the right hon. gent. could find a single individual who would second such a proposition. As to annual Parliaments and universal suffrage, after all that had been urged against them, the noble lord now heard the right hon. gentleman advise him to go on in his undertakings! (Hear, hear, hear.) He who hated all Reform, who augured danger and ruin from the very commencement of alteration, now begged the noble lord to proceed in the most extensive of all innovations. If, after that, the noble lord ceased, he must think he was acting for the reformers: if not, that he was only playing into other hands. The right hon. gentleman had treated with a sarcastic kind of humour the wish expressed by an honourable bart. that the noble lord and the honourable and learned gentleman and the other friends of Reform might make up their differences.—Why was this sneer? had the right honourable gentleman a monopoly in making up differences? (hear.)—How did the right honourable gentleman and those about him contrive to make up their differences? (hear, hear.) After that specimen of reconciliation, surely no difference of opinion, however wide, among the friends of Reform, might not be easily adjusted. (hear, hear, hear.) The honourable gentleman opposite (Mr. Ward) had laid in his claim, whenever this subject came to be discussed, to sound the alarm to the country, in consequence of an expression which had fallen from his honourable and learned friend. And what was the amount of the honourable gentleman's objection to this expression? That if any thing were reformed, the door would be open to the mob and to unlimited Reform! This doctrine he

(Mr. T.) feared was entertained on other descriptions of Reform besides Parliamentary. There was reason to fear that a late surrender by a noble marquis began to be considered as a dangerous "beginning." He had no doubt, that among a certain class of individuals the honourable step taken by lord Camden was held to be the most mischievous proceeding on the subject of Reform that had hitherto taken place, opening a door to the mob into which they would rush, and then who could tell whose place or salary would be safe (hear, hear.) For himself he felt perfectly convinced, that while the noble lord on the Treasury Bench was making a very rational speech the other evening in favour of practical economy, many who were seated near him viewed him with extreme horror, as uttering sentiments essentially injurious to the public service (a laugh.) The effect of this alarm had indeed been in some degree apparent: for all at once the career of reduction had stopped short: and no hope seemed to be cherished that the splendid example of the Prince Regent would be further followed (hear, hear.) We were to be perfectly satisfied with what had been done (hear.) It was rather extraordinary, considering the alarm expressed by the honourable gentleman opposite, lest any Reform whatever should be entertained, that he should have been at one period Chairman of a Committee on Sinécures, by which it was declared that it was not necessary that two paymasters should receive one salary. It was surprising, considering the sentiments now avowed by the honourable gentleman, that he could ever consent to be a party to a declaration so dangerous to the Constitution (a laugh.)

Mr. Lyttleton defended the conduct of his friend Mr. Brougham at the meeting alluded to, and expressed himself willing to share with him all the odium that might fall to him in the cause of Reform: the worst enemies of that Reform were those designing innovators whose advocate the noble lord was.

The petition, which was from the township of Harborough, in the county of Leicester, was then read.

Lord Cochrane then congratulated the house and the country on the difference of language and tone in the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham). He had deemed it important to shew the opinions of the honourable and learned gentleman, not with a view to blame him, but to hint that he should have been less severe in his exposure of that body whose interests he ought to support. He appealed to the House whether any thing personal had commenced with him: he had stated his opinion that triennial Parliaments could effect no good, and that the disfranchisement of rotten boroughs alone would avail nothing; corruption would still continue: majorities be gained as easily as ever; and ballots be conducted at the Minister's pleasure. No change of a radical nature would arise from such a measure; while it was admitted on all hands, that more good was effected in the last year of a Parliament than in all the preceding: this arose from the consideration of gentlemen that they must so soon appear before their constituents. He would now say, that unless the galleries were open, and the public admitted—(Order, order from the chair.) He trusted, however, that the subject would undergo a full and free discussion, and that some benefit must result even from that.

Mr. Brougham said, that he had never altered his tone in the least on this subject, or on whatever related to the assertions and statements of the noble lord, or of his supporters, abettors, and backers, out of doors. He meant to make this final avowal of his difference of opinion with the noble lord. One subject touched upon by the noble lord did indeed involve very serious considerations. The noble lord had alluded to a certain kind of influence: not the influence of the Crown in that house; not that of any set of well-informed persons; not the instructions given to members by their constituents; not to the sense of the people duly expressed: but to an influence of another sort, which might be exercised, and which, it appeared, might mean intimidation. Warmly as he (Mr. B.) felt in the cause of Parliamentary Reform, he was convinced that, if ever obtained, it must be obtained by means far other than those of intimidation. (Hear.) He was among those who would deprecate any attempt to shut the doors of the House of Commons against the people of England: but because he sincerely desired constitutional Reform, he must oppose every idea of menace, and would, if it should appear necessary, be ready to move to adjourn a debate on the subject sine die; or, if that were not sufficient, to adopt other means to prevent the exercise of the influence alluded to.

Lord Cochrane appealed to the candour of the House whether he had thrown out any intimidation. He had only stated his hope that the House would do that which the people expected. The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.] Mr. Dickinson presented a petition from certain owners and occupiers of land in the counties of Somerset and Gloucester, and other places in Great Britain, praying for protecting duties on all the productions of the soil of the united kingdom, payable on the import of similar productions from foreign countries. The petitioners stated, that the cause of the present depressed state of agriculture could alone be found in the import of corn, wool, hides, tallow, butter, cheese, and seeds, and almost every other production of the soil of the united kingdom, from foreign parts, without payment of countervailing duties; because they had the evidence of facts, that during a war of twenty years of unparalleled expenditure, and as long as the advance in price of rent, produce and labour, kept pace with the increase of our national debt and taxes, every part of the community flourished and prospered in defiance of such expenditure and taxation, because during the war the difficulty and expense of importing such productions had all the effect of protecting duties; but on the return of peace the country became so inundated with foreign agricultural produce, not subject to the taxes paid by the growers of such produce in this country, as to paralyse the agriculture of the united kingdom, and with it every branch of commerce and manufacture.

Mr. Curwen said, undoubtedly the distresses of the agricultural classes could not be stated higher than they actually were; but he did not wish to see them relieved by measures such as those recommended in the petition. It was not by bounties on exportation—it was not by raising the price of grain and other produce, that they could hope for relief. Had he been in Parliament at the time the Corn Bill passed, he should have voted for it; but he should have voted for it, not because he conceived such a measure would have a tendency to raise prices, but because by affording protection to the grower, it would have the effect of enabling the consumer to have a certain supply at a cheaper rate. It was not by increasing the issue of paper-money, or any other bolstering-up system, that relief was to be obtained. He trusted, that the measure which he should shortly bring forward, was one which could not fail to have the effect of affording an essential relief to the agricultural interest.—The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] Sir G. Warrender proposed the Estimates for the ordinary service of the Navy. The number of men was 19,000. The expense was calculated at 6*l.* 6*s.* per man a month, which was lower than the expense of the last year, when it was 6*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.* The Estimates were for six lunar months only, which left the subject open to the future consideration of the Finance Committee and of the House. He concluded by proposing a vote of 19,000 seamen, including 6,000 Royal Marines, for six lunar months, beginning April 1, 1817.

Mr. Tierney observed, that in 1792, the allowance per man for all the ordinary expenses of the Navy was 4*l.*, since which time it had got up to near 7*l.* He hoped it was now ascertained that the reduced estimate of 6*l.* 6*s.* would cover all probable expenses, as the reason of the former increase of the estimate was the experience of the insufficiency of the sum before granted, and the inconvenience of the arrears thus created.

Sir G. Warrender observed, that the proportion of Marines to the Naval force was much greater than on any former occasion. In the year 1792, there had been 10,000 men, of which 4,400 were Marines; in 1800, there had been 18,000, of which 4,600 had been Marines. As to the estimated allowance per man, it was formed after the most mature consideration, though it was not possible exactly to foretell the actual expense.

The motion was carried.

The following sums were then voted:—216,600*l.* for wages; 293,700*l.* for victualling; 255,100*l.* for wear and tear of shipping; 22,800*l.* for ordnance for the shipping.

The House resumed, and the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

WAR SALARY OF THE SECRETARIES OF THE ADMIRALTY.] Lord Milton, after various observations on what Lord Exmouth, in his dispatches, had denominated a war of two days with Algiers, and on the Secretaries' salaries having been increased on false pretences, moved, "that the issue of any additional salary to the Secretaries of the Admiralty, in consideration of the Expedition against the Dey of Algiers, which terminated in hostilities, is uncalled for by the Order in Council of the 15th of January 1800, and is therefore an improper application of the public money."

Mr. Croker said, the noble mover had attributed rapacity and meanness to him, and averred that he had obtained the increase of salary solely for himself. By the Order in Council, the salary of the first Secretary was fixed at 3000*l.* per annum during peace, with an additional 1000*l.* in time of war; the salary of the second secretary was 1500*l.* in peace, and 2000*l.* in war. Now he had demanded the increase of a quarter's allowance, but it was his right, agreeably to the Order in Council, which allowed a higher salary in time of war; and it was a duty he owed to his successors as well as to himself. If hostilities had not actually taken place, no such demand would have been made: and as to the shortness of the war, there was much additional labour in the preparation, and the last war with France was begun and ended in a day.

Mr. Calcraft thought it a mean and petty business to demand an increase of salary for a two days' war. He admired the hon. Secretary's zeal for his successors! The Lords of the Admiralty should have stopped this proceeding.

Sir J. Yorke, Mr. Jones, and Sir G. Hope, all maintained the propriety of Mr. Croker's demand; which Admiral Markham reprobated.

Mr. Tierney thought the Admiralty had exhibited gross neglect in sanctioning such a claim. It was a mockery to talk of additional labour. The Office was infinitely overpaid in time of peace by 3000*l.* a year—the Chancellor of the Exchequer might as well claim additional pay for the labour of issuing Exchequer Bills.—(Hear and laughter.)

Lord Castlereagh defended the increase of salary, and said, he felt unmeasured disgust to see abroad that spirit of detraction against all public men, and to witness that readiness in Gentlemen to appeal to the unsound part of the people, in order to depreciate and degrade the character of public men.—(Hear, hear, and much laughter.)—And what was all this outcry about? For the enormous sum of 220*l.* But it was laid hold of to excite discontent against the servants of the Crown.—(Hear!)

Mr. Lamb thought there was an essential dif-serenec between a war of two days, and one in which our fleets covered the seas. He had heard nothing but quibbling and special pleading. He, too, thought public men should not be degraded. We can establish, he said, that office shall not degrade the man, but it is out of our power to order that the man shall not degrade the office. (Loud cries of hear!)—They were repeatedly told of the base motives imputed to men in office—how important was it then, that odium, envy, and obloquy, should find no meanness, no sordid baseness, to glut its appetite!—how important, that the vices, if any, of public men, should be somewhat of an ambitious and generous nature; and not those of a low, paltry, and worthless mind!—(Hear, hear, hear!)

Mr. Barclay could not but sanction by his vote the right of the hon. Secretary to the increase of salary, though he should still retain a private opinion as to the policy of enforcing that right.

Mr. W. Smith said, admitting the official arguments alleged, still the increased salary should have been only for two days.

On a division, the numbers were, for the motion, 114—Against it, 169—Majority, 55.

MALT DUTY BILL.] In a Committee on this Bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed a clause, authorizing the Lords of the Treasury to receive the voluntary tender of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and such other tenders from persons receiving official salaries as they should voluntarily offer.

The clause was agreed to, and the report was brought up, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on Wednesday next.

LIST OF THE MAJORITY

WHO VOTED FOR MR. CROKER'S WAR SALARY.

Abdy, Sir W.	Brogden, J.
Abercrombie, R.	Browne, D.
Acland, Sir T.	Brydges, Sir E.
Addington, Rt. Hon. J. H.	Butler, Hon. C.
Alexander, J.	Calvert, John
Allan, Geo.	Calvert, N.
Ampley, Lord	Campbell, Gen. A.
Arbuthnot Rt. Hon. C.	Canning, Rt. Hon. G.
Ashurst, W. H.	Canning, G.
Atkins, J. Ald.	Castlereagh, Visc.
Babington, T.	Chetwode, Sir J.
Bankes, Geo.	Clements, H. J.
Bankes, H.	Clive, Visc.
Barclay, C.	Clive, H.
Barne, N.	Collins, H. P.
Bathurst, Rt. Hon. C.	Colthurst, Sir N.
Bective, Earl	Cotter, J. L.
Bentinck, Lord W.	Cotterell, Sir J.
Beresford, Sir J.	Courtenay, T. P.
Beresford, Lord G.	Cranborne, Visc.
Bernard, Viscount	Croker, J. W.
Binning, Lord	Crusbie, J.
Blair, J.	Cust, Hon. W.
Bloomfield, Sir B.	Dawson, G.
Bourne, W. S.	Daly, Jas.
Bridport, Lord	Davis, R. H.

Davis, Hart	Money, W. T.
Desbrow, E.	Moore, Ld. H.
Doveton, G.	Moorsom, Admiral
Douglas, W.	Morritt, J. B.
Drummond, J.	Neville, R.
Dunlop, Gen.	Nicholl, Sir J.
Dundas, Rt. Hon. W.	Ogle, H. M.
Edmonstone, Sir C.	Osborn, J.
Egerton, Sir J.	Paget, Hon. B.
Egerton, W.	Pechell, Sir T.
Ellison, C.	Peel, Sir R.
Estcourt, T. G.	Peel, Rt. Hon. R.
Falkiner, Sir F.	Phipps, Hon. E.
Fane, Thos.	Pole, Rt. Hon. W. W.
Farmer, S.	Protheroe, Ed.
Fitzgerald, Rt. Hon. Vesey	Quin, Hon. W. W.
Fitzhugh, W.	Robinson, G. A.
Frank, Admiral	Robinson, Rt. Hon. F.
Garrow, Sir W.	Rochfort, G. H.
Glerawley, Lord	Rose, Rt. Hon. G.
Gooch, T. S.	St. Paul, Sir H.
Goulburn, H.	St. Paul, H.
Grant, A. C.	Shawe, B.
Grant, C. jun.	Sheldon, R.
Graves, Lord	Shepherd, Sir S.
Hall, B.	Shiffner, G.
Hamilton, Hans	Singleton, M.
Harvey, C.	Smith, C. Ald.
Holford, G. P.	Somerset, Lord G.
Holmes, W.	Somerville, Sir M.
Hope, Sir G.	Stewart, Hon. J.
Horrocks, S.	Stirling, Sir W.
Hulse, Chas.	Strahan, A.
Hume, Sir A.	Sullivan, Rt. Hon. J.
Huskisson, Rt. Hon. W.	Suttie, Sir Jas.
Jackson, Sir J.	Sutton, Rt. Hon. C. M.
Jenkinson, Hon. C.	Swann, H.
Jocelyn, Visc.	Taylor, J.
Jones, J.	Taylor, Watson
Irving, J.	Thynne, Lord J.
Iacon, E.	Townshend, Hon. H.
Law, Hon. E.	Valletort, Visc.
Leader, W.	Vansittart, Rt. Hon. N.
Leigh, J. H.	Wallace, Rt. Hon. T.
Leigh, Thos.	Walpole, Lord
Littleton, E. J.	Ward, R.
Lockhart, W. E.	Warrender, Sir G.
Long, Rt. Hon. C.	Webber, D. W.
Lubbock, Sir J. W.	Wedderburn, Sir D.
Loftus, General	Welby, Sir W.
Lowther, J.	Wellesley, W. Long
Lowther, Lord	White, M.
Lowther, J. jun.	Wilberforce, W.
Lushington, S. R.	Wilson, C. E.
Lyster, R.	Wrottesley, H.
Maberley, J.	Yarmouth, Earl of
Maitland, E.	Yorke, Rt. Hon. C.
Manners, R.	Yorke, Sir Jos.
March, Earl of
Marryat, J.	TELLERS.
Meyler, R.	Grant, C. jun.
Milne, P.	Osborne, J.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Abercrombie, Hon. J.	Baillie, J. E.
Althorp, Viscount	Baring, Sir Thomas
Anson, Sir George	Barnett, James
Atherley, Arthur	Birch, Jos.
Bastard, E. P.	Brand, Hon. Thos.
Bolland, John	Brougham, Henry
Bennet, Hon. H. G.	Burdett, Sir Francis

Burrell, Walter
 Burrell, Hon. P. D.
 Cally, Thomas
 Calcraft, John
 Calvert, Charles
 Carew, R. S.
 Carter, John
 Caulfield, Hon. H.
 Cavendish, Lord G.
 Cavendish, Hon. H.
 Curwen, J. C.
 Deerhurst, Lord
 Dickinson, Wm.
 Duncannon, Viscount
 Dundas, Hon. L.
 Dundas, Charles
 Ehrington, Viscount
 Elliot, Rt. Hon. W.
 Fane, John
 Fazakerley, S. N.
 Fergusson, Sir R.
 Fitzgerald, Kt. Hon. M.
 Fitzroy, Lord John
 Folkstone, Viscount
 Frankland, Robert
 Fremantle, William
 Gordon, Robert
 Grenfell, Pascoe
 Gurney, Hudson
 Hammersley, Hugh Hamilton, Lord A.
 Hamilton, Sir H. D.
 Heathcote, Sir G.
 Heron, Sir Robert
 Howard, Hon. W.
 Howorth, Hump.
 Hughes, W. I.
 Hurst, Robert
 Jervois, G. P.
 Knox, Hon. Thos.
 Lamb, Hon. W.
 Lambton, J. G.
 Latouche, Rob. jun.
 Lytton, Hon. W. H.
 Lockhart, J. I.
 Methuen, Paul
 Macdonald, James
 Mackintosh, Sir J.
 Markham, Admiral
 Martin, Henry
 Martin, John
 Monck, Sir Charles

Morland, S. B.
 Morpeth, Viscount
 Moore, Peter
 Newman, R. W.
 Neville, Hon. R.
 Newport, Sir John
 North, Dudley
 Nugent, Lord
 Ord, William
 Ossulston, Lord
 Paget, Hon. C.
 Porcher, J. Dupree
 Peirse, Henry
 Philips, George
 Piggot, Sir A.
 Ponsonby, Right Hon. G.
 Ponsonby, Hon. F. C.
 Power, Richard
 Prittie, Hon. F. A.
 Proby, Hon. Captain
 Pym, Francis
 Ramsbottom, John
 Ramsden, S. C.
 Ridley, Sir M. W.
 Romilly, Sir Samuel
 Russell, Lord William
 Russell, Lord G. W.
 Russell, Lord John
 Russell, R. G.
 Saville, Albany
 Scudamore, Robt.
 Sharp, Richard
 Sefton, Earl of
 Smith, John
 Teed, John
 Thompson, Thos.
 Tavistock, Marquis
 Taylor, C. W.
 Tierney, Right Hon. G.
 Vernon, Granville
 Wood, Thomas
 Wright, J. Atkins
 Walpole, Hon. G.
 Waldegrave, Hon. W.
 Warre, J. A.
 Webb, E.
 Wilkins, Walter
 Wynn, C. W.

TELLERS.

Milton, Viscount
 Smith, Wm.

tranquillity, and to report to the House as they shall see occasion.

Ordered to Report,

That the Committee have met, and have proceeded in the examination of the papers referred to them.

Their attention was in the first instance directed to those which relate to the metropolis; and they have found therein such evidence as leaves no doubt in their minds that a traitorous conspiracy has been formed in the metropolis, for the purpose of overthrowing, by means of a general insurrection, the established Government, laws, and constitution of this kingdom, and of effecting a general plunder and division of property.

In the last autumn, various consultations were held by persons in the metropolis engaged in this conspiracy. Different measures, of the most extensive and dangerous nature, were resolved upon: partial preparations were made for their execution, and various plans were discussed for collecting a force sufficient for that purpose. But at a subsequent consultation another plan was adopted, which was, to get a great number of men together to see what force could be raised; and it was agreed, that the best way to get them together, would be to call a public meeting. Spafields was fixed upon as the place affording the greatest facilities for entering the town, and attacking the most important points in the city. In pursuance of this design, and in order to assemble in the neighbourhood of London a great number of the poorer classes of the community, and particularly of those in whose minds the pressure of the times might be supposed to have excited disaffection and discontent: advertisements were inserted in newspapers, and handbills were industriously distributed, inviting the distressed manufacturers, mariners, artisans, and others, to assemble at that place, on the 15th of November. A large body of people accordingly assembled at the time and place prescribed. The most inflammatory language was there held to the multitude, having a direct tendency to excite them to outrage and violence; and the meeting was in fact followed by some acts of plunder and riot. A petition to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent was agreed to at that meeting, and an adjournment to Palace-yard on the first day after the meeting of Parliament was proposed: but the 2d of December was subsequently fixed upon (on the proposition of one of the persons concerned in the plans already described) for another meeting in Spafields; and that day appears to have been determined upon for the execution of their design.

Various schemes were formed for this purpose: amongst them was a general and forcible liberation of all persons confined in the different prisons in the metropolis: into some of which, in order to facilitate its execution, an address to the prisoners was introduced, assuring them,

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, Feb. 18.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Erskine presented a petition from Glasgow, praying for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage. Laid on the table.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.] The Earl of Aberdeen presented the Report of the Secret Committee, which he moved should be read. It was accordingly read at the table, as follows:—

REPORT,

By the Lords Committees appointed a Secret Committee to inquire into certain Meetings and Combinations, endangering the public that their liberty would be restored under a new Government; announcing the intended attack upon all the prisons for that day; apprising the prisoners that arms would be ready for them: exhorting them to be prepared with the national tricolour cockade, and to co-operate by the most violent and sanguinary means to ensure success.

It was also proposed to set fire to various barracks, and steps were taken to ascertain and prepare the means of effecting this purpose. An attack upon the Tower and the Bank, and other points of importance, was, after previous consultations, finally determined upon. Pikes and arms to a certain extent were actually provided, and leaders were named, among whom the points of attack were distributed. It further appears, that the interval between the two meetings was employed, with unremitting assiduity, by some of the most active agitators, in taking regular circuits through different quarters of the town. In these they either resorted to the established clubs or societies, or laboured in conversations, apparently casual, at public-houses, to work up the minds of those with whom they conversed into such a state of ferment and irritation, as to render them, when collected in sufficient numbers, for whatever ostensible purpose, the fit and ready instruments for the execution of any project, however rash and desperate. In the course of these circuits, one of their chief objects appears to have been to take every opportunity of attempting to seduce from their allegiance, the soldiers of the different guard and at the barracks. The principal persons concerned in this plan, actually proceeded to Spafelds on the second of December, some of them with concealed arms, and with ammunition previously prepared: they had also provided themselves with tricolour flags, and with a standard bearing the following inscription:—"The brave soldiers are our brothers: treat them kindly." And also with tricolour cockades, evidently adopted as the signal of revolution. After much inflammatory language, a direct invitation was by one of these persons addressed to the multitude, to proceed immediately to actual insurrection: and it appears quite certain, that the acts of plunder which were perpetrated for the purpose of procuring arms, and the other measures of open insurrection which followed, were not accidental or unpremeditated, but had been deliberately preconcerted, as parts of a general plan of rebellion and revolution. There appears also strong reason to believe that the execution of those projects at that particular time, was expected by some of the associations in distant parts of the country. The conspirators seem to have had the fullest confidence of success; and a persuasion has subsequently been expressed amongst them, that their plans could have been defeated only by casual and unexpected circumstances. Even after the failure of this attempt, the same plans appear not to have been abandoned.

Your Committee are deeply concerned to be compelled, in further execution of their duty, to report their full conviction that designs of this nature have not been confined to the capital, but have been extended, and are still extending, widely in many other parts of Great Britain, particularly in some of the most populous and manufacturing districts.

At the meeting of the 2d of December in Spafelds, that part of the assembly which had not engaged in acts of plunder and insurrection before-mentioned, came to a resolution to adjourn the meeting to the second Monday after the meeting of Parliament; namely, the 10th of February: and it appears by the papers referred to the Committee, that meetings in various parts of the country, conformably to a plan settled by the leading persons in London, at an early period, were intended to be held on the same day.

It appears manifest, that the persons engaged in various parts, both of England and Scotland, in forwarding the plans of revolution, have constantly waited for the example of the metropolis. Intelligence of the event of the meeting there on the 2d of December was anxiously expected: and as the first report of the beginning of the disturbance excited in a high degree the spirits of the disaffected, so its speedy suppression produced the expression of strong feelings of disappointment. Had it even partially succeeded, there seems much reason to believe, that it would have been the signal for a more general rising in other parts of the kingdom. Since that time it appears to be the prevailing impression amongst the leading malcontents in the country, that it is expedient for them to wait till the whole kingdom shall (according to their expression) be more completely organized, and more ripe for action.

What is meant by completely organizing the country, is but too evident from the papers before the Committee. It appears clearly that the object is, by means of societies or clubs, established, or to be established in all parts of Great Britain, under pretence of Parliamentary Reform, to infect the minds of all classes of the community, and particularly those whose situation most exposes them to such impressions, with a spirit of discontent and disaffection, of insubordination, and contempt of all law, religion, and morality; and to hold out to them the plunder and division of all property, as the main object of their efforts, and the restoration of their natural rights; and no endeavours are omitted to prepare them to take up arms on the first signal for accomplishing these designs.

It is on these grounds that your Committee have been led to look with particular anxiety to the formation, principles, and conduct of those societies or clubs, by which the ends of the disaffected have been hitherto so much forwarded, and are expected by them to be finally accomplished. Many of these societies pass under the denomination of Hampden Clubs. Under this title societies of very various descriptions appear to have been formed, all professing their object to be Parliamentary Reform. This name and their professions may have induced many persons to become members of such societies, who may not be aware of the ultimate intentions of many of their leaders; and the Committee would by no means ascribe to all these societies, the same practices and designs which they have found to be but too prevalent amongst a large number of them; but they find that, particularly among the manufacturing and labouring classes, societies of this denomination have been most widely extended, and appear to have become some of the chief instruments of disseminating doctrines, and of preparing for the execution of plans, the most dangerous to the public security and peace.

Others of these societies are called Union Clubs, professing the same object of Parliamentary Reform, but under these words understanding Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments, projects which evidently involve not any qualified or partial change, but a total subversion of the British constitution.

It appears that there is a London Union Society, and branch Unions corresponding with it, and affiliated to it. Others of these societies have adopted the name of Spencean Philanthropists; and it was by members of a club of this description, that the plans of the conspirators in London were discussed and prepared for execution.

The principles of these last associations seem to be spreading rapidly among the other societies which have been formed, and are daily forming, under that and other denominations in the country. Among the persons adopting these principles, it is common to disclaim Parliamentary Reform as unworthy of their attention. Their objects are avowed in a handbill dispersed by the society of that description in London, and in numerous other publications. These objects are, "A parochial partnership in land, on the principle that the landholders are not proprietors in chief; that they are but the stewards of the public; that the land is the people's farm; that landed monopoly is contrary to the spirit of Christianity, and destructive of the independence and morality of mankind."

The societies under these different names are so numerous, and so various, that it has been difficult to obtain a complete view of all of them, or to comprehend them under any general description.

The country societies are principally to be found in and in the neighbourhood of Leicester, Loughborough, Nottingham, Mansfield, Derby, Chesterfield, Sheffield, Blackburne, Manchester, Birmingham, and Norwich, and in Glasgow and its vicinity; but they extend and are spreading, in some parts of the country, to almost every village. In addition to all the arts of seduction, resort is also had to a system of intimidation, and threats are held out to those who refuse to join. Their combinations are artfully contrived to secure secrecy in their proceedings, and to give to the leading members undisputed authority over the rest. Oaths of secrecy have been frequently administered, some of which are of the most atrocious and dreadful import.

They do not, however, trust to this security alone to prevent discovery: their proceedings are seldom reduced to writing: they pass and are communicated by word of mouth. The more numerous meetings delegate all authority to a managing committee; and by that committee, and by meetings of delegates from the committees of different societies, every thing of importance is transacted.

The committees themselves are also cautious of reducing any of their proceedings to writing, communicating with each other only by delegates and missionaries.

It appears that, in some parts of the country, arms have been lately procured by individual members of these societies in considerable quantities, which can only have been done with a view to the use of force. Subscriptions are also generally required, which, although the amount paid by each individual may be very small, may produce, from the large numbers of the contributors, no inconsiderable fund.

The destructive objects which the leading members of these societies have in view are demonstrated by their publications and by their proceedings, all equally calculated to inflame the minds of the members, and in general of the poorer classes of the community. At the ordinary meetings of these societies, which are often continued to a late hour, their time is principally employed in listening to speeches tending to the destruction of social order, recommending a general equalization of property, and at the same time endeavouring to corrupt the morals of the hearers, and to destroy all reverence for religion. The landholder has been represented as a monster which must be hunted down, and the fundholder as a still greater evil; and both have been described as rapacious creatures, who take from the people 1*sd.* out of every quatern loaf. They have been told that Parliamentary Reform is no more than a half measure, changing only one set of thieves for another; and that they must go to the land, as nothing short of that would avail them. Another principal employment of their time is to listen to publications of the same description as the speeches, containing the same doctrines, and leading to the same purposes: and the meetings are frequently terminated, particularly in London, by profane and seditious songs, and parodies of parts of the liturgy, in which the responses are chanted by the whole company. By such means, and by the profession of open infidelity in which some of the members indulge in their speeches, the minds of those who attend their meetings are tainted and depraved; they are taught contempt for all decency, all law, all religion and morality, and are thus prepared for the most atrocious scenes of outrage and violence.

Amongst the most effectual means of furthering these dangerous designs, the Committee think it their duty particularly to call the attention of the House to the unremitting activity which has been employed throughout the kingdom, in circulating, to an unprecedented extent, at the lowest prices or gratuitously, publications of the most seditious and inflammatory nature, marked with a peculiar character of irreligion and blasphemy, and tending not only to overturn the existing form of Government and order of society, but to root out those principles, upon which alone any government or any society can be supported.

The Committee cannot but consider the late attack upon His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, on his way from opening the present Session of Parliament, as an additional and melancholy proof of the efficacy of this system, to destroy all reverence for authority, and all sense of duty, and to expose to insult, indignity, and hazard, the person of the immediate representative of the Sovereign, even in the exercise of one of the most important parts of his royal functions.

It appears to be an essential part of the system to take advantage of the opportunities afforded by public meetings, convoked either by the leaders of these societies, or by others, in the metropolis, and in populous places and districts; to address the multitude in terms of unprecedented licence and violence, amounting even in some instances to an open declaration, that in case of non-compliance with their petitions, the Sovereign will have forfeited his claim to their allegiance. These proceedings are subsequently printed and circulated, and thus become a fresh vehicle for sedition and treason.

By the frequency of these meetings, and by the new practice of continuing them (under various pretexts) by frequent adjournments, the minds of His Majesty's well-disposed and peaceable subjects are held in a state of perpetual agitation and alarm. The appointment of such public meetings in a variety of different places on the same day, appears to be considered as the most effectual means of accomplishing the designs of the disaffected, and must evidently, in a high degree, embarrass and impede the exertions of all civil powers applicable to the suppression of disturbances, distract the attention of Government, and oblige them so to subdivide and harass the military force which it may be necessary to call in for the assistance of the civil power, as to render it inadequate to the maintenance of public tranquillity.

Such a state of things cannot be suffered to continue without hazarding the most imminent and dreadful evils; and although the Committee do not presume to anticipate the decision of Parliament as to the particular measures to be adopted in the present emergency, they feel it to be their duty to express their decided opinion, that further provisions are necessary for the preservation of the public peace, and for the protection of interests in which the happiness of every class of the community is deeply and equally involved.

The Earl of Liverpool moved that the report be laid on the table, and taken into consideration on Friday, and that the House be summoned for that day.

Earl Grosvenor expressed his hope that evidence to justify the allegations in the report, would first be laid on the table. However respectable the committee was, the number was but very limited. The language of the report was alarming, but the disaffection might be only partial; and under the law as it stood, sufficient means existed for suppressing the attempts of the disaffected. There were no greater enemies of their country than those who would take occasion, from a partial disaffection, to abridge the liberties of the whole people.

The Earl of Harrowby had always understood, that one of the objects of Parliament in referring papers to a committee of secrecy was, that a greater degree of trust might be reposed in such a committee, than in one constituted in the ordinary way: and that it was to be left to the discretion of the Committee, whether the evidence ought or ought not to be laid on the table. In many cases it was obvious, that the production of the information on which the report was founded, would counteract the objects which Parliament might have in view, in adopting this course of proceeding.

The House was ordered to be summoned for Friday.

[REFORM AND RETRENCHMENT.] Lord Holland stated, that he had some petitions in his hand, grounded on the distressed situation of the country. The first was from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London. Notwithstanding the report which had been just read, he trusted the House would listen to the complaints of the people with indulgence, and the more especially, in consequence of that report, would do nothing to discourage the exercise of the right of petitioning the two Houses of Parliament. Whatever might be the allegations and statements in petitions, if they were couched in respectful language, their lordships had always been willing to receive them. He did not say so, because in the petitions which he was about to present there was any prayer to which he could not in any degree assent: but even if the prayer had been for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, it would be a calumny to say, that on that account merely, the petitioners had a design to subvert the laws and constitution of the country. His opinion was decidedly opposed to any such plan of Reform as that; but when the people were in a state of such distress, looking to the right and to the left for relief, and formed erroneous opinions of what would best contribute to their relief, that error would be best pointed out by discussions in Parliament; and if the one-half or one-fourth of what was stated in the report was true, the Ministers were deeply responsible for not assembling Parliament at an earlier period. It was, however, matter of great satisfaction, that at all the public meetings which had been lately held, the people had always agreed to petition Parliament; and as long as they did so it was a strong indication that the constitution was safe. The people, by thus petitioning, acknowledged that it was to Parliament they ought to look for relief, and nothing could be so dangerous as an impression among them, that it was in vain to make their complaints to that quarter. As to the petition which he now had to present, if there had been no other name to it but that which first appeared, it would be entitled to serious consideration. The name was Wood, Lord Mayor of London; a gentleman who not only held the situation of chief magistrate of the first metropolis in Europe, but had also united the suffrages of his fellow-citizens in his favour to an extent almost unprecedented; who had employed his well deserved popularity in enforcing the laws, and had exerted himself as a magistrate in the suppression of disorder and tumult, certainly not less strenuously than those more in favour with the Ministers of Government. It was signed also by other Aldermen, and by some of the Livery, who, as they had shewn by their conduct throughout their whole life, that no consideration would induce them to sacrifice the liberties of the people, had lately also proved that they were incapable of yielding up at the summons of clamour the real interests of their country. The prayer of the petition was for a reduction of the public expenditure, the abolition of sinecures and useless places, some extension of the elective franchise, and some alteration in the duration of Parliaments. His lordship said he was averse from Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments, which would change the constitution; but he thought that some practical Reform in the representation was desirable. The best Reform, however, would be to destroy the means of influence and corruption. For this great good, the voice of the people should be raised. It was an error that Annual Parliaments were a constitutional right. The old statutes merely proved that Parliaments should be annually held, not that they should be annually elected.—The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

The noble lord then presented petitions from the Ward of Aldgate, in the city of London, and from the borough of Rutherglen, in Scotland, which were read, and laid on the table.

Earl Grey presented a petition from the Common Council of the City of London, on the same subject. He likewise disclaimed as impracticable the call for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage. Such things never had been, and he trusted never would be, though he knew that many virtuous and well-informed men supported the doctrines. He was, at the same time, a friend to moderate Reform, though he did not now carry his views so far as in his younger days he had done; for experience had taught him to doubt the advantage of such a Reform as he had once imagined—still no time ought to be lost in removing from the system of Representation those obvious stains which were the fruitful excitements to discontent. Locke, Blackstone, Pitt, and Fox, had all admitted that gross defects existed in the Constitution of the Commons' House; and even Burke had spoken of "the shameful parts of the Constitution!" The people, therefore, naturally looked for a removal of such defects, and the House should evince a sincere desire to remedy existing abuses.—The Petition was ordered to lie on the table.

FRENCH LOAN.] The Earl of Lauderdale moved for all official communications with his Majesty's ministers on the subject of the loan lately negotiated in France. He admitted the sacred right of individuals to dispose of their property to the best advantage, and was convinced that the employment of money in that line which brought the most profit, was, in the end, most beneficial for the general welfare. But it was a far different question, whether the disposition of such property in the funds of a foreign nation, arose from the encouragement of the Government, or was solely the act of the individuals themselves. It was to the nature of that encouragement that he pressed his motion. The noble earl then attacked the Sinking Fund, and said, that by enabling Parliament to borrow enormous sums, it had mainly contributed to reduce the country to its present distress.

The Earl of Liverpool had no difficulty in stating, that the Government of this country were not parties in the concern, they had entered into no engagement, they had given no guarantee, present or eventual, with reference to the transaction. It was a loan of the French Government with certain great houses in Europe, in which indeed one of the great banking-houses in this metropolis took an important share. In the exercise of his discretion, he had not thought it consistent with his public duty to discourage that transaction, though he felt it right the individuals should understand, that they entered into it on their own responsibility. The noble earl (he observed) had disparaged the principles of the Sinking Fund, as he had before taken occasion to do, both in that House and in print. He had stated that no merit was due to Mr. Pitt for the principle of the Sinking Fund, for it had been established long before his time. This was true; but what had been claimed for Mr. Pitt by his friends was, that in the course of a long, calamitous, and expensive war he had adhered rigidly to the principles of the Sinking Fund, and had never stopped its operation. On this his merit was founded. When the finances were in a more flourishing state—which though the noble mover did not anticipate, many others did confidently look forward to—the operation of the Sinking Fund on the money market would be most important. He concluded with observing, that the motion could have no effect, as no official communications had been made to the contractors for the loan.

Lord Holland remarked, that the expenses of the war had deprived us of all Sinking Fund in peace. The revenue was not sufficient, or scarcely so, to cover the interest of the debt, and the expenses of Government, without any Sinking Fund. The motion was negatived.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, February 18.

WOOTTON BASSET ELECTION.] The ballot for a Committee to try the merits of a petition, complaining of an undue return for the borough of Wootton Bassett was fixed for this day; but at four o'clock, there being only 61 members present, instead of 100 as the law requires, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, February 19.

ELECTION BALLOTS.] The ballot for a committee to try the merits of the Wootton Bassett Election being completed, Mr. C. W. Wynne rose and animadverted on the irregular conduct of some members, who, after their entrance into the House, had withdrawn before a sufficient number to form the ballot had appeared. He thought that some rule of greater severity was essential to the proceedings of the House, and that it was due to its dignity to adopt effectual means for enforcing the attendance of defaulters.

The Speaker was of opinion, that some interposition of its authority was required under the circumstances which had taken place. The question before the House now was, that the names of the absentees on the ballot should be reported on Friday next.

This motion was put and carried.

The following names were then read, being those on which the ballot had fallen for constituting the committee:—

Wm. Leader, Esq.	Sir M. Foulkes,
John Harford, Esq.	Wm. Hurst, Esq.
Wm. Fitzhugh, Esq.	J. Round, Esq.
S. Thornton, Esq.	R. Abercrombie, Esq.
Lord W. Russell,	W. Forbes, Esq.
T. Estcourt, Esq.	C. Harvey, Esq.
John Jones, Esq.	Sir J. M'Intosh.
John Bastard, Esq.

Mr. C. Wynn then moved a resolution, purporting, that no member should on days of election-ballots be allowed to leave the House after Mr. Speaker had taken the chair, till the order for the ballot had been either discharged, or the list of members completely filled up.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed his warm approbation of the motion; observing, that it was highly disrespectful and unbecoming to the House, that members should go away under such circumstances; and he was sure, that hon. members, on reflection, would see the necessity of some regulation on the subject.

The Speaker suggested the propriety of giving to the Sergeant at Arms authority to tell members who might be leaving the House, that they were acting inconsistently with their duty, and with the rules of the House. (Hear, hear.)

The question was put and carried unanimously.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.] Mr. B. Bathurst appeared at the bar with the Report of the Secret Committee, to whom certain papers laid before the House by command of the Prince Regent had been referred.

On the motion of Lord Castlereagh, it was read, as follows:—

"That it appears to your committee, after the most attentive consideration of the documents submitted to them from various parts of the country, that attempts had recently been made to take advantage of the distresses of the labouring and manufacturing classes of the nation, with a view not only to effect a Parliamentary Reform on the principle of Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, but to cause the total overthrow of all our institutions, and of every description of landed and funded property.

That this system of general spoliation chiefly proceeded from the doctrines maintained by a number of societies distinguished by the title of "Spencean," whose tenets were principally drawn from the works of a visionary writer, published above twenty years ago. That at meetings of some of these societies it was urged, that Parliamentary Reform must be held out as the ostensible object of their efforts, and with a view to mislead their enemies; but that it was in fact only a half measure; and that the people ought to look to the possession of the land, and nothing short of that; and that as to the constitution, of which so much had been said, this country had no constitution, for it was not to be found in any book, nor could any man tell what it was. In other societies founded on the Spencean principles, it had been maintained, that the only remedy for the grievances of the people was to hunt down the landowners, and to deprive those still greater wretches the fundholders of their pretended rights.

It appeared also, that these, and other societies of a similar character, had been guilty of the most blasphemous and impious proceedings: and that, as they assumed to be of a convivial nature, their political discussions were followed by songs of the most inflammatory and seditious description, and by the recitation of profane parodies of the liturgy, and of various parts of the Holy Scriptures.

That in order to extend the principles of these societies over the whole kingdom, the most active efforts were made by their various members: and in consequence those principles were disseminated in speeches at public meetings to the discharged soldiers and sailors, and to the distressed labourers and manufacturers of the country; and that, in aid of this object, incredible activity had been used to disperse cheap, and in many instances gratuitous publications, unfolding the doctrines of the societies.

That it had been proved to the entire satisfaction of your Committee, that a number of the members of these various societies, acting in a body as delegates, conceived and declared, that in their opinion the objects which they had in view might be and ought to be insured by an effort of the physical strength of the people to overpower the constitutional authorities. That they considered the first step which should be taken by them for this purpose, was by their individual exertions to discover and foment the discontents of the metropolis and its vicinity: and that returns of their proceedings were made by the individual delegates to the general body.

That it appears to your Committee that a plan was formed, by a sudden rising in the dead of night, to surprise the soldiers, and in the terror which would be thereby occasioned, to set fire to the town in various places, and to take possession of the Barracks, the Tower, and the Bank. That to assist in the execution of this project, a formidable machine was invented with which the streets could be cleared of all opposing force. This plan was, however, relinquished as premature: and it was resolved, that it would be more proper to ascertain the strength of the popular party, by convening meetings under the pretext of taking into consideration the legal mode of redressing grievances; and a map of London having been examined, Spafielde was selected as the place whence an attack on the Bank and the Tower could with the greatest facility be made. That the first meeting at Spafielde was accordingly advertised for the 15th of November, and that printed and written placards were exhibited in all parts of the town, of one of which the following is a copy:

"Britons to arms! The whole country only waits the signal from London. Break open the gunsmiths'. Arm yourselves with all sorts of instruments. No rise in the price of bread. No Regent, No Castlereagh. Off with their heads! No taxes. No bishops: they are only useless lumber.

"N. B. 5,000 of these bills are posted up in the town, and in the principal parts of the neighbourhood." That the intended insurrection assumed all the symbols of the French Revolution. That a committee of public safety was formed, consisting of 24 members. That flags and cockades were prepared for the occasion: but that on the 15th of November, when the first meeting took place, there was no violence (although there was some plunder in the evening of the day), and that the meeting adjourned to the 2d of December, by which time it was hoped means might be found to accelerate the accomplishment of the projected undertaking.

That your Committee find that not a moment was lost in the interval between the first and second meeting, to take advantage of every circumstance, which could further the attainment of the objects in view. Additional publications of an inflammatory nature were circulated every where. Endeavours were made to raise a general subscription for the support of those who had relinquished their ordinary occupations, to enable them to devote themselves to these purposes, which persons had hitherto chiefly been paid by a principal member of one of the societies. A plan was formed for the seduction of the soldiers, by raising hopes of promotion in the event of their joining in the approaching attempt, and exciting discontent among them by a story of the landing of a large foreign force in the country. It was again recommended, that the barracks should be the object of particular observation. Those quarters of the town where distress was most prevalent were visited by individuals appointed to inflame the people. Those warehouses along the river, and those shops in various parts of the town where arms were deposited, were carefully noted. A plan was also formed for the seduction of the sailors, by offering them additional pay under the new Government which was about to be established.

That immediately before the meeting of the 2d of December, many persons connected with these proceedings procured arms of various descriptions. It was thought that sufficient means had thus been obtained to carry on the intended operations for at least two hours, by which time it was supposed enough would be got from the gunsmiths and other depots to arm a considerable number of individuals. The manufacture of tricolour riband was encouraged, with a view of rendering it familiar to the eyes of the public.

Your committee have further received undoubted information, that a large quantity of pike-heads had been ordered of one individual, and 250 actually made by him, and delivered and paid for. It was also undoubtedly intended to liberate the prisoners in the principal gaols in or about the metropolis, in the hope of their concurrence and assistance in the intended insurrection. Addresses were introduced into some of those prisons, and recommended to be communicated to others, in which the persons confined were invited, in the name of the tricoloured committee, to rally round the tricoloured standard, which would be erected on Monday December the 2d, and to wear the tricoloured cockades themselves. It was promised that the prisoners should be liberated by force, and arms were stated to be provided for them; and they were directed to be ready to assist in overpowering the turnkeys. A waggon was hired for the business of the day, in which the flags and banner or standard, which had been previously prepared, together with some ammunition, were secretly conveyed to the place of meeting. From this waggon, before the ostensible business of the day commenced, in the other part of the field the most inflammatory speeches were delivered tending directly to excite insurrection, concluded by an appeal to the multitude assembled, whether they were prepared to redress their own grievances. A tricolour cockade was then exhibited, and the tricolour flag was displayed, and a number of persons followed it out of the field.

The direction which they took was towards that part of the town previously designed: gunsmiths' shops were broken open, addresses and offers were made to the soldiers at the Tower to induce them to open the gates; but from the failure of the numbers expected to join the insurgents, no attempt was made to force the gates. An attack was, however, made upon the City Magistrates assembled in the Royal Exchange, a shot fired, and a tricoloured flag and cockade openly displayed and seized on the offender.

In reviewing the whole of the transactions of the 2d of December, your Committee are firmly persuaded, that, however improbable the success of such a plan may appear, it yet was deliberately premeditated by desperate men, who calculated without reasonable ground upon defection in their opposers, and upon active support from those multitudes whose distress they had witnessed, and whom they had vainly instigated to revolt. That consequently it was not merely the sudden ebullition of the moment, or the unauthorized attempt of any unconnected individual.

Your Committee are further convinced that, notwithstanding the failure on the 2d of December, the same designs still continue to be prosecuted with sanguine hopes of success.

Your Committee having thus stated the general result of the evidence which has been laid before them, respecting the state of the metropolis, have now the no less painful duty of calling the attention of the house to what has been passing during the same period in different parts of the country, a subject of equally momentous consideration. The first thing which has here forced itself upon their observation is the widely diffused ramification of a system of clubs, associated professedly for the purpose of Parliamentary Reform, upon the most extended principal of Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments. These clubs in general designate themselves by the same name of Hampden Clubs. On the professed object of their institution, they appear to be in communication and connexion with the club of that name in London.

It appears to be part of the system of these clubs to promote an extension of clubs of the same name and nature, so widely as, if possible, to include every village in the kingdom. The leading members are active in the circulation of publications likely to promote their object. Petitions, ready prepared, have been sent down from the metropolis to all societies in the country disposed to receive them. The communication between these clubs takes place by the mission of delegates; delegates from these clubs in the country have assembled in London, and are expected to assemble again early in March. Whatever may be the real object of these clubs in general, your Committee have no hesitation in stating, from information on which they place full reliance, that in far the greater number of them, and particularly in those which are established in the great manufacturing districts of Lancashire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire, and which are composed of the lower order of artisans, nothing short of a revolution is the object expected and avowed.

Your Committee find, from equally undoubted information, that the doctrines of the Spencean Clubs have been widely diffused through the country, either by the extension of similar societies, or more frequently by the intervention of Missionaries or Delegates, whose business it is to propagate those doctrines throughout every society to which they have access. It is the universal practice of these Societies, to require from the members a small weekly subscription, which provides a fund for the expenses of these Missionaries, and also for the purchase of seditious tracts, which are read and commented on at their meetings. Some of these tracts, now before your Committee, inculcate, in the most artful manner, the necessity of overturning what they call "The Privileged Class," as distinguished from the people, who are described as consisting of labourers, artisans, tradesmen, and every profession useful to society. A new order is declared to be the will of the people; rebellion is justified by the assertion, that a nation cannot be a rebel: and all religion is disavowed as well as loyalty, by the assertion, in answer to the question, "Would you live without Gods or Kings?" "We abjure tyranny of every kind."

It seems, indeed, to be a part of the system, adopted by these societies, to prepare the minds of the people for the destruction of the present frame of society, by undermining not only their habits of decent and regular subordination, but all the principles of morality and religion. Your Committee find, that there is scarcely any very numerous society in the parts above referred to, of whose proceedings they have obtained an account, in which some of the leading speakers do not openly avow the most seditious opinions, and do not excite their hearers to be prepared for actual insurrection. Topics for discussion are selected with this view; amongst others, the question, Whether the jacobin or the loyalist was the best friend to his country? Even where petitioning is recommended, it is proposed to be conducted in such a manner, by an immense number of delegates attending in London at the same time, in several parties, attached to each petition, as might induce an effort to obtain by force whatever they demanded. A general idea seems prevalent among those who compose these societies, that some fixed day, at no very great distance, is to be appointed for a general rising. They have been taught to look to the meetings in London as the signal for their operations, and have been in the habit of adjourning their own assemblies simultaneously to the same day; and it is a lamentable instance of the common interest which they feel, if not of the connexion which is formed with those most implicated in the outrages committed in the metropolis, that about Manchester and some other places, the greatest exultation was manifested previous to the meeting in Spafields on the 2d of December: and the taking of the Tower and the ruin of the Bank were publicly and confidently predicted. The news of the result was impatiently expected, the roads were crowded during the night with a number of persons, many of them delegates from the different societies in the country, waiting for the arrival of the mail-coach: and the disappointment was not concealed, when it was ascertained that the riot had been quelled without much serious or extensive mischief.

It appears that the confidence of the disaffected is such, that they represent the numbers enrolled as amounting to several hundred thousand, and that their societies are daily increasing; that in their lists they distinguish by particular marks those among their subscribers who are able-bodied men, and ready to act when required: and that they also keep a list of those who refuse to join them in what they call a "Black Book," and threaten vengeance against these persons when the general insurrection shall take place. In some parts of one populous county, where nearly every village has already its Hampden Club, the members make it no secret that they consider themselves as of no other use than as being ready to act whenever they are called upon: on their admission they are said to be listed, and receive a secret card with the words "Be ready, be steady."

The habits and manners of these persons seem entirely changed; they already calculate upon the share of land which each is to possess, and point out the destruction of the churches, as the necessary consequence of their success. It appears that preparations are in progress, in several places, for providing arms: the demand upon gunsmiths for every species of fire-arms has been beyond all former example: the intention is professed of having recourse for a still larger supply to those towns where arms are manufactured, and where they are to be obtained at a very low rate, from the general cheapness of labour at this time; or in case of necessity, they are to be seized by force. The facility of converting implements of husbandry into offensive weapons has been suggested; and persons have been sent to observe the state of particular places, where depots of arms for the public service were supposed to have been formed.

Your Committee find, ~~that~~ a system of secret association has been extended to the manufacturing population of Glasgow, and some other populous towns of Scotland; and although these societies have availed themselves of the same pretext, of Parliamentary Reform, on the broadest basis, your Committee are firmly persuaded, from the information which has been laid before them, that their ultimate object is the overthrow by force of the existing form of Government. That the time for attempting this enterprise was to depend on the simultaneous rising of the disaffected in England; with some emissaries from whom occasional intercourse appears to have taken place, and that some provision of weapons has been made by this association.

Your Committee have now submitted to the House what they conceive to be a fair and not exaggerated statement of the result of their investigation. They have thought themselves precluded from inserting, in an Appendix, the information from which it is drawn, by the consideration, that unless it were extremely partial and incomplete, they could not make it public without hazarding the personal safety of many respectable individuals, and in some instances without prejudicing the due administration of public justice.

On a review of the whole, it is a great satisfaction to your Committee to observe, that, notwithstanding the alarming progress which has been made in the system of extending disaffection and secret societies, its success has been confined to the principal manufacturing districts, where the distress is more prevalent and numbers more easily collected; and that even in many of these districts, privations have been borne with exemplary patience and resignation, and the attempts of the disaffected have been disappointed; that few, if any, of the higher orders, or even of the middle class of society, and scarcely any of the agricultural population, have lent themselves to the more violent of these projects. Great allowance must be made for those who, under the pressure of urgent distress, have been led to listen to plausible and confident demagogues, in the expectation of immediate relief. It is to be hoped, that many of those who have engaged to a certain extent in the projects of the disaffected, but in whom the principles of moral and religious duty have not been extinguished or perverted by the most profane and miserable sophistry, would withdraw themselves before those projects were pushed to actual insurrection.

But with all these allowances, your Committee cannot contemplate the activity and arts of the leaders in this conspiracy, and the numbers whom they have already seduced, and may seduce; the oaths by which many of them are bound together; the means suggested and prepared for the forcible attainment of their objects; the nature of the objects themselves, which are not only the overthrow of all the political institutions of the kingdom, but also such a subversion of the rights and principles of property, as must necessarily lead to general confusion, plunder, and bloodshed; without submitting to the most serious attention of the House, the dangers which exist, and which the utmost vigilance of Government, under the existing laws, has been found inadequate to prevent."

Lord Castlereagh then moved, that the report should be printed, and taken into consideration on Monday next, which was ordered accordingly.

PROFITS OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.] Mr. Grenfell moved for a select committee to inquire into the engagements between the Bank and the Government, and to consider the advantages derived therefrom by the Bank, with a view to such arrangements as would be consistent with the public faith and equity, that ought to exist in all transactions between the Bank and the public, and to report thereon. The House would recollect, that in the year 1797, the affairs of the Bank of England were investigated by a parliamentary committee of secrecy. It then appeared, that from the establishment of the corporation in 1694 to 1797, the only profits which the Bank directors had been able to grant to the proprietors were those annual dividends, which at first were 8 or 9 per cent. were reduced afterwards with the decreasing rate of interest to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and rose again afterwards, on the passing of the restriction act, to 7. These were the only profits. In those days no bonus had ever been heard of, and the average amount of those dividends, from 1694 to 1797, was $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In 1797 it appeared, that the Bank, having made this dividend of $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. had a clear surplus capital of 3,800,000l.; this, added to the previous capital of 11,600,000l., made the total stock in 1797 amount to 15,400,000l. Since 1797, confining his view to advantages gratuitously given, and to the profits arising from the exorbitant rate at which the Bank was paid for managing the money affairs of the country (without taking into consideration the trade in bullion, which might or might not have returned a profit), he would undertake to say, that the gains of the Bank had been greater than had ever been known in any age or nation. The profits of the banks of Amsterdam, Hamburg and Genoa, were nothing when compared with what had been gained by the Bank of England within the last 20 years. This he asserted to be a fact within his own knowledge and experience as a proprietor. These profits amounted to a bonus of 27 millions, in addition to the regular dividend of 7 per cent. It was not to see that every government had derived great pecuniary accommodation from the Bank of England; but it was the restriction act of 1797 that enabled the Bank to come forward with these accommodations; so that it was the public itself that first enabled the Bank to accommodate the public, and to gain a command over the currency of the country. These accommodations had become a source of wealth to the Bank, which had thereby clearly gained an influence over the Government, that had been manifested on more occasions than one. When he had complained of the enormous charge for merely paying the dividends and transacting the banking business of the country, an hon. gentleman on the other side had said, the Bank was contented with 7d. on every 100l.; that is, 7d. per cent. on 800,000,000l. But the question was not whether we should pay 7d. or 6d. for every 100l.; but whether the risk run, or the services performed by the Bank, required a payment of 282,000l. per annum. He should be happy to meet the Bank on a committee, and to prove that the services paid with nearly 300,000l. per annum, would be well paid by half, by 150,000l. Then he complained of the unmerited gains from the sums of money remaining in the hands of the Bank, seldom less than 9 millions, and sometimes amounting to 15 millions, producing a loss of more than 5 or 600,000l. to the public, and an equal profit to the Bank; and all this for the comparatively insignificant service of acting as the bankers of the public, paying the dividends, and drawing the drafts that were necessary. He had proposed resolutions to exhibit the aggregate amount of public money in the hands of the Bank, and the profit they derived from it; but he was met by a set of counter resolutions. The Bank, however, afterwards agreed to advance six millions, which was a valuable concession; and a saving in the rate of interest of 60,000l. a year. He believed that these six millions formed only part of the public money then in the Bank's hands. It was therefore only a public use of part of the money which belonged to the public. He thought that, instead of paying 4 per cent., the public should have had it for nothing; but his amendment to that effect was negatived. Afterwards three millions more were lent at 3 per cent., and there was a third concession of about half a million, equal to 25,000l. a year saving, from the unclaimed dividends. The savings effected by these three transactions amounted to 145,000l. a year; which, with what the public gained by arrangements respecting stamps, made up 180,000l. The House would judge whether this was the result of the discussions on the subject within those walls, or of the vigilance and activity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, co-operating with the awakened sense of justice, after twenty years' sleep, of the Bank directors. He was glad to find, however, that in the two last sessions such savings had been made. He might now, perhaps, be asked, why he was not satisfied; and what object he wished a committee to employ itself upon? His answer was, that he should not be satisfied until ample and perfect justice was rendered to the public. The present balance of public money held by the Bank, he estimated, in the aggregate, at eleven millions, which were quite unproductive for the service of the country; but occasioned a loss of interest of 550,000*l.* per annum. He referred to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's correspondence with the Bank in 1814, the result of which was, in truth, a recognition by the Bank of their profits, and of the right of the public to interfere. Nothing had since passed to preclude the public from making regulations. We were now losing 280,000*l.* a year of interest by our deposits; and all this for no services except the Bank's acting as treasurer. He must confidently look to this as a great source of saving. Next he came to the exorbitant rate at which the Bank was paid for management. He would refer to certain parliamentary papers, which would afford members particular information on this point. These were the able report of the finance committee of 1797, the voluminous report of 1807, Mr. Perceval's correspondence with the Bank directors, and various other matters of detail. He believed he could shew that, instead of allowing the Bank 300,000*l.* a year, they would be liberally and handsomely paid by less than half that sum. (hear.) He looked, indeed, for a saving in this branch of 150,000*l.* These were his two great sources. There were some other heads not quite so important, but which ought not to be overlooked, especially after the House had thought it so necessary to debate minor reductions in different public officers' salaries. Since 1792 the Bank had made their charge on 4 millions bought by them from the South Sea Company; but the management had now ceased. This was said to be part of an agreement with that company: he doubted this. But suppose it was so, there was a third party to be considered—the public, who were made to pay it. This charge was at a greater rate than that for the management of other public debts. The Bank had also 800*l.* upon every million of a loan. In that way they received during the war 4 or 500,000*l.*; they gained permanent concessions at every increase of public debt. Another item was disgusting: Mr. Perceval considered it improper. They charged 4,000*l.* a year for their house expenses, meaning, he supposed, coals, candles, and stationery. The term "house expenses," which was formerly used, was not palatable, and now they called it "charges of management;" but management of what? Why, of their own affairs! It was discreditable to them, and unjust to the public. In agitating this subject, he was actuated only by public motives, by an honest conviction of the grievance, and a sincere and perhaps ardent desire to contribute to the correction of evils, and the alleviation of the calamitous burdens which oppressed every class of the community.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that if the transactions between Government and the Bank had not been already considered, he should have paid more attention to the hon. member's arguments. The report of the select committee on expenditure shewed that a rigorous and exact examination had taken place. Various suggestions were made, of which he had always endeavoured to avail himself in any negotiations with the Bank. Any profits from the money they held were now clearly decreasing, by circumstances affecting the interest of money, and by the return of peace. Supposing the Bank could have even made 5 per cent. on all the balances in time of war, it could not do so now. There had been great reductions on the exchequer bills. The arrangement two years ago must now be more advantageous to the public, and less so to the Bank. The balances could not be employed for the public advantage but by arrangements with the Bank. It appeared to him impracticable without the Bank's concurrence and assistance. Mr. Perceval thought of another plan, and accordingly made arrangements with the Bank for the purpose of advances, partly without interest. On this principle the present arrangements were formed; and the advances of 6,000,000*l.* and 3,000,000*l.* made. He could not conceive it wise or prudent to shake the agreement. During the last session, it was determined that the Bank should resume cash payments on the 5th of July, 1818, with the understanding that they were to make every proper preparatory arrangement for that event. It would be indiscreet now to make an inquiry into what those arrangements are. Instead of going into a minute examination of all the transactions of the Bank, it was preferable to allow the Bank to proceed without harassing them, as he believed the directors sincerely intended to take all proper steps: by this mode he was convinced they would best promote the public good, give security to commerce, and afford greater means of accommodation both for private transactions and for public purposes. He could not feel it his duty to agree to the proposed committee, particularly at the present time. It would be useless and inconvenient.

Mr. Peter Moore said, the vast profit made by the Bank at the expense of the country, shewed the propriety and necessity of the inquiry into which it would be the business of the committee to enter.

Mr. Marryat supported the motion for a committee, on the ground of the advantages which had already resulted from the consideration given by the House to the engagement between the Bank and Government. To shew that the services of this corporation, in acting as the national bankers, were exceedingly overpaid, he must appeal to the case of the United States of America, where the National Bank, in consideration of the balances of public money in its hands, and the other advantages it enjoyed by the countenance of Government, managed the public business for nothing. He might still farther, in proof of the doctrine he wished to establish, mention the fact, that the Globe Assurance Company offered to do the same for this Country, which the American National Bank did for the United States. The saving that might accrue to the public from a change in the present arrangements between the Government and the Bank, appeared to him very important; and the inquiry into its practicality and extent, deserved in his mind, precedence over most other questions of economy.

Mr. Hustisson rejoiced to see the period approaching in which cash payments would be resumed, and entertained the most sanguine hope, that it would not be delayed beyond the time contemplated by Parliament. The hon. member who spoke last, gave as a reason for inquiry into the profits of the Bank, with a view to a more equal participation in them by the public, the circumstance that the Bank of the United States of America transacted the public business for nothing. He (Mr. H.) did not know what advantages the Government of that Country allowed the Bank; but to make the comparison as it ought, the circumstances of both establishments should have been stated. It should have been mentioned whether the Bank of the United States allowed the public three millions without interest, and had paid large sums for repeated renewals of its charter. The hon. member (Mr. Grenfell) had enlarged on the great profits of the Bank during the war, and considered its profits as losses to the public. He had forgotten that other corporations and societies likewise made great profits. He had complained that these profits were made by the Restriction Act, and recommended a participation in these profits, because they had accrued from the interference of the legislature. He (Mr. H.) although he allowed these profits were great, thought that it would not be consistent with the dignity of the legislature, to share in profits that resulted from a measure which was enacted not for profit, but security. He objected to a committee of inquiry, because inquiry had already taken place, and none of the facts on which the present motion was grounded were pretended to be new. Almost every account and every fact, was before the committee of 1807, which drew up the able report, embodying almost all the hon. member's observations. The house-money and other items were there contained. If, in consequence of the information then collected, and the perfect knowledge of all the grounds on which the public could claim a participation in Bank profits, no better bargain was made in 1808, the circumstances were less favourable at present for making an increased demand than then; and this, accordingly, was not a period for revising subsisting engagements, with a view to alter them, so as to obtain greater advantages.

Mr. Manning, (the Bank Director) observed, that the subject had been before considered by the House, when it was admitted that the charge was not unreasonable: the Bank charges were now decreasing, and he saw no ground for inquiry.

Lord A. Hamilton thought that the hon. gentleman, (Mr. Grenfell), had shewn sufficient ground for a committee. There was no mode so proper to be adopted, and he should, therefore, give it his most cordial support.

Mr. Christopher Smith said a few words in favour of the system pursued by the Bank, and objected to the motion.

Mr. Grenfell in reply, said, that he had seen the charter of the American Bank; and he could state without the fear of contradiction, that they had undertaken to make the transfers, and to manage the whole business of the State, for nothing, in consideration of the balances in their hands. (Hear, hear.) The principles upon which the Bank of England now proceeded, were directly opposite to the original intentions of the legislature, and a most unjust and heavy burden on the country. The Bank could not take to itself any credit for its advance of money to the Government at a low interest; for ever since 1746, this had been the condition of the renewal of its charter.

On a division, there appeared for the motion, 40—against it, 90.—Majority 50.

CASH PAYMENTS.] Lord A. Hamilton then rose, and after enforcing the necessity of watching the proceedings of the Bank with some jealousy and distrust, especially on the notorious ground that the prosperity of the Bank and the distresses of the country had always advanced together, moved for three documents: 1st, For any notice given by the Bank in 1816, respecting the payment of notes in specie; 2d, for an account of the amount of specie which they were liable to pay on this notice; and, 3d, for the amount of specie actually paid in consequence of such notice, up to the latest date.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed with the general principle of the propriety of resuming cash payments; but stated, that they could not be resumed without, in the first instance, great confidence on the part of the public. When it was considered that the Bank had shewn so ready a disposition to anticipate the time appointed for resuming payments, and had called in some of their notes even 18 months beforehand, it would be unwise and operate to the prejudice of the public to shew, by too minute an investigation, a jealousy of their preparatory measures. If the circumstances of the country permitted, the Bank would resume their payments in specie, in July 1818. It was gratifying to see the favourable state of the exchanges, and the present price of bullion; and the House would entertain the most sanguine hope, when they recollected that bullion to the amount of two millions and a half, had been procured for the new coinage. He must, therefore, object to the motion, on the ground that the Bank was already doing all that had been asked of it.

The question was then put, and negatived without a division.

QUEEN'S BIRTH-DAY.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and after some observations by Mr. Brougham, Mr. Calcraft, and Mr. Curwen, on the inconvenience of delay, it was agreed that the House should adjourn over to-morrow, it being Her Majesty's Birthday.

MINORITY

ON MR. GRENFELL'S MOTION.

Banks, Henry	Martin, Henry
Babington, Thos.	Martin, John
Blair, J. H.	Monck, Sir C.
Browne, Dom.	Morland, J. B.
Bennet, Hon. H. G.	Moore, Peter
Brand, Hon. Thos.	Newman, R. W.
Carter, John	Ossulston, Lord
Caulfield, Hon. H.	Prittie, Hon. F. A.
Dickinson, William	Ponsonby, Rt. Hon. G.
Duncannon, Viscount	Rashleigh, William
Folkstone, Viscount	Romilly, Sir Samuel
Frankland, Robert	Russell, Lord William
Guise, Sir William	Scudamore, Robert
Halsey, Joseph	Smith, Robert
Jervoise, J. J.	Smith, William
Jones, John	Smyth, J. H.
Lamb, Hon. William	Tierney, Rt. Hon. G.
Lockhart, J. I.	Wilberforce, William
Marryat, Joseph	Webb, Edward
Mackintosh, Sir J.	Wynn, C. W.

TELLERS—Grenfell, Pascoe—Hamilton, Lord A.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, Feb. 21.

SECRET COMMITTEE.—LONDON UNION SOCIETY.] Earl Grosvenor said, he had a petition to present from the Secretary to the London Union Society, and he was the more anxious to call their lordships' attention to it, as he had been given to understand since he came into the House, that it was the intention of Ministers to propose the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. When the report of the Secret Committee had been first read at the table, he had contended that the evidence on which the Committee had founded their conclusions, ought to be laid before their lordships. He was now provided with a precedent—that of 1794, when a very strong report, and also the evidence, were produced. It had occurred to him, when he first heard the report read, that much of it consisted of inference from facts, rather than a statement of facts, and that it was therefore peculiarly desirable that their lordships should see the evidence. This feeling was considerably strengthened by the statements in this petition; which, if true, would not only throw considerable suspicion on the evidence from which the committee had drawn its conclusions, but shew that very great injury had been done to the petitioner, as well as to others. The petition was in these words:

"To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled.

"The Petition of Thomas Cleary, Secretary to the London Union Society.

"Humbly Sheweth, That it is with great reluctance, as well as humility, that your petitioner offers himself to the notice of, and prays for a hearing from your right hon. House; but that your petitioner, though a very humble individual, feels himself impelled by a sense of imperious duty, to beseech your right hon. House to pause, and to hear further evidence, before your right hon. House proceed to adopt legislative measures upon the report, now on the table of your right hon. House, from your late Secret Committee.

"Your petitioner begs permission humbly to state to your right hon. House, that he has read in the afore-mentioned Report of the Secret Committee of your lordships, the following passage, to wit:—

"Others of these Societies are called Union Clubs, professing the same object of Parliamentary Reform, but under these words, understanding Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments—projects which evidently involve not any qualified or partial change, but a total subversion of the British Constitution. It appears that there is a London Union Society, and branch Unions corresponding with it, and affiliated to it. Others of these Societies have adopted the name of Spencean Philanthropists; and it was by Members of a Club of this description, that the plans of the conspirators in London were discussed and prepared for execution."

"Your petitioner presumes not to oppose his opinions against those of a Committee of your right hon. House; but he hopes, that he may be humbly permitted to state, that when a Bill was brought before your right hon. House by the late Duke of Richmond, laying it down as a matter of principle, that Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage were the inherent and unalienable rights of Englishmen, the noble duke was not accused of a desire to produce 'a total subversion of the British Constitution.'

"It is not, however, on matters of opinion, but on matters of most important fact, that your petitioner humbly appeals to the candour, the wisdom, and the justice of your right hon. House, and on matters of fact too, with regard to which, your petitioner is able to submit to your right hon. House, the clearest and most indubitable testimony.

"Your petitioner's entire ignorance of the views of the Secret Committee of your right hon. House, as well as his profound respect and extreme deference for every thing done within the walls of your right hon. House, are more than sufficient to restrain your petitioner from attempting even to guess at the reasons for your Committee's having so closely connected the 'London Union Society' with the Societies of 'Spencean Philanthropists;' but your petitioner humbly begs leave to assure your that he is ready and able to prove at the Bar of your lordships, that there never has existed, between these Societies, the smallest connection of any sort, either in person or design, the object of the former being to obtain 'a Parliamentary Reform, according to the Constitution,' while that of the latter, as appears from the Report of your lordships' Committee, has been to obtain a common partnership in the land; and that, therefore, any evidence which may have been laid before the Secret Committee of your lordships, to establish this connection, is, as your petitioner is ready to prove at the Bar of your lordships, wholly destitute of truth.

"But the facts to which your petitioner most anxiously humbly to endeavour to obtain the patient attention of your right hon. House, relate to that affiliation and correspondence, which your lordships' Secret Committee have been pleased to impute to the London Union Society, by observing that "it appears that there is a London Union Society, and Branch Unions, corresponding with it, and affiliated to it;" a description which seems, in the humble conception of your petitioner, to resemble that which was given of the London Corresponding Society, in 1795, and which, as your petitioner humbly conceives, point to measures of a nature similar to those which were then adopted; and your petitioner, though with all humility, ventures to express his confidence, that the evidence which he doubts not has been produced to your lordships' Secret Committee, to justify this description, is wholly and entirely false, as your petitioner is ready to prove, in the most satisfactory manner, at the Bar of your right hon. House.

"Upon this important point your petitioner humbly begs leave to represent to your right hon. House, that the London Union Society was founded in 1813, by Mr. Edward Bolton Clive, Mr. Walter Fawkes, the late Colonel Bosville, Mr. Montague Burgoyne, the present Lord Mayor, Mr. Alderman Goodbehere, Mr. Francis Canning, Mr. William Hallet, Sir Francis Burdett, Major Cartwright, Mr. Robert Slade, Mr. Timothy Brown, Mr. J. J. Clark, and several other individuals equally respectable; that it continued to hold meetings but a very short time; that it never did any act except the publishing of one address to the nation on the subject of Reform; that it never had any one "Branch;" that it never held any Correspondence either written or verbal with any Society of any sort; that it never was affiliated to any society, or branch, or any body of men whatsoever; finally, that it has not even met for nearly three years and a half last past; and, of course, that it is not now in existence.

"What, then, must have been the surprise and the pain of your humble petitioner, when he saw, in the Report of your lordships' Secret Committee, this London Union Society represented, not only as being still in existence, but busily and extensively at work, establishing branches and affiliations, carrying on an active correspondence, infusing life into Societies of Spencean Philanthropists, and producing, by these means, plans of Conspiracy, Revolution, and Treason! And, though your petitioner is too well assured of the upright views, and of the justice of every committee consisting of members of your noble and right hon. House, not to be convinced that very strong evidence in support of these charges must have been produced to your lordships' Secret Committee, your petitioner cannot, nevertheless, refrain from expressing most humbly his deep regret, that your lordships' Committee should not have deigned to send for the books and other testimonials of the character and proceedings of the London Union Society; and your petitioner humbly begs leave to observe, that this omission appears singularly unfortunate for the London Union Society, seeing that the Secret Committee of your lordships appear, in another part of their Report, to lament the want of means of obtaining the written proceedings of Societies, and seeing that it was natural to expect, that a Society having Branches, an Affiliation and an active Correspondence, had also a copious collection of written documents.

"Your petitioner is aware, that he has trespassed too long on the patience of your lordships; but, well knowing that your lordships seek only for truth as the basis of your proceedings, he humbly hopes that you will be pleased to excuse the earnestness of his present representation, and he also presumes humbly to express his hope, that your lordships will be pleased, in your great tenderness for the character and liberties of his Majesty's faithful subjects, to consider whether it be not possible that your Secret Committee may have been misled, by what they may have deemed good evidence, as to other parts of their recent Report: and, at the least, your petitioner humbly prays that your lordships will, in your great condescension, be pleased to permit your petitioner to produce all the Books and Papers of the London Union Society, at the Bar of your right hon. House, where your petitioner confidently assures your lordships, that he is ready to prove all and singular the allegations, contained in this his most humble petition.

"And your petitioner will ever pray.

"THOMAS CLEARY."

From this petition their lordships would perceive, that their Committee might have been misled by false evidence. (Here the Duke of Athol called to order.) He had only said that the committee might have been misled by false evidence. Under these circumstances, then, and entertaining a constitutional jealousy of the Ministers of the Crown at all times, but more particularly under the present circumstances, when it was in contemplation to propose the adoption of a measure which would leave the liberties of the country at the mercy of these Ministers—of Mr. Canning, Mr. Bragg Bathurst, Lord Castlereagh—(Here the Duke of Athol again called to order. The noble earl had no right to impute motives to any individual; and it was especially disorderly to impute motives to so large a body of their lordships as sat on that side of the House.)

The Lord Chancellor said, that, if their lordships permitted anything so disorderly to proceed, he would not sit ten minutes on the woolsack to hear it.

Earl Grosvenor said, he had not imputed improper motives to any one. He had only stated, that he was informed it was in contemplation to pass an act which would throw the liberties of the subject into the hands of the Ministers of the Crown; and until he was convinced that what he said was disorderly, he should, with their lordships' permission, continue his observations.

Lord Rolle rose to order; and asked, whether it was fair or orderly to introduce into the discussions in their lordships' house the names of members of the other house.

Earl Grey.—It appeared to him, that those who now stood forward in support of the orders of the House were themselves the violators. What his noble friend had said contrary to order, he had yet to learn. He did not hear him impute improper motives to any man. What he understood him to say, and which he was ready to repeat after him, was this—that the effect of the measure now in contemplation would be to leave the liberties of the country at the mercy of the Ministers of the Crown. Then his noble friend had named certain members of the other House—whether discreetly or not was for his own consideration; but he believed his assertion was well founded, when he said that it was not contrary to order to name in that House members of the other House. It appeared to him, therefore, that his noble friend had been most improperly interrupted, and chiefly by the noble lord on the woolsack, whose duty it particularly was to take care that the orders of the House should be attended to. When a noble lord was called to order, then, before any other noble lord spoke, the noble lord so called to order ought, without interruption, to be allowed to give such explanation to the House as he thought proper. This much in vindication of his noble friend, who did not go beyond the truth, when he said that the effect of the measure now in contemplation would be to surrender the liberties of the country to the Ministers of the Crown.

The Lord Chancellor said, a more disorderly proceeding than this he had never witnessed. He denied that he was particularly called upon to take care that the orders of the House should be attended to; although he admitted that such was his duty equally with that of any other noble lord in the House. The noble lord had stated, that it was in contemplation to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. Had anything been as yet said about the suspension of that act? If the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons had been brought up and laid on their lordships' table, then the noble lord might have referred to the proceedings, and mentioned the names of members of the other House; but no communication of the Commons' Report had been made to them, and they knew nothing whatever of it; therefore it was disorderly to refer to it. With respect to the Report of their lordships' Committee, it had been ordered to be printed for the use of the members of the House only; and the petitioner could regularly know nothing of it. In his anxiety to see the orders of the House enforced, he might perhaps go too far; but he had conceived that he was perfectly right in calling the noble earl to order; and if he was wrong, he was so far wrong that he wished the House to say whether he was right or wrong, that he might know his situation.

Lord Holland.—The speech of the noble lord who had just sat down, made in support of the orders of the House, was itself eminently disorderly. When any noble lord was called to order, the usage was, that no other noble lord should speak till that noble lord had an opportunity of giving the proper explanation; but, instead of arguing that point, the noble lord proceeded to charge his noble friend with being disorderly for having brought up the petition, and read it to their lordships in the present state of their proceedings. But if it was disorderly to have introduced the petition at all, then, if they meant to insist upon that point of order, his noble friend ought to have been interrupted before he stated the petition; but after that had been suffered to pass, it ought not to be made a ground of interruption, with reference to an entirely distinct point; for nothing could be more disorderly than, in rising to order on one point, to proceed to argue on another point, with respect to which there had been no call to order. Now, whether the noble lord was in a particular manner bound to take care that the orders of the House should be enforced, or was in that respect merely on a footing with the other peers, this was clear—that, his noble friend having been called to order, he ought to have been heard in explanation without interruption; but yet his noble friend had been interrupted in a manner which had prolonged a most disorderly conversation.

The Earl of Liverpool conceived the noble earl to have been very disorderly. All that the noble earl knew was, that the Secret Committee had made a Report, which was read in that House, which was ordered to be printed for the use of the members of that House, and which was to be taken this night into consideration; and yet the noble earl had cast an imputation on the Ministers of the Crown, on a ground of which he could regularly know nothing. For the sake of convenience, measures intended to be proposed to Parliament were sometimes previously communicated to individuals in conversation and otherwise; and in ordinary cases he would not have objected to an allusion to such projected measures. But if the noble earl had experienced the indulgence of the House, he had made a most unjustifiable use of that indulgence, in throwing out imputations against the Ministers of the Crown, and even casting a personal odium upon certain members of the executive Government, to whom the exercise of the powers which it might be necessary to concede, would not immediately and directly be-

1 Grosvenor.—He should be very sorry to prolong this conversation more than was absolutely necessary for his own vindication: but if the noble earl (Liverpool) thought that he was out of order in referring to measures not yet proposed, the noble earl ought to have interrupted him, and to have objected to it at the time. The noble earl had thought it invidious in him to have named certain members of the Executive Government in the other House of Parliament: but he had named them merely as members of the Executive Government, and would have had no objection so to name the noble earl, or any other member of the Executive Government in their lordships' House, had it not been, that to name them would have been disorderly. The noble lord on the woolsack had conceived, that he (Earl Grosvenor) had alluded to the Report of the Secret Committee of the House of Commons; but the noble lord was mistaken, for he had made no allusion to that Report, of which certainly their lordships could as yet regularly know nothing. It was also true, that the public could not regularly know any thing of the Report of their lordships' Committee. But the fact was, that the proceedings of that House did find their way into the public prints; and their proceedings on a subject in which the liberty, property, and even the lives of his Majesty's subjects were so much concerned, must excite peculiar attention, and even create an unusual agitation in the public mind. If that must be the effect on the public in general, how much more must their proceedings on this subject excite the attention and agitate the minds of those who were most likely to be the victims of harsh measures, if any such should be adopted; and he put it to the candour and justice of the House, whether it would not be hard upon this individual, if their lordships, without further information, without any evidence at all before them, were to adopt measures which, with reference to him, might be of serious import? He put it to their lordships, whether it would not be highly just and proper to hear the evidence now tendered to them, before they came to a decision on a question of this magnitude? This was the ground on which he brought up this petition. He was far from saying that some measures, that some strong measures, might not be necessary; but their lordships ought to have evidence before them to justify the adoption of such measures. He trusted, therefore, that their lordships would not only allow this petition to be laid on the table, but that they would call for the evidence given before the Committee, and also hear the evidence which this petitioner offered to produce at their bar.—He moved that the petition be read; and it being read by the clerk,

The Lord Chancellor rose to object to its being received. Was it to be endured that, because a Report had been made by a Committee of their lordships' House, and because that Report had been ordered to be printed for the use of the members of that House, a petition should be admitted, stating part of the contents of the Report, of which the public could as yet regularly know nothing, and that this petition should be presented by a noble earl, a member of their lordships' House? Were they to go farther, and suffer the proceedings of the Commons to be observed upon, before any communication of these proceedings was made to their lordships' House? If it was their lordships' pleasure that their orders should be so far dispensed with, he must yield to the opinion of the majority; but having, during the course of a long life, strenuously stood forward in support of the laws, and of the constitution as he understood it, he could not now permit the violation of their lordships' orders, unless compelled to do so by the majority. But if their lordships would receive this petition, in violation of the orders of the House, he should feel it his duty to enter his protest against that decision.

Earl Grey agreed that it was of very great importance that the orders of the House should be carried into effect; and though the noble lord had promised to stand alone in the breach, in case no other would assist him, he did not think that the noble lord would be called upon to practise that self-devotion. As at present advised, he could not agree that it would be inconsistent with the orders of the House to receive this petition. What was the noble lord's statement? He said, that as the Report was ordered to be printed only for the use of the members of that House, it could not have come regularly to the knowledge of the petitioner, and that his complaint could not, therefore, at present be regularly heard, however much he might be aggrieved. True, the proceedings of that House could not regularly be sent abroad and brought before the public; but if their lordships intended to enforce their orders so very strictly, they ought to begin by preventing the publication of their proceedings, so rigidly and uniformly, that no individual could be injured by the breach of their orders; for if their lordships' proceedings did find their way into the public prints, and happened to convey a charge of the most serious import against an individual, with all the weight and authority which belonged to their lordships' House, they could not in justice refuse to hear that individual in his defence. The petitioner stated, that the Report of the Committee, proceeding upon false evidence, conveyed an unjust and unfounded charge against him; and would the noble lord, who had been so long engaged in support of the laws, and of the constitution according to that noble lord's understanding of it—an understanding of it, by the bye, in many important points very different from his (Earl Grey's,) would the noble lord say, that the petitioner could have prosecuted the publishers of the Report for a libel? The noble lord would not say so; for he (Earl Grey) was aware of a precedent where it had been held, that such a prosecution could not be maintained. A report had been made in 1795 by a committee of the other House, reflecting upon the late Mr. Horne Tooke; and this report was published by an individual. Mr. H. Tooke took the proper legal steps to obtain redress; and Lord Kenyon had declared, that the Court of King's Bench could not bring into question the proceedings of Parliament. He (Earl Grey) himself heard Lord Kenyon say so; and heard him likewise observe, with that felicity of quotation for which he was so remarkable, that if it were to be endured, that the proceedings of Parliament should be questioned in the Court of King's Bench, then "chaos was come again!" The report charged the Union Society with the crime of being engaged in a traitorous conspiracy, and that there were many ramifications of this central society engaged in the same design. The petition stated, that there was no foundation whatever for this allegation; that this society had no ramifications; and that it had not met for more than three years past: and the petitioner offered to produce the books and papers of the Union Society at the bar, and to prove the allegations in the petition by evidence, which the Committee might have called for, but did not. In point of justice, therefore, to the individual, and he hoped their lordships' orders were not inconsistent with justice, the petitioner ought to be heard before their lordships adopted any measures on this Report. He was happy to find that the noble earl, the chief Minister of the Crown, considered it as a serious and unmerited imputation on him, that he should have had it in contemplation to propose a measure of so enormously dangerous a nature (hear, hear) as that which had been mentioned; a measure which ought never to be adopted, except in cases of the clearest and paramount necessity. He was glad that the noble earl had felt himself warranted in repelling with indignation (hear, hear) an imputation which he appeared to consider as entirely unmerited: but, at all events, it was their lordships' duty, in justice to the people, in justice to the Sovereign, to whom they were bound to give their best advice—it was their duty to satisfy themselves, that the occasion was such as to demand whatever measures they might be called upon to adopt. It was their duty to satisfy themselves whether the Committee had or had not been misled by false evidence: and he trusted the noble duke (Duke of Athol) on the other side would not insist that he (Earl Grey) was out of order when he said that human minds were fallible. (Hear, hear, hear.) Even though there should be some objection, in point of form, to the receiving of this petition, yet when the fact was, that the Report had been published, and when the petitioner alleged that there was a passage in that Report reflecting upon him, which passage their lordships, on inspection, found to be contained in that Report, on what principle of justice could they refuse to hear the petitioner in his defence? If the House were on this ground to refuse the petition, on what subject could petitions be received? (Hear.) The public could regularly know nothing of a bill while in progress: many of the bills were indeed printed, but printed only for the use of the members of that House, and many of them were not printed at all; and on what principle could those interested in bills, petition against them during their progress, if this petition were to be refused on this ground. Suppose a bill were brought in for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, upon the principle now contended for, the people would have no opportunity of petitioning against it. The noble earl had indeed considered it a grievous imputation upon him and his colleagues, when it was said that they had such a measure in contemplation; but then it might happen that a proposition would at some time be made to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and were the people to be deprived of the opportunity of petitioning against it? The doctrine surely could not be maintained, that the rules and orders of their lordships' House were inconsistent with justice; and, therefore, their lordships could not refuse to receive this petition, and to hear the evidence which the petitioner tendered for his own vindication from this heavy charge which had been made against him.

The Earl of Harrowby would merely observe, that it was the duty of their lordships to enforce the observance of their own orders, whenever they were called upon so to do. It was true, that speeches and proceedings of that House, the publication of which was an infringement of their lordships' orders, came to the knowledge of the public, and petitions, it was possible, might be founded on such proceedings; but then their lordships' attention was not called to the circumstance. If the present petition were received, what objection could be made to the receiving of others of an equally irregular nature? Every proceeding in that House, of which persons out of doors, according to their rules, could know nothing, might be petitioned against. Their table might be loaded with petitions from every Union Club, and every Hampden Club in the kingdom, against statements in a Report of which the parties had no right to know anything. It was doubtless their duty to receive every petition which was expressed in proper and decorous terms, and which was in no way inconsistent with the orders made for the regulation of their proceedings; but it was equally their duty to reject a petition which shewed on the face of it, that the facts to which it referred could not come to the knowledge of the petitioner without a violation of their lordships' privileges.

Lord Holland had not heard one word which could be regarded as a sufficient reason for rejecting the petition. Did their lordships not sometimes print bills? and did they not even pass bills which had never been printed? A bill was as much a secret proceeding as the Report in question had been. He should be glad if the noble lord would shew what was the difference between a bill and any other proceeding; and explain on what ground petitions were to be received on bills, and rejected on reports. He had even known petitions to be presented against other petitions before their lordships, when the parties had no better knowledge of the proceedings which had taken place than the present petitioner had of the Report. He did not say that this petition ought to be received, if it was of a description which their lordships generally rejected, or if it was excluded by any usually enforced rule; but he could see no good reason for making a new rule for its exclusion, or enforcing against it any rule usually relaxed in other cases. It was true, it was a breach of privilege to publish the proceedings of that House; but when these proceedings did come to the knowledge of the public, it was no breach of privilege to found petitions on them. It was no breach of privilege for a petitioner to state to Parliament circumstances which had taken place in Parliament. The decision on Mr. Horne Tooke's case strongly enforced the propriety of receiving the present petition: because, if an aggrieved individual had no redress against the publishing of parliamentary reports injurious to his character, it followed that he could obtain redress no where but from Parliament: but how was he to seek redress, if a rule of their lordships' House excluded them from the right of making any application. On these grounds, he, for one, should vote for receiving the petition his noble friend had brought under the notice of the House.

Earl Grosvenor had now to propose, that the petition be laid on the table. From what had been said in the debate, the question which their lordships seemed called upon to decide was, whether there was any thing in the state of public affairs which ought to induce them to adopt an unusual course with respect to petitions? If there was any thing in the state of the times which might cause a difference, it was, in his opinion, precisely of that kind which ought to induce their lordships to throw their doors wide open to the complaints of the people, and of course readily receive such a petition as this.

The Earl of Lauderdale conceived that there was no parliamentary proceeding on which it was not competent for the subject to petition. It was well known that petitions taking notice of other petitions often lay on their lordships' table. He recollected a proceeding of Parliament of a very remarkable kind; namely, the commercial propositions relative to Ireland, which gave rise to many petitions. Those propositions were printed and circulated through the country, and he never recollected any occasion on which the petitions presented to Parliament were more numerous. In short, he could perceive no ground, either of reason or precedent, on which the present petition could be rejected.

The Duke of Athol thought the point of order a sufficient reason for rejecting the petition; but he would also oppose its being laid on the table on the ground of the impropriety of its language, which he considered in several parts very objectionable.—The noble duke laid particular stress on the expression, that the evidence on which the statement in the report relative to the Union Society was founded was wholly and entirely false.

Lord Erskine wished to ask their lordships, if this present petition was rejected, on what ground any other could afterwards be received? He had presented a petition from the city of Glasgow, signed by 25,000 persons, and he found in the Report a very serious charge against all the individuals who had signed that petition, for it prayed for annual parliaments and universal suffrage. No man was more decidedly inimical to annual parliaments and universal suffrage than he was; but was he to say, that the persons who signed that petition, finding themselves referred to in the Report of their lordships' Committee, had not a right to apply to that House on the subject, if they considered themselves aggrieved? If this petition was inadmissible, no other remonstrance could be received. He well remembered the case of Mr. Horne Tooke, which had been alluded to. In that case it was contended in the court, that the whole public had a right to have a knowledge of such a proceeding as the secret report of a committee of either House of Parliament. If the petition had been conceived in disrespectful language, that would be a justifiable reason for its rejection; but he did not consider the passage pointed out by the noble duke capable of the construction he had put upon it. The petition complained of a grievance, and the language necessary clearly to describe that grievance was employed; but there appeared no intention on the part of the petitioner to say any thing disrespectful of the House, or to express himself in a manner which could give any ground for the rejection of his application for redress.

The Earl of Darnley was perfectly satisfied that nothing disrespectful could be fairly attributed to the language of the petition. The passage which the noble duke had referred to, as warranting such an opinion, amounted only to this—that the members of the committee had, as fallible individuals, been imposed upon by false evidence. As the Report contained charges of treason against various descriptions of persons, it was a very extraordinary doctrine to say; that it was not competent for an individual, who considered himself falsely accused, to come to their lordships' bar, and say he was not guilty of the conduct attributed to him; especially as the charges against him were to be made the foundation of measures which might affect his liberty or his life.

The Duke of Athol, in explanation, re-quoted the expression in the petition which he had considered as disrespectful.

Earl Grey.—The petitioner states, that he has been misrepresented by false evidence, and that he is ready to prove this at the bar. In what other language could he state this than that which he had employed, and in which he declared that the charge was false and unfounded? How could it be asserted that this language was disrespectful to their lordships? Considering the business as of the greatest importance, he was anxious to suggest a mode of getting over the difficulty which had occurred. He would, therefore, propose to move as an amendment, that this debate be adjourned for a short time, in order that the matter may be referred to a committee of privileges, with instructions to search for precedents, and to report whether there was any instance of a petition similar to the present being rejected on the ground of reference to proceedings of that House, of which the petitioner ought to have no knowledge. With this view, he moved that the debate be adjourned until Friday next.

The Earl of Liverpool saw no ground for any inquiry of the kind. Not a word had been said to shew that the petition ought now to be received, or that any similar petition had ever been admitted to their lordships' table. It advanced assertions which the individual from whom it came had no means of proving. It inferred that certain measures were to be adopted of which he could know nothing. It had been said by the noble lords on the other side, that petitions against bills were equally objectionable; but this was not the fact, as the usage of parliament had decided the question with respect to the right of petitioning against them. With respect to the Irish propositions, they afforded as little authority for the opinion which had been maintained. These propositions involved measures affecting the interests of great bodies of people; and they were printed for the purpose of giving the persons interested an opportunity of considering them, and petitioning against them, if they should think fit. On comparing the statements of the present petition and the prayer, it appeared that the inducement of the individual to come forward, was a desire that he might be heard, in order to prevent the adoption of measures similar to those of 1795, which he conceived the legislature had in view. (Hear, hear.) Whether such measures are to be proposed or not it is impossible for him to know; and to what a state would their lordships be reduced, were they to permit individuals to come forward with petitions, not merely against measures before the House, but against measures which the petitioners apprehend might be introduced? Every individual in the country who apprehended that any measure affecting himself, or the public in general, might at some time or another be introduced into that House, would have the right of appearing at the bar with his petition. The noble earl had not been able to refer to any instance of a similar petition being received; and he considered that a sufficient reason for rejecting it, as well as for not acceding to the proposed adjournment.

Lord Holland contended, that the noble earl (Liverpool) entirely failed in supporting the distinction that he had attempted to draw between the present case and that of the precedent of the Irish propositions. All former reports of the committee were not, according to the forms of Parliament, promulgated; they were as much secret as the present Report, to which the petitioner had adverted. Yet the table of that House was loaded with petitions. The noble duke (Athol) had taken another and a better ground for rejection—did the fact correspond with the objection? The present petition was, however, in no way, in his opinion, objectionable as to the language in which it was couched. There were, as he understood, but two grounds on which the petitions of the subject could be refused. Either when what was asked was out of the cognizance of the House to grant, or when it was stated in disrespectful language. Neither of these objections could be arrayed against the petitioner, and in every view of the subject he must say, that the House would evince a great appetite for the refusal of petitions, should it reject the present, without in the least investigating those precedents, on which very precedents those who opposed its reception, ventured to ground their hostility. (Hear, hear.)

Earl Fitzwilliam.—As I had the honour of being a member of that Committee of Secrecy, whose Report has been presented to this House, I feel solicitous to give my opinion on the subject of this petition. To that Report I assented, from the nature of the evidence that was before the Committee. That evidence has been contradicted by the petition, both in point of fact and time; and therefore I would be exceedingly sorry that a petition containing such allegations should not be received. At all events, I feel it a duty most seriously to press upon the consideration of the House the propriety of adopting the amendment of my noble friend.

The House divided on the amendment, when the numbers were—Contents 18—Not Contents 64—Majority against the Amendment 46.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Holland presented a petition from Paisley, signed by several thousand inhabitants, praying for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage. His lordship declared his unqualified disapprobation of Universal Suffrage, but stated in justice to the petitioners, that the language was respectful to the House, the petition very numerously signed, and the quarter of the empire from which it came, precisely that which had most reason both in theory and practice to lament the inequality of representation.—Ordered to lie on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] Lord Sidmouth stated that he was prepared, on coming down to the House that day, to have gone fully into the subject itself, and to have communicated the grounds on which his Majesty's government felt it imperative to recommend the measure now about to be submitted to the consideration of their lordships. From the wish expressed by a number of the members of that House, he was willing to defer the discussion on the bill he then held in his hand until the second reading, which he should fix for Monday, at the same time communicating his intention of forwarding it through its various stages on that night. He then moved that "A bill to enable his Majesty to secure and detain in custody such persons as his Majesty shall suspect of treasonable intentions against his Majesty's person and government," should be read a first time.

Lord Holland begged it might be clearly understood, that his consent to the present proposition by no means precluded him from opposing the bill. He hoped that the noble lord would, when he moved the second reading, enter fully into the grounds on which he proposed so extraordinary and important a measure. If it should still be determined not to lay the evidence on which the Committee had founded their Report before the House, it might at least be expected that Ministers would consent to lay before their lordships the dates of the transactions referred to in the Report, and also the dates of the information relating thereto which had at different times been received by his Majesty's Government.

The bill was then read a first time and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

LIST OF THE MINORITY

ON THE QUESTION OF REJECTING THE PETITION PRESENTED BY LORD GROSVENOR.

Duke of Sussex	Earl Lauderdale
Duke of Somerset	Earl Rosslyn
Marquis of Wellesey	Visct. Torrington
Earl Darnley	Lord Auckland
Earl Derby	Lord Feskine
Earl Essex	Lord Foley
Earl Fitzwilliam	Lord Holland
Earl Grey	Lord Say and Sele
Earl Grosvenor	Lord St. John.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Feb. 21.

ROCHESTER ELECTION.] Mr. W. Byng appeared with the report of the event of the ballot on the Rochester election. The members chosen were, Sir T. Baring, Sir C. Hunt, Sir N. Colthurst, Messrs. Lee, Law, Wyatt, Robinson, Lester Lester, Rashleigh, Long, Macdonald, Williams, Bolland, Terry, Wright.

WINDOW TAX.] Sir J. Shaw presented a petition from certain merchants and traders in London, complaining of the oppressive tendency of the assessed taxes, in respect of their shops and warehouses, which had been rated to the house tax. Application had been made to the Treasury, and relief promised; but not afforded. The Tax-office had made a new reading of the act, imposing the duty at a time when the foreign markets were glutted with goods, and of course they were incapable of paying any new tax.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was disposed to do justice between all parties, and therefore the matter should be investigated without delay.

The petition was laid on the table.

ABUSES OF MAGISTRATES IN LICENSING PUBLIC-HOUSES.] Sir S. Romilly presented a petition from the inhabitants of the district in the vicinity of White-Horse-lane, complaining of the conduct of magistrates in licensing public-houses. All he should ask at present would be, for the petition to lie on the table. If his hon. friend, (Mr. Bennet,) who moved for a committee last session on the subject of the police, should propose the renewal of that committee, the present petition might be referred to it; if he did not come forward, he (Sir S.) should himself propose a committee on the question. The petition complained of the injustice of the magistrates in refusing to license a house in that district, which was very much wanted: the house, too, was one of a very superior description. Taking the circumstance by itself, perhaps there was little to complain of, that the magistrates, in the exercise of the very great discretion that was reposed in them, should refuse to license a particular house; but in the very same district the same magistrates had licensed houses of the most notoriously objectionable description. This subject was intimately connected with the state of the police, and the conduct of the magistrates mainly affected the state of the criminal poor, if he might use the expression. In the district from whence the petition came, the number of public-houses was so great, that in Shadwell every 12th house was a public-house; in Gravel-lane, every 8th house; in Norton-falgate there was a public-house for every 73 inhabitants; and these houses were principally of the lowest and most infamous description, the common resort of thieves and prostitutes. It had been imputed to some of the witnesses before the committee, that they had acted from pique; but he would rely on the statement made by Mr. Giffard in his account of the police of that district, that the conduct of the magistrates was so grossly unjust, they were so inattentive to the complaints that were made, and the complaints were entirely fruitless, that he (Mr. Giffard) had stayed away from the meetings altogether. The evidence of Mr. Markland was to the same effect. The learned gentleman then proceeded to read part of Mr. Giffard's evidence. To the question, whether a formal complaint proved against a house before the magistrates was sufficient to cause a refusal of the licence to that house, he answered, no: he had himself reported most disorderly house, and yet a licence had been granted, as if no such report had been made. Houses of this description were termed flash-houses, and were the refuge of thieves and prostitutes of the lowest description. He thought them a great cause of the depravity of moral in the metropolis. His reasons for not attending the meetings of the magistrates were, that no complaints were ever attended to. Some of the magistrates were brewers themselves, others were owners of public-houses, others had relations who were brewers or owners. One of the magistrates who granted licenses in that district was the proprietor of 12 public-houses and receiver of the rents of 10 others; he was more or less interested in 22. He (Sir S.) would not take up the time of the House any longer, to shew in what manner these licences were granted; he would only add, that one man had obtained his licence after six different convictions! (hear, hear). He should not mention names at present, because he thought the circumstances should be more fully inquired into. In one part of the report, it appeared that one of the magistrates had complained of his inability to remedy any disorders in the neighbourhood of Charing-cross, the power of licensing houses in that vicinity being in the Board of Green Cloth: that representations and complaints had been made by the magistrates themselves; but that the Board of Green Cloth had continued to license the houses in spite of all remonstrances. There was much disorder in the neighbourhood of Charing-cross, which could not be put down by the magistrates owing to the jurisdiction of the Board of Green Cloth. He could not omit this opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the enormous increase of crimes committed by children; and he wished also to say something on the rewards that were given to persons who apprehended offenders. In the police report it appeared, the magistrates had all been examined touching the propriety of these rewards offered by statute on the conviction of criminals; and there was not one of them who did not declare, that no officer of justice was ever influenced by those rewards in the testimony he might have to give; they only thought they might be improper, because they raised up a sort of discredit against the witness: nay, so delighted was the Recorder with this system of pecuniary rewards for the detection of crime, that he wished them by all means to be extended. Now, after all, the report was scarcely printed, before a combination came out, the most extensive and atrocious that had ever been devised for entrapping innocent men into crimes and depriving them of their lives for the sake of the reward. It appeared that 16*l.* was the whole amount of the reward for which three lives were to be sacrificed! (Hear, hear.) He only mentioned this to shew how far things had gone before the mischief was even known or suspected: he thought it desirable that the committee should be renewed as soon as possible, and he was anxious to know if any measures were in contemplation.

The petition was then read, and another from the village of Haggerstone, in the parish of Shoreditch, complaining of similar grievances. In the last instance a public-house had been refused to a new village of 200 houses, while there was no public-house within half a mile.

Mr. B. Bathurst said, that the different cases had been submitted to the Lord Chancellor, who did not think himself justified in applying that discretionary power which was vested in him, but had directed that the opinions of the Attorney and Solicitor-General should be taken with regard to the propriety of instituting a prosecution. These law officers had not discovered sufficient grounds for recommending such a measure; but he could assure the House that his noble friend and relation (Lord Sidmouth) had done every thing in his power to attain the ends of justice. He knew that he was animated by an earnest desire to effect some improvement, and that he felt it to be not so much a question of property to individuals, as one affecting the discharge of a very important trust on the part of magistrates, and a trust which appeared, in some instances, to have been abused. He believed it likewise to be the opinion of his noble relative, that at all events some new legislative provision was necessary. (Hear.)

Mr. B. B. animadverted in pointed terms on the misconduct of Mr. Mercer, one of the magistrates in the district alluded to. Even since the report of the committee had been published, no reform had taken place, although several magistrates had been charged with a most corrupt exercise of power. One public-house in particular had been again licensed, in defiance of the censures of the committee, the disapprobation of the churchwardens, and the complaints of many respectable inhabitants, as well as the open opposition of Mr. Markland, the police magistrate. The majority of these trading justices, worse by far than the trading justices of old, deliberately sanctioned the existence of houses which were the known receptacles of thieves and prostitutes, in which young persons were initiated in every species of debauchery, and in every species of crime. All this immorality was encouraged and promoted merely because the keepers of these houses were playing into the hands of certain proprietors, who at the same time discharged the functions of justices of the peace. He must declare it to be his opinion, that the Lord Chancellor had not done his duty in suffering, after five years of mal-practices, a guilty and shuffling individual (Mr. Merceron) to remain any longer in the commission.

The Attorney-General asked, whether it would be becoming in the Chancellor to act against any magistrate before his conviction? His lordship, however, had directed the opinions of himself and the Solicitor-General to be taken, with regard to the propriety of filing a criminal information. It was competent to any person complaining of injustice or misconduct in magistrates, either for granting or refusing licences, to apply to the Court of King's Bench for a criminal information; but the law-officers of the Crown had no means of putting themselves in motion until they were perfectly satisfied of the weight and inconvertibility of the evidence upon which they were to proceed. It was their business, when they filed informations, not to do it by an application upon an ex parte statement, but to do it of their own authority. Such a proceeding, in the present case, would have been to arrest the inquiries of a parliamentary committee, and to anticipate an order to prosecute, which it was possible the House might subsequently vote. With respect to another subject referred to by his hon. and learned friend, that of statutable rewards, he begged leave to assure him, that it had been long under the consideration of Government, and that the noble Secretary for the Home Department had at present some measure in contemplation to submit to Parliament.

Mr. Brougham desired to know whether the rule which the Lord Chancellor prescribed to himself was, never to recommend the omission or striking out of a name in a commission of the peace, unless the party had been guilty of some offence.

The Attorney-General could not describe the rule upon which the Lord Chancellor acted on all occasions, although he was sure that it was from the most conscientious motives.

Mr. Brougham understood the hon. and learned gentleman to have stated, that the Lord Chancellor had not struck out the name of Mr. Merceron from the list of magistrates, because he had not hitherto been legally convicted of any offence. He regretted that his lordship had omitted to strike out the name of that individual, and also, that the chairman of the committee had not deemed it necessary to report that person to the House. He perfectly agreed with the observations on the purity of the Lord Chancellor's motives; but was sorry, that under the circumstances of this case, he had not thought the same sort of interposition necessary, which he had on one occasion exercised in the county of Durham, in which he had, of his own authority, put an individual on his defence.—The Petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Bennet presented a petition, signed by 230 persons, inhabitants of the town of Brent-ford, praying relief in the case of a publican named Joseph Harding, who lately kept the Castle public-house, and had been, in the opinion of the petitioners, unjustly deprived of a licence by the magistrates of that division. The consequence had been, that he was reduced to a state of great distress, and he must have gone, with his family, to the workhouse, had it not been for the benevolent exertions of his friends and neighbours.

Mr. Bathurst suggested, that the case in question was more fit for the consideration of the Court of King's Bench, than of that House.

Colonel Wood bore testimony to the independent character of the magistrates for the division alluded to. No set of men could be more free from any bias which was likely to mislead them into acts of partiality or oppression.

Mr. H. Sumner observed, that the characters of magistrates had not a fair chance in that House. In the Court of King's Bench, where the regular jurisdiction was vested, they could meet their accusers on equal terms. If petitions like that which was now presented were to be received, he should feel it his duty to desire the Lord Chancellor to strike his name out of the commission.

Mr. Butterworth expressed his belief, that most of the imputations on the character of Mr. Merceron might be explained away. That gentleman was of an irritable disposition, and might have been betrayed into some error and intemperance.

Mr. Bennet declared, that instead of remarking any peculiar irritability in the character of that individual, he had been found to utter the most cool and deliberate falsehoods; and although his mind appeared to be in a perpetual state of invention, so little was the consistency of his representations, that the falsehood of one minute was sure to be contradicted by the falsehood of the next.

Mr. Brougham referred to the declaration of the hon. member for Surrey, which he hoped was hasty and unguarded; and that it was not his serious intention to press the rejection of this petition, signed as it was by so many respectable individuals. He conceived that it was impossible to reject it, consistently with the ordinary usages of the House on questions of this nature. A line of demarcation undoubtedly ought to be drawn between petitions preferring complaints that ought to be referred to courts of law, and those which prayed for a redress not to be had in those courts. There was not, however, in the present case, any ground for saying, that for the purposes of the petitioners, any application to another quarter would be available.

The Attorney-General wished to ask what practical interference on behalf of the petitioners the House could possibly adopt? All that was complained of was, that there were worse houses than that kept by this publican; and that the petitioners were of opinion, that the magistrates ought to have granted him a licence.

Mr. H. Sumner said he was not disposed to recede from his objection. The petitioners most probably knew nothing of the circumstances upon which the magistrates had proceeded. (Cries of spoke, spoke.)

The Speaker observed, that the hon. gentleman was certainly overstepping the limits of Parliamentary order.

Mr. Brougham requested that the Speaker would have the goodness to state, whether a petition praying for relief, generally could, according to the rules and practice of that House, be rejected?

The Speaker—"Not on any such ground certainly. It will be for the House to judge for itself, whether any petition presented to it, does or does not pray for relief generally."

The petition was then ordered to lie on the Table.

PRISONERS IN NEWGATE.] Mr. Bennet called the attention of the House to the number of prisoners now under sentence of death in Newgate, whose cases had not yet been reported to the Prince Regent. This number was set forth in a return presented to the House on Wednesday last. There were five who received sentence of death in July last, and four in September, whose cases had been reserved for the opinion of the Judges. He could wish to know whether, in these instances, the delay was imputable to them. There were 29 persons in the same awful situation, on whom judgment had been passed in October last; 29 also in December, 21 in January, and 12 more had been since added to the number. At 4 o'clock yesterday, when he visited that prison, the whole number of individuals in that dreadful situation was not less than 100. He wished the House could have been a witness to the scene which was there exhibited, to the deep despair of some, the impiety of others, and to the senseless and half-intoxicated state into which a third class appeared to be plunged. He was informed, by persons familiar with such scenes, that this was generally the character of them; and such, he was sorry to say it, was the shameless manner of administering the laws, that these unhappy offenders rejoiced when the certainty of execution was made known to them, because it was a relief from that state of cruel and horrid suspense in which they were before situated. He trusted the noble lord had a satisfactory explanation to give upon this subject, for he could assure him, from a very extensive correspondence, that the country expected it, and considered the evil he had alluded to as the greatest blot on the administration of justice.

Lord Castlereagh understood that the delay in the earlier cases, had arisen from a necessary investigation into their circumstances. With regard to the later cases, a council would have been already called on the subject, had not a very important inquiry intervened, and caused an unavoidable postponement of that consideration. The council would, however, be held tomorrow, and he entirely concurred with the hon. gentleman in thinking, that no subject demanded greater promptitude of attention.

The Attorney-General observed, that in some cases points of law were saved, which necessarily required the opinion of the judges. One had been saved by Mr. Justice Abbot, at the last Old Bailey Sessions, in a case of burglary, and that had been already decided. It was not the custom to make any formal promulgation of the decision, when the result of it was, that no additional punishment should be inflicted. Some delay must necessarily be produced by the occasional absence of the Judges.

Mr. Bennet complained, that no answer had been given to his question, why the October cases had not been reported; although, as he understood, the Recorder was fully prepared to make the report. The motion he had in view was, that the paper presented on Wednesday last be printed.

The Attorney-General remarked, that whatever information the hon. gentleman might have received; it could hardly be on better authority than that on which he asserted, that, some days ago, the Recorder was not ready to ask for a day to be appointed for the reception of his report.

The motion was then agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir Robert Heron presented a petition from the town of Gainsborough and its vicinity, praying for triennial Parliaments, representation co-extensive with direct taxation, and election by ballot. He did not concur with the last part of the prayer—that which referred to election by ballot: but he would support such a plan of Reform as should, by extending the elective franchise, make that House more substantially the representative of the people. (Hear.) He wished for the restoration of triennial Parliaments, an institution established at the best period of our history, and repealed by a measure of very equivocal policy. He would give his support also to every proposition for the retrenchment of the public expenditure, and the abolition of sinecures and useless places.

The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table: as were two others from the towns of Kirkcaldy and Leuchars, in Scotland, praying for the same object, and presented by Sir Rowland Ferguson.

A petition from the town of Boston, in favour of Parliamentary Reform, was then read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Shaw presented two petitions from Dublin; one praying for Reform in Parliament, and an extension of the elective franchise; the other from the Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, praying against an extension of the right of suffrage. —Ordered to lie on the table.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the Navy Estimates, which, after a few observations from Mr. Low, recommending the employment of a greater number of seamen, and a diminution of the shipping, so as to alter the existing proportions, was ordered to be received.

ARMY ESTIMATES.] The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, Lord Palmerston moved, that a sum not exceeding 500,000*l.* be granted to His Majesty, for the support of the Land Forces.—Motion granted.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] Mr. Tierney wished for a copy of the report of the Lords' Committee, to which he supposed there would be no objection.

The Speaker observed, that the mode was to appoint a Committee to consult the Lords' Journals in such cases.

Mr. Tierney framed a motion for a Committee to consult the Lords' Journals, touching certain secret papers presented to the Lords, by order of the Prince Regent.—Ordered.

MALT DUTY BILL.] This Bill was read a third time and passed. It contained the following clause, which was proposed on a former night by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.—“And whereas his Royal Highness the Prince Regent has been graciously pleased to direct certain sums to be contributed and paid from the Civil List revenue, in aid of the public service of the year 1817; and whereas many persons holding offices and places in His Majesty's service, and others having or holding pensions or other emoluments derived from the public, are desirous of contributing proportions of their respective official incomes, salaries, pensions, or other emoluments, for the same purpose; be it therefore enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or any three or more of them, or for the Lord High Treasurer of Great Britain and Ireland for the time being, to give such directions for one year, commencing the 5th day of April, 1817, to the Officers of the Exchequer, and of the several departments of the Civil List of Great Britain respectively, as may be necessary for giving effect to the most gracious intention of his Royal Highness in such contribution, and for executing the intentions of such other persons as aforesaid; and no deductions shall be made, or fee, emolument, or allowance taken, by any person retaining, receiving, or paying any such contributions as aforesaid.”

POOR LAWS.] Mr. Curwen rose to bring forward a subject of very great importance to the public. What he should have to propose would be, that the House should go into a Committee of Enquiry on the subject. He was far from intending to dispute the wisdom of the Act of Elizabeth; but he complained of the misapplication of that Act, which was intended to relieve the aged and the infant, and not to support those in the youth and vigour of life. The increase of the Poor Rates was a most alarming evil; they had increased, were increasing, and would continue, under the present system, to increase.

In 1776 the Poor Rates amounted to 1,500,000*l.*; in the present year they would not be less than 8,500,000*l.*—a sum larger than the revenue of some of the most powerful sovereigns of Europe. Yet with all this the poor of the country were wretched and discontented, because their spirit was broken. The hon. member then described the poverty of the cottages of the lower Irish, but said, they who inhabited the cottages in Ireland were comparatively happy, because they were (contrasted with the poor of England) comparatively independent. The poor of this country unfortunately looked to the Poor Rates for support. Before the evil could be lessened, endeavours must be used to restore the independent spirit of the people, and teach them, that if they wished to be happy, they must depend on themselves, and endeavour to support their own independence. It was the degradation of English spirit amongst the people, which had first operated to increase the Poor Rates, though the evil had been much increased by the pressure of taxation, which had recently reduced to pauperism, those who had till recently been contributors to the support of their poor fellow subjects. These circumstances had increased the distresses of the people beyond all conception. He had in his hand a statement from one of the townships of Sheffield, from which it appeared, that all the property liable to taxation, if taken and applied to the relief of the poor, would serve them but a short time. In this township, one person, a farmer, holding 210 acres of land, was rated one guinea a day, and he was informed that he would very shortly be called on for two guineas a day. This was a state of things which could not last. The number of paupers at present was not less than 2,500,000. The Poor Rates would, for the present year, be 8,500,000*l.*; this would not be a less tax than 96 per cent. upon all the property in the kingdom. A burthen so enormous, and so unequal in its operation as this was, called loudly for inquiry and investigation. At present it pressed principally upon the land, though several decisions of the Court of King's Bench had declared all property chargeable to the Poor Rates. He wished now, that funded property should be made liable to the Poor Rates, as it had been to the Income Tax. The unfunded property he took to be about 32,000,000*l.* The Bank, he thought, should be taxed to the amount of 1,000,000*l.*; the India Company, at 600,000*l.*; the South Sea Company, at 400,000*l.*; and the fund which would be formed out of these sources, he would have applied to assist those parishes where the assessment rose above a certain sum. This plan would relieve the agricultural interests, without adopting that objectionable measure, the increasing the price of agricultural produce. The next source of taxation which he should propose, would be the produce of labour calculated in England at 220 millions. A tax of two and a half per cent. upon this sum, amounting to three-pence in ten shillings, would produce 3,500,000*l.* He knew a town (Workington) where 400 individuals thus raised 700*l.* towards the maintenance of their poor. A large sum might be raised by this plan, and if the system took, the demand upon the funds would daily become less. Some such plan as this would operate to relieve the difficulties under which the country laboured, and which, unless they were removed, would involve the country in ruin. One thing he must again repeat, namely, that unless the Committee was to be appointed for the purpose of making some effectual reform in the present system, he would vote against the Committee altogether.

Lord Castlereagh was most ready to agree with the hon. gentleman, that before any good could be done, the spirit of the people must be roused, and they must again be urged to independence, and to a desire to support themselves, rather than live on charity wrung from those almost as much oppressed as themselves. He feared, however, that the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, that the taxing personal property would relieve the landed property to any extent, would prove erroneous. The only cure for the evil, would be, to adopt a system by which to put an end to the facility with which the degraded and idly disposed preyed upon the other part of the community. (Hear, hear.) If we were called upon to look to the act of Elizabeth as imperative on us to grant relief, we were entitled also to examine it with a view of carrying into effect that distinction which it made between those objects of its protection, who were unable to labour, and those who, being able, lay under temporary difficulties from want of work. Without shaking the authority of this statute, it was evident that every person who was able to work was bound to do so; where work was not to be found by the individual, it was to be provided by the public; but without labour, those who could labour, were to expect no relief. (Hear, hear.) This provision of the law ought to be followed up in the spirit of its authors, and as it was in early times. If it was so followed up, the noble lord was convinced that great and essential benefit would result from such an administration of it; that the difficulties of executing it would vanish upon trial; and that there was not a parish in the kingdom where a sufficient extent of beneficial work was not to be found for all the poor. Even although this were not the case, and though no very productive labour could be found, he would still have the clause enforced that enjoined labour, as he conceived that it would be better to order the objects of charity who were able to work, to dig a hole in the earth, and then to fill it up again, than see them dragging their limbs in listless and wretched indolence, and claiming support for performing nothing. (Hear, hear.) They would thus be kept in effort; they would strengthen their bodily powers; they would support habits of industry; they would preserve their frames in a state of action; and would be ready for profitable labour, whenever it should present itself, while, in the mean time, they would be able to enjoy ideas of power, if not of independence.—The tendency which the law had in practice received to encourage idleness, should immediately be corrected: for, if allowed to proceed much further, the evils that arose out of the law would be too strong for the law. (Hear.) He did not consider there was so great a defect in the Poor Laws, as there was in the administration of them. Frequently parish offices were filled by persons, who by their habits and other circumstances, were incapable of executing them. He would mention one instance in a parish with which he was connected—the execution of the Poor Laws was at present entrusted to a woman.—(Hear, hear.)—He had no wish to take parish offices out of the hands of farmers, but he wished there should be appointed a permanent officer to act under them, who might be acquainted with the laws, and the persons amongst whom they were to be administered. (Hear, hear.) Another objection he had to the hon. gentleman's plan, and that was, the difficulty which would arise in the application of a fund formed for general purposes, as the hon. gentleman had suggested. Another objection was, that the moment any parish became entitled to relief from this general fund, they would put their hands into a purse not their own, and the Poor Rates would become a matter of secondary interest. Notwithstanding he assured that hon. gentleman, he should go into the committee, when appointed, with a mind unbiased and open to conviction. One other observation he had to make, and that respected the tax upon labour, proposed by the hon. gentleman; this would be to render subscriptions to Saving Banks, which were now voluntary, compulsory; and would endanger the growth of that promising plant, which at present was so flourishing, and promised so much advantage to the public.

Mr. Curwen, in explanation, disclaimed any views of coercion with respect to Saving Banks; he had only in his contemplation places where the majority of the parishioners of all descriptions should be disposed to adopt the plan.

The motion for a committee was then read from the chair, the committee was agreed to, and the following members were nominated to compose it:—

Mr. Curwen,	Mr. Leigh Keek,
Lord Castlereagh,	Mr. Dickinson,
Mr. Frankland Lewis,	Lord Lascelles,
Mr. B. Bathurst,	Sir J. Shaw,
Mr. Brand,	Lord Stanley,
Mr. G. Rose,	Mr. Robinson,
Sir F. Baring,	Mr. Davies Gilbert,
Mr. Huskisson,	Mr. Holford, and
Mr. Morton Pitt,	Sir T. Ackland.

They were ordered to report from time to time to the House.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, February 24.

The Royal assent was given by commission to the Exchequer Bills Bill, and the Malta and Gibraltar Trade Bill.

USELESS PLACES.] The Earl of Darnley said, that as every individual felt the distresses of the times, except those who drew their income from the public revenue, he wished to know whether the example of the Prince Regent, and of a noble marquis who had given up his sinecure, was likely to be followed.

Lord Rollé stated, that it was the intention of Ministers to give up one-tenth of the income which they derived from their offices. He recommended a subscription among the higher orders; and that for the relief of the poor they should tax themselves, so as to enable Government to dispense with the taxes on leather and salt, and other taxes particularly affecting the lower orders.

Earl Grey said, that if the noble lord meant to recommend to them voluntarily to tax themselves, he informed him that that was a call which, for his own part, he would not answer, as he paid as much in taxes already as he could possibly afford, and he could not pay any new tax without a deduction from his expenditure in some other way. He was not one of those who thought that efficient offices ought to be taxed; and was persuaded that the giving up of ten per cent. of the income derived from those offices was neither called for nor ought to be accepted. The people called for what they had a right to expect, and without which they would not be satisfied—namely, that every article of useless expenditure should be done away.

ECONOMY AND REFORM.] Earl Grosvenor presented a petition from the borough of Southwark, signed by 800 persons, agreed to at a meeting regularly convened by the High Bailiff, praying for retrenchment and economy in the public expenditure, and a Reform of Parliament.—Ordered to lie on the table.

SECRET COMMITTEE.—LONDON UNION SOCIETY.] Earl Grosvenor observed, that on a former night, when the petition which he offered to the House from the Secretary to the London Union Society was refused, a noble lord opposite had said, that at another and more fit opportunity such a petition might be received. Another petition was now put into his hands from the same individual, and he trusted the period was now come when it would be received. The petition was then read. After stating that the London Union Society was founded in 1812, that it never had any one branch, &c. and had ceased to exist, (as in the former petition,) it concluded as follows:—

“That your petitioner has been informed, that a bill for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, is now before the House, and therefore your petitioner humbly prays, that your lordships will be pleased in your great tenderness for the liberties of his Majesty's faithful subjects, to permit your petitioner to produce all the books and papers of the London Union Society at the bar of your right honourable House, where your petitioner confidently assures your lordships that he is ready to prove all and singular the allegations contained in this his most humble petition. And your petitioner will ever pray.”

His lordship then moved that the petition be received.

The Earl of Harrowby did not rise to oppose the motion; but that motion gave him an opportunity, which he would have taken whether such a petition had been presented or not, of giving some explanation on the subject to which it referred, which he had not felt himself at liberty to do on the former occasion. He ought, perhaps, to make some apology for his silence on that occasion; but he had been induced to adopt that line of conduct for two reasons—first, because the question arose upon a mere point of order; secondly, because he did not feel that it became him to say any thing on his own individual responsibility, without having consulted with the other members of the Committee. He had felt desirous that they should hold a meeting for the purpose of again looking at the evidence, and refreshing their memories; so as to enable him to state, not upon his own imperfect recollection, but in concurrence with the whole of the Committee, the grounds of the statement, of the correctness of which a noble earl had, on a former night, expressed a doubt. The petitioner conceived himself aggrieved on account of that part of the Report which attributed to the London Union Society the principles which had been maintained by another set of persons, the Spencean philanthropists. If their lordships would examine the Report, they would find that the principles of the Spencean philanthropists were not attributed to the London Union Society; and that even the grammatical construction would not bear out such an interpretation. The ambiguity arose from the manner in which the passage in the Report happened to be printed, which was different from the manner in which he had directed it to be done. The Report stated, that there were,

Union Clubs, professing the object of Parliamentary Reform; but under these words understanding Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments—projects which evidently involved not any qualified or partial change, but a total subversion of the British constitution.” And then, without a break, ought to have followed the words—“It appears that there is a London Union Society, and Branch Unions corresponding with it, and affiliated to it.” And then it ought to have been stated, in a new paragraph, that “Others of these societies had adopted the name of Spencean philanthropists" and so forth. A little attention to the passage would convince their lordships that the breaks must have been misplaced; and he trusted they would give him credit for stating this correctly. The petition stated that the London Union Society had not been in existence for three years last past. Now, the document from which the Committee had drawn their conclusion that there did actually exist a London Union Society, engaged in these projects, was this:—It was an address dated the 30th of October, 1816, and published by the Sheffield Union Society, established for the professed purpose of promoting Parliamentary Reform, which referred to the London Society as then existing. In that address it was stated, that the object of the society was to carry its purpose into execution by a general and national union, by co-operation with the London Union Society, and with the branches throughout the country; and the address proceeded to state, that it was absolutely necessary that there should be a radical Reform, Annual Parliaments, and Universal Suffrage. Then followed some rules for the regulation of the society, to the second of which he requested their lordships' particular attention. That second rule contained a reference to the 13th article of the London Union Society, by which it was directed, that a subscription of 20s. per annum to any of the local Union Societies should entitle the subscriber to be an honorary member of the London Union. Now, he did not know any term that could have better expressed the connection of the London Central Society with these branches, than the term "affiliation." It would be observed, therefore, that the Sheffield Union considered the London Union as being in existence on October the 30th, 1816. As to another statement in the Report, on a minute examination of the evidence, they had not found that there was any direct evidence of a correspondence between these branches and the London Union Society, eo nomine; and the Committee were now satisfied that they would have better expressed themselves, if instead of "correspondence" they had inserted the word "co-operation."

Lord Grenville said, that he had gone on first to the examination of the papers as if he had gone into a jury-box, to form the best judgment he could upon the evidence laid before him. He went back again to the consideration of the evidence with the same feeling, and with the conviction, that if any error should be discovered, the amount of that error ought to be distinctly and immediately stated. The noble earl who had just sat down had shewn, that whatever misapprehension might have arisen from the mode in which the Report was printed, the Committee was no party to that; but had, in fact, directed it to be printed in a different form; and if any one found his feelings hurt by its being represented that he held the principles of the Spencean philanthropists, owing to the mistake which had just been stated, he trusted that such person would be satisfied with the explanation which had been given; and it ought to be observed, that it was distinctly stated in the Report, that "the Committee would by no means ascribe to all these societies the same practices and designs which they had found to be but too prevalent amongst a large number of them." Another point on which a noble earl had not touched was this—that some appeared to have imagined the Committee meant to say that it was the intention of all those societies to produce those consequences which the Committee itself firmly believed would result from carrying their projects into execution. Many of them might not have intended these consequences; and every candid mind would make the distinction. He himself firmly believed, that the effect of Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage would be not a qualified or partial change, but the total subversion of the British constitution. As to the assertion in the petition, that the London Union Society was not now in existence, whether it was true that it existed or was dissolved, he knew nothing, except from the document which had been mentioned to their lordships. From this the Committee had drawn a conclusion that the London Union did exist; and that there were branch Unions corresponding with it, and affiliated to it. That this might be met by contrary evidence there was no question; but he trusted that the statement of the Committee, reporting only upon ex parte evidence laid before them, would be justified up to that point. With the same openness he wished to state, that in as far as correspondence was distinguished from co-operation, the Committee had fallen into a mistake. He could not easily see how there could be co-operation without correspondence; but he admitted that there might, by possibility, be such co-operation without correspondence; and he was willing to apologize for that degree of inaccuracy.

Earl Grey requested permission to congratulate their lordships upon the circumstance that they now saw no objection to receive this petition. It would be a consolation even to those who voted against it the other night, and who must now be presumed to have done so with very great regret, to find that the time and the occasion were so soon arrived when they might indulge their feelings so far as to allow the petition to be laid on the table. But with respect to himself, who was not capable of applying to the consideration of the subject that nice discrimination which belonged to the noble lord on the woolsack and the noble lords on the other side of the House, he could not possibly see any grounds for the rejection of the petition before, which might not, with equal justness and force, be stated for its rejection now. His noble friend (Grenville,) and the noble President of the Council, had considered the subject of complaint to be that the petitioner had been confounded with the Spencean philanthropists. He, however, did not think that this was the gravamen of the complaint; nor did he think it of much consequence to the matter in question, whether, in the printing of the Report, it had or had not been rightly pointed. What the petitioner complained of was a charge of a much more grave and serious nature—a charge that he was connected with a system of clubs spread over the country, having for their object the subversion of the British constitution. This was the charge made by the Report; and the House ought not to suffer itself to be led away with the idea, that this statement, as to these Union Clubs, did not constitute a material feature of the Report. What was the statement of that Report? That societies were established throughout the country, with a traitorous design of subverting the constitution. This was the general statement, and these the objects which these societies were said to have in view. The Committee stated, that some of the societies established for these purposes were called Hampden Clubs; that others of them were called Union Clubs; and that there was a central Union Society in London. Now he would ask, whether this individual, if his statement was true, was not materially aggrieved by the Report of the Committee; and whether they were not called upon, in justice, to allow him to explain and justify his conduct? The noble President of the Council had stated, that the address of the Sheffield Union Society was the ground upon which they had proceeded: but what their lordships had now to consider was, that a most material fact stated in the Report of the Committee had been directly impeached by the Secretary of the Union Society. His noble friend, and the noble President of the Council, had said, that they retracted the word “correspondence,” and meant only to insist upon “co-operation.” It was worthy of their candour, if they had fallen into an error, thus to acknowledge it; but with all due deference to them, if the word had been “co-operation,” it would not have made the matter much better. The Sheffield Society spoke of “co-operation;” but the answer of the petitioner was, that the London Union Society had not been in existence for three years past; and there was, therefore, no possibility of co-operation; and this, and other important facts, impeaching the statement of the Committee, the petitioner averred that he was ready to prove at the bar. He (Lord G.) believed he had authority to state, that there was now in the House a note from the present Lord Mayor, whose conduct, on a late occasion, he thought, would at any rate free him from having any concern with societies engaged in traitorous conspiracies, stating, that he and Mr. Alderman Goodbehere had examined the books of the London Union Society since the time of the former discussion on the subject in this House, and that they firmly believed that every part of the statement in the petition was true; and that they were themselves ready to come forward as witnesses, and substantiate its allegations at the bar. This was no light matter; it had been no light matter before; and now it had assumed a much more grave and serious character. If the allegation in the petition was true, that the London Union Society did not exist, that fact ought to be explained before they proceeded to legislate on a matter of this importance. If they did not adopt this course, they would diminish the respect of the country for their decisions. The noble lord on the woolsack, even though surrounded by the military, and with all the security of power, when he had on the former night said, that even though he stood alone he would protect the orders of the House, appeared to have felt as if he had been exposed to some personal danger. Let him, then, sympathise with this humble individual, who had no such security; and who might be exposed to the severe penalties of the laws, if their lordships proceeded to act upon the Report of the Committee without farther investigation. But the interests of this individual were as nothing in comparison with the greater interest which the public had in this question, which was neither more nor less than this—whether the Habeas Corpus Act, which had been called the palladium of their liberties, should be suspended on the ground of a statement which was now directly impeached. He imputed nothing improper to the Committee, although he thought there was some negligence on the part of the noble Secretary of State, who ought to have fully investigated the subject before he recommended the adoption of such measures as these: measures which would never be satisfactory to the country, unless it clearly appeared that they were called for by a paramount necessity.

The Earl of Liverpool, after the clear, distinct, and manly statements of his noble friend, and the hon. baron opposite, relative to what had passed in the Committee, could not have occasion to detain their lordships long. Those noble lords had shewn, that the paragraph in the Report which appeared to connect the Union clubs and Spencean societies had been erroneously printed; and they had also stated and explained the evidence on which that part of the Report that speaks of the London Union Society was founded. The noble earl, however, considered this explanation insufficient, and contended that serious injury had been done by the Report to the individual who had signed the petition, and to the other members of the Union Society. In taking this view of the subject, however, it was plain that the noble earl had confounded two distinct parts of the Report. The conspiracy for overthrowing the Government was alluded to in the first instance, but it was to be carried into effect by meetings called on the 15th of November and the 2d of December. It was afterwards stated, that various societies had, by the notions they disseminated, a tendency dangerous to the public security and peace. This tendency was attributed to these clubs as the result of the general concoction of their doctrines; but instead of its being the object of the Report to include all in the same charge, it, on the contrary, stated, that the objects of the declared societies were different, and that many individuals who had become members of them might have done so without being aware of the ultimate intentions of many of their leaders. Some clubs were stated to have for their object Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage; others were described under the name of Spencean philanthropists; but it never was intended to confound these two descriptions of persons together. What the Report inferred was merely this—that they all tend to the same end, namely, to shake the allegiance of the subject, and to dissolve the bonds subsisting between the Government and the governed. This was described as a general effect, but not as the direct object, either of all the societies or of all the individuals composing them. He should, however, be told by the noble earl, that the London Union had not met for three years and a half. He was not disposed to contest this assertion, taken in one sense; it might be that the society had not, during the period specified, met as it was originally constituted, under the same name and with all the members present whose names were included in the petition; but that Union societies had very recently met, having the same secretary and some of the same members as that in question, was matter of public notoriety. On the 22d of January a meeting of delegates from various societies met under the pretext of petitioning for Parliamentary Reform. These delegates declared for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, and their chairman was Major Cartwright, their secretary Thomas Cleary, the petitioner. (Hear, hear.) This meeting adjourned, after passing resolutions to the effect he had stated, and he must contend, from its constitution and its proceedings, that it was in effect a London central Union club. Under the circumstances stated, the petitioner had no right to complain. It was in fact part of the system of the leaders of these societies to make them change their names. What effect the circumstances which had been stated might have on the measure the House was going to discuss he could not determine; but whoever looked at the votes of the other House of Parliament, and observed that great numbers of petitions had been presented from different parts of the country, all in nearly the same terms, and praying for the same object, certainly could not doubt, that there was a central Union Society, directing and putting in motion the rest, and where could this be supposed to be placed but in London?

Lord Holland was well convinced, that the Committee had acted with the strictest honour, and to the best of their judgment; but they were fallible men, and had to report on ex-parte evidence. He would not say that their Report was disproved, but its credit was certainly impeached. The question was not, whether a Union Society existed; but whether, when the Report was so contradicted, their lordships would not pause to inquire before they agreed to the bill now on their table. They were asked to suspend the law which was the birth-right of the people; but before they proceeded to adopt that calamitous measure, they ought to be convinced whether the Report rested on evidence which could not be contradicted. It was offered to be proved that the London Union Club had exercised no function for three years and a half; to this the noble earl replied, that does not signify: a club of the same sort lately met under a different name. But this was far from sufficient to reconcile the inconsistency, and to prove the correctness of the Report. How did it happen that his Majesty's Ministers, when the facts in their possession respecting illegal and treasonable proceedings came to their knowledge, took no steps to avert the dangers they apprehended? The noble earl had stated, that these societies had changed their names: but that change ought not to have enabled them to elude his vigilance, if their projects were of the nature stated. What are names under such circumstances? This proof of the existence of the Union Society under another name, which the noble earl was so anxious to establish, reminded him of the story of an Irish gentleman, who wrote a book to prove, that no such person as Ossian ever existed; but who, finding his proofs in support of that proposition rather weak, turned round, and proceeded to establish, that if Ossian did really exist, it was perfectly clear that he was an Irishman. Their lordships were now asked to depart from their usual forms—to set aside their standing orders—to pass a bill which was to deprive the people of their liberties, of the most valuable rights they inherited from their ancestors. Why this haste? Why the present apprehension from delay, when he could shew, from petitions in his pocket, that Ministers had been informed of all that was to take place at the meetings they now represented as so dangerous. The adjournment of such meetings as that of Spafelds, from one day to another, he certainly considered as highly improper; but whether it was proper or not, he had got proofs in his pocket of that adjournment having received the sanction of his Majesty's Ministers. (Cries of hear, hear.) Well, it might not be true; but this was certain, that there was not much difference between the evidence on which the Report is founded, and that which he had to offer. The noble lord had brought forward his ex-parte evidence in the Committee: it was fair then that his (Lord Holland's) should be heard also. He had in his pocket a document, in which it was offered to be proved, that the noble viscount had expressed his thanks, and the thanks of his Majesty's Government, to the person who took a leading part in the meetings now stated to be illegal and dangerous, for his conduct at them. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) He certainly did not mean to assert that this was correct, but the facts he had stated were fit to be inquired into before a Government of law was changed into a Government of arbitrary power. After having so long delayed the meeting of Parliament, and having also delayed taking steps to enforce the existing laws against the persons said to be guilty, he thought there could be no just ground for precipitation now.

Lord Erskine conceived, when he first read the Report of the Secret Committee, that his Majesty's Ministers had the same ground for any measures they might propose as was furnished by the Secret Committee of 1795. When the Report spoke of organizing the country, and of means taken to prepare the people for taking up arms to accomplish treasonable purposes; and when it is afterwards intimated, that societies with improper designs, though professing Parliamentary Reform, had been established, but that illegal objects might not be imputable to all the members, was it not meant that these societies had not in view to submit their claims to Parliament, but to obtain their object whether Parliament pleased or not? If, upon the evidence of the Report, contradicted as it has been, he should be asked to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, he would answer, no. He would suspend nothing in such a case but his judgment. There was another passage in the report which deserved particular attention. It was said, "others of these societies are called Union Clubs, professing the same object of Parliamentary Reform, but under these words understanding Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments—projects which evidently involve not any qualified or partial change, but a total subversion of the British constitution." Ought not the Committee to have employed the word opinions, not projects? Unless it could be clearly shewn that there was a design to carry those opinions into practice by illegal means, their lordships could not be called upon to legislate on the subject. What reason could there be for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, because men, ignorant of history, professed opinions on the subject of representation which were erroneous? How different were the present circumstances, when compared with 1795! Well did he remember that momentous period. A message came down from his Majesty, which stated to Parliament, that certain persons had been apprehended, and their papers, which proved the existence of an extensive conspiracy, seized. The message likewise charged these persons with holding a convention, which was to assume the functions of Parliament, and all the powers of the Government. These were most serious charges; but what were the charges of treason in the Report? They were confined to societies called Spencean Philanthropists—visionaries who talked of dividing the land. No suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was necessary on their account: the fittest way of disposing of them would be to place them in private mad-houses. Another charge was blasphemous publications. Against all these offences there were already laws sufficiently strong, and there could be no occasion for any new enactments. His noble friend (Lord Grenville) had stated, that asking for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, was asking the subversion of the constitution; but it ought to be remembered that there is no proof of any intention to promote these objects by force, and upon that only the criminality depends. In a few days he would have a petition from Glasgow, signed by 30,000 persons, to present against the bill. The petition he presented a few days ago from the same place was signed by nearly an equal number, and prayed for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage. Was it to be said that all these petitioners wished to subvert the constitution? or was it not, on the contrary, evident that they only meant to express their opinion, and to submit that opinion to the decision of Parliament? The President of the Council has observed, that if one person were to be heard in evidence on the Report of the Committee, there could be no reason to refuse any other who had a ground of complaint. This was certainly true, but it was the consequence of making general charges. The first elements of justice required, that those against whom such charges were made should be heard if they offered to disprove them.

The petition was laid on the table.

Earl Grey then moved, that the petition be referred to the same lords who composed the Secret Committee, that they might examine witnesses, and report their opinion to the House.

The question was put on this motion, and the House divided—

Content	23
Not-content	74

Majority—51

Lord Holland presented a petition from Mr. Henry Hunt, (for the tenor of which see the report of the Commons).

After the petition was brought up, Lord Holland briefly observed, that notwithstanding the general inclination manifested by certain persons in favour of Annual Parliaments, Mr. Hunt's parliament at Spa-fields was prorogued, and at the re-assembling received a royal message, prepared during the recess, from his Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department. (A laugh.)

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

Lord Sidmouth moved the order of the day for the second reading of the bill to enable his Majesty to secure and detain in custody persons suspected of designs against his Majesty's person and Government. The order of the day having been read accordingly,

Lord Sidmouth rose and observed, that whatever differences of opinion might exist as to this and other measures in contemplation, he was confident that no noble lord could have read and reflected upon the Report of the Committee upon the table without the deepest regret, calculated as it was to shock every feeling of loyalty to the throne, and of affection for the illustrious individual exercising its functions, and to cast a loathsome stigma upon the character and disposition of the country. Twice had a noble earl complained, that the Report had been presented unaccompanied by any evidence or documents to support it; but he (Lord S.) trusted that the House, instead of censuring its Committee for neglect of its duty, would applaud the regularity and the prudence of its proceedings. The Committee had thought fit to present to the House the conclusions and results at which it had arrived, instead of detailing information, necessarily of a secret nature, and producing documents which would put to hazard the safety of individuals from whom the important evidence had been obtained. These were motives that the House could not fail to approve; and, actuated by the same feeling, his lordship held it to be incumbent upon him to observe the same restraint: to that evidence, which the Committee had declined to furnish, he could not, with any regard to propriety, refer. There were, however, in the Report, three prominent features to which it was fit for him to advert in the first instance, and which merited the particular attention of the House. The first was, that no doubt was left in the minds of the Committee, "that a traitorous conspiracy had been formed in the metropolis for the purpose of overthrowing, by means of a general insurrection, the established Government, laws, and constitution of this kingdom, and of effecting a general plunder and division of property." In the second place, that the Committee are deeply concerned to be compelled, in further execution of their duty, to report their full conviction that designs "of this nature have not been confined to the capital, but have been extended, and are still extending widely in many other parts of Great Britain, particularly in some of the most populous and manufacturing districts." And the third point, inserted at the close of the Report, was a declaration that "such a state of things cannot be suffered to continue without hazarding the most imminent and dreadful evils; and although the Committee do not presume to anticipate the decision of Parliament, as to the particular measures to be adopted in the present emergency, they feel it to be their duty to express their decided opinion, that further provisions are necessary for the preservation of the public peace, and for the protection of interests in which the happiness of every class of the community is deeply and equally involved." These were the main points adverted to in the Report; and it was impossible to read them without the utmost degree of grief and shame, that in this country, distinguished in former periods of its history for its zealous attachment to the laws and constitution, facts, but too indisputable, should have compelled a committee to make such a statement to the House, at a moment, too, when the fidelity and gallantry of the nation had placed it on the loftiest pinnacle of glory, and when it had become as well the admiration as the envy of the rest of the world. Was it at such a period that conspiracies to overthrow the Government, and to destroy the constitution, were to have been expected? Was it at such a period that Parliament could have contemplated being called upon for measures like those this night to be suggested? Unhappily, for a long series of years, but more especially since the commencement of the French revolution, a malignant spirit had been abroad in the country, seeking to ally itself with every cause of national difficulty and distress; it had connected itself even with the dispensations of Providence, and had endeavoured to impute the visitations of God to causes with which they could have no connexion. During the war it had been incessantly busied, not in aggravating our defeats, for we had known none, but in denying our victories, and misrepresenting them as the triumphs of our enemies. On the arrival of peace, its activity had been redoubled; and, while the people were suffering under a heavier pressure of distress than had been felt, perhaps, at any former period, it had employed itself in exaggerating calamity, and fomenting discontent. The purpose of that malignant spirit was to avail itself of the reduced and burdened state of the country, and to apply it to its own desperate purposes; for evidence had been laid before the Committee, by which it unquestionably appeared, that the whole physical strength of the population was to be employed and organized by it, for the destruction of the most sacred establishments. That the distress arose, in a great degree, from unavoidable causes, he apprehended, would be denied by few; yet this malignant spirit had represented to the ignorant and credulous, that their sufferings were to be attributed not merely to the Ministers of the day, but to defects in the constitution: the efforts that had been made, and nobly made, to mitigate every cause of complaint, had been treated as worse than nothing, and as increasing the evil they were intended to remedy; and this evil agent, whose deliberate purpose seemed to be to destroy all that was valuable, had at length plainly told the people, that peaceable entreaties were vain, and that by open violence alone could their grievances be redressed. Some of these measures of violence were disclosed in the Report, and the horrid blasphemies with which this demon enforced his system of bloodshed and treason, was language that could proceed only from so foul a source. Some noble lords had complained that prosecutions had not been instituted against the authors, printers, or publishers of these infamous libels; but it was but justice to Government to state, that they had not neglected their duty with regard to those publications. As soon as they reached the hands of Ministers, they were transmitted to the law-officers of the Crown, who found that most of the papers had been so artfully framed as to render a prosecution extremely difficult and doubtful. Ministers had, however, strictly enjoined them to file informations in all cases where a conviction was possible, trusting with confidence to the loyalty and integrity of a British jury. Many prosecutions were now actually pending, the law-officers, of whose ability and honour his lordship was fully assured, not being of opinion that any proceeding of the kind could be earlier instituted: the delay had originated in the most conscientious motives. These seditions had been spread over the country in a profusion scarcely credible, and with an industry quite unexampled; in the manufacturing districts they had been circulated by every possible contrivance: every town was overflowed by them, in every village they were almost innumerable, and scarcely a cottage had escaped the perseverance of the agents of mischief: hawkers of all kinds had been employed, and the public mind had, in a manner, been saturated with the odious poison. Clubs had also been established in every quarter with the ostensible purpose of Parliamentary Reform. His lordship would not assert, that some of them had not really this object in view: but he should belie his deliberate conviction if he did not also assert, that a very large proportion of them indeed had Parliamentary Reform in their mouths, but rebellion and revolution in their hearts. With respect to the means by which this dreadful purpose was to be effected the Report of the Committee said much. Public meetings from time to time had been adjourned until all was ripe for action, and the first disturbance of the peace of the country took place on the 2nd of December. On that occasion Ministers would have failed in their duty if they had not made preparations adequate to the danger. His lordship's object would ever be to employ the civil power, and never to call in the aid of the military but in cases of absolute emergency; but on this occasion the civil power was incompetent to preserve tranquillity; and soldiers were so posted as to be ready on the instant in every part of the metropolis: the consequence was, that the disturbances within the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor had been quelled in a few moments by a troop of life-guards, whom his lordship had deemed it his indispensable duty to dispatch after the rioters, even without the sanction of the chief magistrate of London. His lordship had directed them to proceed to Skinner-street, and to follow the rioters into all parts of the city; and in one situation a line had been actually drawn up, and some shots were fired, which put a speedy end to the disturbances. The trials of some of the chief actors ensued, and his lordship had not deemed it advisable (and he hoped it never would be thought so) that prosecutions for treason should be instituted but where the clearest case could be made out. He should always prefer proceeding for a minor offence, where it could not be shewn decisively that it partook of the nature of a higher enormity. It had been said by a noble lord (Lord Holland), that Ministers were informed at that time of the treasonable purposes of the individuals engaged; in short, that they were acquainted with all the facts contained in the Report. The noble lord was in an error; for the particulars of a conspiracy indisputably of a treasonable quality had not been communicated to Ministers, and if they had no intelligence the noble lord could not blame them for inactivity. The circumstances that marked the atrocious character and designs of the meeting in Spafields did not come to the knowledge of Ministers until three weeks before the meeting of Parliament, so that no blame could be fairly imputed to them upon that account. The Committee had represented that such a state of things could not be suffered to continue without hazarding the most imminent and dreadful evils: it referred not merely to what had been done, but to proceedings still carried on for the furtherance of treasonable purposes; and that not merely in the metropolis, but in various parts of the country, where the seeds of disaffection were most likely to flourish; and the Report stated a decided opinion, that some other measures were necessary to secure the good order and happiness of society. It was therefore for the wisdom of both Houses of Parliament to consider and determine what those other measures should be which were required to protect interests in which all classes were deeply and equally involved. That which prominently forced itself upon the feelings and attention of their lordships, was the imperious necessity of affording protection to the illustrious personage, who, on the day of the assembly of the Legislature, was not only exposed to insult and indignity, but whose sacred life was even endangered by the blind infatuation of the multitude. The House would not have forgotten what had been the proceeding on a similar occasion, when a similar attack had been made on the person of the sovereign: the act of the 36th Geo. III. c. 7, was passed to afford to his Majesty additional protection; and his lordship would ask, if the dreadful and atrocious conduct recently witnessed did not render it fit that that bill should, by amendment, be made applicable to the Prince Regent? (Hear, hear.) It appeared before the House, that the enemies of the constitution, in the prosecution of their desperate designs, had made attempts, vain and impotent indeed, to seduce from their duty the soldiers and sailors who had fought our battles and conquered our peace: the Legislature had decided by a bill, which expired in August last, that persons guilty of such attempts should forfeit all right to the privileges they were entitled to by birth, and his lordship intended to suggest the revival of that measure for greater security. The clubs existing in all parts of the country formed another evil to be corrected, and to these the 39th Geo. III. would not apply, unless it could be shewn that the clubs were connected together by affiliation: it did not seem, however, under the present circumstances, necessary that that connexion should be established to render the members amenable. The 39th Geo. III. by a wise provision, had put down the London Corresponding Society, the Society for constitutional information, and some others by name; and although it had been predicted, they had never been revived under new titles: it might be proper to adopt the same course with regard to some of the clubs now existing; and more especially with respect to one of them; and if they should endeavour to communicate their infection to the people under a new description, at least the Legislature would have given warning by marking the door where the pestilence raged. It was also in the contemplation of Ministers to propose the renewal of a measure that had produced many salutary effects in 1795, and which had been renewed in 1798, and which had for its object the prevention of seditious meetings. Having stated thus much, his lordship felt that he should not discharge his duty, and should expose his conduct to severe self-reproach, if he did not state his conviction that Parliament would not perform what it owed to the country if it stopped here. In many parts of the country proceedings were still carried on of a most dangerous nature, and which could not be brought to the knowledge of Ministers but through the medium of persons who could not be brought into a court of justice. On this account yet more effectual provisions were indispensable, since bills to regulate clubs, or prevent seditious meetings, would not reach the most formidable and crying evils of which we had to complain. His lordship was most sincerely grieved to be the instrument, upon this occasion, of proposing a measure, the necessity of which was at all times to be deeply lamented, but more particularly in a period of peace. When we had no foreign enemies, it was the more to be regretted that domestic foes occasioned the suspension of some of the most important privileges of the constitution. Noble lords had much reprobated the communication of extraordinary powers to the servants of the Crown; but it was one extraordinary quality of the British constitution, that the powers of the Executive Government could be enlarged, if by such means that constitution could be better secured. The true question was, which was the most dangerous, to give additional strength to the hands of Ministers for general protection, or to refuse it, and to hazard every right that was

dear and sacred? He required the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, in pity to the peaceable and loyal inhabitants of the country: he required it for the protection of the two Houses of Parliament, for the maintenance of our liberties, and for the security of the blessings of the constitution. He asked, that this power should be communicated without delay; for though in other measures the House might delay, here procrastination was ruin. To adopt the measure would be a wise precaution—to refuse it a desperate infatuation: to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act at the present moment would be to obstruct the commission of the most flagrant crimes, and check the hands of sacrilegious despoilers of the sacred fabric of the constitution. Under all the circumstances it was a great satisfaction to him to inform the House, that it would not be necessary or just to extend the operation of the bill to Ireland. Some time ago he had proposed a measure for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act only in the sister kingdom, and it was the more gratifying now to declare, that the disaffected and disloyal in this country did not appear to have made a single convert in Ireland. All he asked of the House at present was, not to exaggerate, but not to under-rate the dangers to which we were exposed, and the difficulties with which we had to contend. It was not merely the lower orders that had united in these conspiracies; at least individuals of great activity, resolution, and energy, were engaged with them, and it became the House to meet their attempts with corresponding spirit, determination, and vigour. Such had been the advice of one of the most gifted and enlightened men that had ever lived, and who seemed, with a prophetic eye, to have foreseen, not only the immediate but the remoter consequences of the French revolution. The noble lord concluded by reading a long extract from the commencement of Mr. Burke's remarks; and then moved, that the bill upon the table be read a second time.

The Marquis Wellesley began by observing, that this was a crisis which at once called for all the fortitude of the people and all the energy of the Government: he was ready to allow that the state of the popular mind was exactly such as had been described by one of the greatest statesmen of any age or country—he meant, that general distress had produced general discontent. The statesman to whom he alluded had said, in language quite as good as any quoted by the noble viscount, whether Greek, or Latin, or English, that “the matter of sedition was of two kinds, poverty and discontent:” and of this matter of sedition he (Lord Wellesley) was willing to admit that there was an abundant supply; though, as to the sedition itself, he did not think the proof was so evident. Let it, however, be made to appear, that the country was not merely in a state of discontent, but also in a state of danger; let any man prove that the machinations of the evil-disposed would produce the hazard of ruin to the general constitution; let a satisfactory allegation of necessity be made out for the adoption of extraordinary measures; and he would ask, where was the man who, under such circumstances, would not say that even a great evil ought to be sustained in order to prevent a greater? The wisest patriots had ever felt, that true liberty has its basis in public order—pax est tranquilla libertas. The most arduous struggles for independence, the most furious civil wars, all concluded in establishing this maxim—that whatever is inconsistent with the tranquillity of a state, cannot be consistent with liberty. But although this proposition was true, it did not follow, that in every loose alarm of sedition, on every indistinct allegation of treason, their lordships should hold themselves bound to suspend the great, the true, and best bulwark of the constitution. (Hear, hear.) Their lordships should demand a distinct case, founded not merely on reasonable but upon irresistible evidence. Nay, supposing that a case of treason should be proved on the most incontrovertible testimony, this was not enough: his Majesty's Ministers were bound to shew, that it could not be restrained by the ordinary laws, that nothing but a new law could reach the new mischief. Indeed, after the most mature, long, and dispassionate deliberation, (and he could assure the noble lords that he had not hastily considered the subject), he was prepared to say, that even if it could be shewn that the overt acts of treason were similar to those which on former occasions had produced a suspension of the great law of our constitution, yet, unless it could also be shewn that the state of the country was precisely similar, and that the causes of the existing sedition were precisely similar, it was no argument for having recourse to a similar measure of unconstitutional severity. He should think that reasoning most inconclusive, which should ground the present project on the foundation of the existence of the same designs as formerly, without being able to make it appear that the condition of the country was, in all respects, exactly the same. He would go a step farther, and say, that whatever were the causes of the present evils, he should think all remedies inadequate and irrelevant that had not a direct reference to those causes, so as to extinguish their very seeds. He came now to the direct question before the House, whether the present state of the country was similar to that of 1795. Then, though there was sufficient cause of discontent, arising from domestic distress, yet the real origin, the grand fountain of the danger to the Government, sprung from the condition of France, from its disorganizing principles, and from its revolutionary agents. It was the desolating principle of jacobinism in its worst sense that portended ruin to this nation. It was against that we took up arms: the destruction of that master-mischief was the grand object of our foreign policy: the people of all nations lent their aid in the prosecution of a war undertaken for such motives; for they felt it was a war of liberty, of justice, of national rights, against the most outrageous tyranny that ever cursed the earth. That pest was at length destroyed; a series of glorious successes had at last extinguished its violence: nay, more, the very people who had at one period deserted their sovereigns came forward with spontaneous eagerness, and clung about them, and bore them to victory! Then surely the principle of jacobinism might be considered as dead for ever. But what was the real state of the case? To a glorious war succeeded that most dreadful evil, an inglorious peace (Hear, hear:) that fatal peace, when the rights of the people, who had done so much, were totally forgotten; when whole nations were laid prostrate at the feet of monarchs (Hear, hear, hear:) when, in defiance of national prejudices, of national habits, and of national objects, people whose interests were not only unconnected, but entirely contrary, were tied together like slaves in a string, for the sake of gratifying the vanity, or adding to the power of this or that sovereign. (Loud cries of hear.) Then it was that the old principle of jacobinism began to awake again: then it was that its spirit, so long dead, revived and again burst forth (Hear, hear.) But the peace, the glorious peace, though it reproduced this transcendent mischief, might at least have been expected to have produced some good. No such thing: whether it was that war, according to the idea of a noble lord, being a dispensation of a Christian Providence, was peculiarly favourable to a Christian Nation, (a laugh), and therefore that the return of peace was to be considered as a mischievous revulsion, affecting all interests of the country; however this might be, certain it was that this boasted peace, while it pretended to settle the happiness of all nations, had, in fact, done less than nothing for our own: and yet it would not have been unreasonable, while we were conferring such vast benefits, as they were called, on other nations, to have stopped a little before that great work was concluded, and to have insisted that the people so benefited, should have ratified to us all those means of strength and prosperity by which we had been enabled to effect their welfare. Nothing of this was done, and the natural consequence was general discontent. In fact, not one arrangement had been made for British objects; no care had been taken for British commerce; and he verily believed, that no trade now flourished except the African Slave-Trade. He now came to the particular evil, and to the proposed remedy for it. It was stated, that Societies existed throughout the nation, whose object was to misrepresent and overthrow Parliament. If such were the case, what was the natural inference? Was it not, that Ministers should hasten to apply to Parliament as the proper place for investigation and redress?

Was not Parliament the proper instrument for dissipating the popular delusion, for giving additional strength, if wanted, to the hands of the Executive? The report stated, that the first meeting—the first overt-act (as it was asserted) of actual treason, took place so long ago as the 15th of November last. On this occasion it was said, that the most inflammatory language was used to excite the people, and to vilify the Government. Yet the noble lord says, that it was only three weeks before the meeting of Parliament that he had any notice that this meeting was treasonable. But surely on the 2nd of December the doubts of the noble lord must have been removed; for on that occasion, all the adjuncts of revolution were in full exhibition—tricoloured flags, tricoloured cockades, and caps of liberty! But what would their lordships think, when they learned that the principal agitator at both these meetings, had been in close correspondence with the noble Secretary; nay, had waited in person on the noble viscount, and had of course been received with all that courtesy for which the noble viscount was celebrated? What would their lordships say, when they heard that the noble viscount had, with all solemnity, laid his hand upon his heart, and assured the principal agitator that he would lay before the Prince Regent the proceedings of that first meeting, which had since been declared to be treasonable. (Hear, and a laugh.) For his own part he could not help thinking, that the second meeting must have been called under the auspices of his noble friend (Lord Sidmouth,) who had been induced to lend his official aid to his new associate, the agitator: (a laugh) for what else could be inferred from that sweet intercourse between those two public characters; from that hand laid so solemnly on the heart; from that cordial assurance of laying the business before the Prince; above all, from those high compliments with which the agitator introduced the courteous correspondence of the noble secretary at this second meeting? (a laugh.) To be sure, while the principal person of the drama was thus employed in heaping merited eulogies on his noble ally, it did so happen, that an insurrectionary shoemaker in another part of the field excited and led forth an army to frustrate all those schemes for the public tranquillity which had been concerted with such skill and generalship. (a laugh.) But what was the real state of the case? Had the noble secretary done all that he could? Had he done all that he ought? Had he not, on the contrary, in the very thick of his newly discovered treason, further prorogued the Parliament instead of calling it together? Had he not, by this proceeding, proclaimed to the nation his opinion that Parliaments were useless, except when Ministers had any favourite objects to carry? had he not gone counter to the uniform practice of the Constitution, by thus barring the doors of both Houses in a time of public danger, when they ought more especially to have been opened? But what use did the noble secretary make of the laws then in force? Their lordships would be astonished to hear, that though the provisions of several statutes were in full efficacy, not one had been applied. The report had noticed, with proper horror, the outrage on the Prince Regent; an outrage as detestable, when the personal qualities of the Prince were considered, as it was alarming, on the ground of its being directed against the sovereign: this outrage had been connected with the Spafelds and other meetings. Why, then, had not the noble secretary come down before with a proposition which all could understand, and to which all would readily agree, that the person of the Prince Regent might be more effectually protected? As doubts existed whether the Act relating to the King could comprehend the Regent, why had not Ministers taken the earliest opportunity of extending its provisions to the acting Sovereign? They shewed a prodigious hurry to acquire a power of arresting people at pleasure: they were in the most violent haste to withdraw the great palladium of British liberty, but they were slow and temperate, and deliberate enough, in bringing forward any measures for the better protection of the royal person. He thought it an omission that no such bill had been brought forward, and certainly, he for one should not have hesitated to give his consent to it; nor was he disposed to object to a bill for the regulation of public meetings, for he was convinced that some restraint was essential to the liberty of the people themselves. It was expedient, for the sake of general liberty, to prevent such meetings from assuming the shape of constituted authorities, and from presenting a sort of body of resistance to the regular functions of the Constitution, by adjourning their debates from time to time. He was sure that there was no lord in that House who would not lend his assistance to both these objects—the better preservation of the royal person, and the maintenance of the tranquillity, and consequently the liberty of the nation. But the specific produced this night by the noble secretary, was ill adapted to either of these purposes: it was, besides, objectionable on the very grounds on which former specifics of the same nature were supported. He could not but pronounce it monstrous, that at such a time as this, every man's liberty should be put in jeopardy, while bills of indemnity would always be ready for those who abused this power. It was intolerable, that a law more sacred than Magna Charta itself should be thrown aside, and that even the legal rights of the oppressed should be defeated by the fresh oppression of an Act of Indemnity. In former times, actual war or actual rebellion had alone been considered a justification of such a suspension of an Englishman's dearest right. In 1793, both these causes, in an aggravated degree, existed at once: there was a foreign war carried on with the furious spirit of revolution, and there was a frightful rebellion in Ireland. Now externally all was quiet, unless indeed the dangers of that glorious peace (so cried up by the noble lords) were equal to all the horrors of the French revolution. And as to Ireland, there, according to Ministerial accounts, all was quiet; though, to tell the truth, he (Lord Wellesley) could not help assenting to the saying of a facetious friend who had just left that country, "that it was as quiet as gunpowder." At all events Ministers should be cautious in their proceedings: they should feel that the present temper of the nation required to be treated with the utmost delicacy, and that every mode should be taken to convince the people that the Parliament did not outstep the just limits of necessity. As yet he had seen no evidence which could lead him to think that the danger was of sufficient form and dignity to require that the personal liberty of the subject should be violated. He would adjure their lordships to call to mind a noble saying of an illustrious statesman, the late lord Mansfield, who describing the conduct of the great sages and heroes of the revolution, observed with equal justice and beauty, that so well did they love the Constitution, that in the very acts which they found necessary for its salvation, they were anxious not to give even the slightest wound to liberty. He must take the liberty of saying, that the report on which to-night's measure was founded, was very defective; and that the House should not proceed without further evidence. Before he concluded he must say one word, and that was, that while the House was passing an Act for the repression of sedition, it should not forget the causes which had first stirred up the discontent of the people. They should recollect the advice of Lord Bacon, that "the surest way to prevent seditions, is take away the matter of them." They should in this spirit shew a readiness, increased rather than relaxed, to reduce all extravagant expenses, to remove all unnecessary burdens. No permanent good, no real security, could accrue to the State, if the Parliament from alarm, however just, should suffer its attention to be diverted from the great object of public retrenchment. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Liverpool perfectly concurred with the noble lord, that, before such a measure as that which had been proposed was adopted, it was highly expedient to consider what were the circumstances which had led to it, and who those persons were to whom such extensive powers were to be intrusted; but upon some of the topics to which the noble lord had referred he must remark, that they had just as much to do with the measure before their lordships as any other proposition brought under the consideration of Parliament. (Hear.) The noble lord had stated, he was not prepared to deny that circumstances might arise in which such a measure present might be necessary. The noble lord acted wisely in making that concession; for it would be recollected that on many occasions not only had that noble lord voted in favour of a bill similar to the one now proposed, but he had also taken a most active part in promoting such measures. The noble lord had said, however, that it was not sufficient that danger should exist in the country, or that a traitorous conspiracy should have been formed. He was most ready to admit the proposition. Their lordships were fully aware that, four years ago, a very considerable part of the manufacturing districts of the country were in a most distracted and disturbed state: that, a systematic conspiracy existed, and that a secret committee was formed to deliberate what measures were best to be adopted. The result was, the passing of some new laws, which had for their object the protection of the lives and property of the people: but at that time it never was proposed to suggest such a measure as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It was the opinion of that committee that political evils were not the foundation of the state of things which then existed, at least that they were very distantly connected with it. He could state another instance which might appear more applicable to the present state of the country. When a noble friend of his was at the head of the department he had now the honour to fill, a most wicked and diabolical conspiracy had been formed against the person of his Majesty by Colonel Despard. The conspirators were, however, foiled in their attempts, were apprehended, and brought to punishment. Neither did he think it necessary on that occasion to have recourse to a measure like the present, because that was an isolated conspiracy, and all its danger was extinguished by one blow. The noble lord had asked for a precedent exactly in point: this was hardly reasonable, as no two cases could be exactly alike; the great thing to shew was sufficient cause for the present measure. As to the attack which the noble lord had made on the peace, he had defended it when the treaties were laid on the table, and was ready to defend it again at the proper time: but he believed that it had never before entered the mind of any sensible and judicious person to speak of that peace in such terms as those used by the noble lord. He was aware that there was a class of persons who disliked the peace on the same principles that they disliked the war, because they saw in it the overthrow of certain favourite hopes and opinions; but he had never before heard any man of cool judgment ascribe such base motives and such injurious effects to a peace made under the most glorious circumstances, and he verily believed more conducive to the happiness and liberty of mankind than any other peace on record. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the causes of the present distress, there were various opinions; some imputed it to the transition from war to peace; some to the paper currency; and some to excessive taxation: but none till now had ascribed it to such causes as those enumerated by the noble lord. For himself, he was ready to maintain, and to prove by documents, that the trade and manufactures of the country were never so extensive as during the last two years. The great decay in trade had arisen from the glut of former years, and the internal trade was suffering, owing to the distressed state of the agricultural interest. As to the alleged delay of calling Parliament together, he could say that the delay had been the result of the coolest deliberation, and after repeated consultations: and that, if it was not called at an earlier period, it was because it was felt that the evidence was not in such a shape as could be presented to Parliament. Their lordships would easily understand that though the Government might entertain a serious anxiety about certain clubs and certain writings, it did not follow that they could produce such satisfactory evidence of the danger of such meetings and of such publications, as would justify Parliament in any legislative measure on the subject. Indeed new information was daily coming to Ministers, and fresh facts had arrived even while the committee was sitting. If, therefore, the Ministers had decided wrong in delaying to call Parliament together, it was not because they undervalued that branch of the constitution, still less from the wish to dispense with it: but because, under all circumstances, and after the most serious consideration, they felt convinced that such delay would best promote the essential tranquillity of the kingdom: for if, when the first alarm was excited, they had, by assembling Parliament, drawn away from the places where they could be most useful the different country gentlemen, the consequences might have been most dangerous to the peace and even constitution of the realm. He attached as much importance as any man to the Habeas Corpus Act, and was ready to admit, that though not formally enacted till the time of Charles II., yet it had, in its main objects, existed for a long time in the constitution of the country. Still, he had always a firm opinion, that the same laws cannot always apply to the varying condition of a nation. Permanent laws, however good, might, in some cases, produce the most incurable mischief; and the only rule which could be always applied at all times was, that as much liberty should be preserved as was conducive to the general happiness. If this principle were correct, it would follow, that extraordinary circumstances sometimes require extraordinary powers; and the only question would be, whether sufficient ground was shewn for the measures proposed to be adopted. It was a mistake to suppose that this act might not be suspended in time of peace as well as of war; for it was possible that more malignant treason might exist during peace than war. If this increased malignity, this increased danger, were sufficient ground to stand upon, their lordships had it in the present instance; for the present system of treason had spread through a great part of the country: it was a system whose branches were so various, whose members were so active, whose spirit was so politically malignant, that, in his conscience, he believed that the domestic danger was far greater than in the year 1794. He was sure that it tended infinitely more to sap all morals, all religion, all principles of government and social order, than any previous conspiracy. The conspirators of the present day had taken a lesson from the conspirators of former times; for they had learnt skill, cunning, and management: all of which served to render them as dangerous as they intended to be mischievous. This was the general character of the combination, but in some parts the spirit was more malignant and desperate than in others. It was for the purpose, therefore, of supporting the throne, of supporting the constitution, of protecting the peace, comfort, and happiness of every private family in the country; it was with a view of preserving to every man the peaceable enjoyment of his fire-side, that he asked of Parliament to be intrusted with this power, a power which he was willing to admit nothing but extraordinary circumstances, such as those which now unhappily existed, should induce their lordships to intrust to any man, or any set of men whatever. (Hear, hear.)

Earl Grey said, that at an earlier hour he might have been led to enter into all the circumstances of this most important question; but now it was utterly out of his power to acquit himself satisfactorily, even according to his humble abilities, in defending the cause of the people of England against the most unnecessary and uncalled for attack upon their liberties which any Minister of the Crown, in any period of our history, had ever attempted. Though he thought his noble friend had strictly confined himself to the question then before their lordships, in the view which he took of the effects produced by the late peace, it was not his intention to follow the noble earl much at large in that part of his speech, which was to be considered as a reply to his noble friend. He must, however, contend that in his belief a very considerable portion of the dissatisfaction and discontent which pervaded the more rational and thinking part of the community, was the result of that peace; and he should be sorry to think otherwise. He should be sorry to think that Englishmen, enjoying all the blessings of a free Constitution themselves, had no sympathy for the rest of mankind to whom these blessings were denied; he should be sorry to think that the cause of liberty, wherever pleaded, was a cause foreign to the hearts of Englishmen; he should be sorry if Englishmen could coldly and passively behold other nations subjugated by military force, especially when they reflected that those evils emanated in a great de-greet from our own Government. (Hear, hear.) The noble earl had talked of the glory with which the war was concluded, and the liberty which the peace had conferred upon Europe; and, certainly, as far as respected our arms, as far as the glory of the illustrious general who commanded our troops, and the bravery of the troops themselves, were concerned, the circumstances of this peace were unprecedented in our annals: but, in his opinion, equal to the glory and renown of our arms was the disgrace of the negotiations. Where were we to seek for that liberty and independence of which the noble earl had boasted? Was it to Genoa we were to look for the due regard that had been paid to the rights of an independent State? Was it in Lombardy we should find that happiness and comfort which the peace was asserted to have produced? Was it in Venice, now blotted out of the map of independent nations in Europe, and consigned to a power which he would not describe? (Hear, hear.) Was it in Saxony, whose troops, deserting their Sovereign, placed themselves in the ranks of our own armies, to fight for the common cause, whose whole population united to assert the rights we asserted—was it to that devoted country we must look for the verification of the noble earl's assertion? But the noble earl had contended also, that the interests of our commerce and manufactures had not been neglected in the negotiations. If the noble earl was really of that opinion, let him go to the Exchange, and ask what benefits were secured to this country in return for the sacrifices we had made for the whole of Europe, and hear the answer he would receive. He was ready to admit, indeed, that one great cause of our difficulties was the depression of our agriculture; but did not the state of the foreign market also contribute to them? The noble earl had indulged in a curious argument upon that subject. After maintaining that our commerce during the last two years had been as great, if not greater, than at any former period, he arrived at the unexpected conclusion, that the foreign markets were now glutted, and hence the stagnation of our manufactures at home. Whence did that glut arise? Was it not true that every power on the continent had manifested the greatest jealousy of our commercial system? Had they not imposed restrictive regulations, in a spirit scarcely less vindictive than that which produced the Berlin and Milan Decrees? He contended, that with so many opportunities, with so many claims upon the friendly dispositions of the continental powers, his Majesty's Minister had not entered fairly into those arrangements; they had neglected the interests of the country in that respect, and to that neglect the present embarrassments and distress were in some degree attributable. The noble earl had endeavoured to justify the not calling Parliament together earlier; and he begged their lordships' attention to his arguments. What! said the noble earl, would you have us summon Parliament before we had sufficient evidence to require coercive measures? And was this the only apology which the noble lord had to offer? Was the enactment of penal statutes the only duty which Parliament had to perform in these times? He should have thought it might have found other duties. He should have imagined that its most natural and beneficial duties would have been to conciliate the nation, by shewing a disposition to do all in its power for relieving the existing distress; by listening attentively to the complaints of the people, when they referred to proper objects; and by an early adoption of that systematic and comprehensive retrenchment, which could alone provide a substantial remedy for the present difficulties. Those, he conceived, were the first duties of Parliament, and the performance of them was infinitely more important than any advantage that could accrue from leaving the members of that or the other House, at their country seats a few weeks longer. The noble earl, however, had certainly put the question then before their lordships, upon its true ground. A free Government could not constantly possess those powers, which it might be necessary to grant in extraordinary emergencies. If they had it at all times, it would be found too strong for freedom; while, on the other hand, if they were without it, in cases of extreme urgency and danger, there would be no safety for the throne, the constitution, or the country. He was ready to admit also, that in the best periods of our history there were instances, when the principles of our Constitution sanctioned the temporary suspension of it: but then, it was under circumstances of undeniable danger, and the wisdom of granting such a power, at such a time, was proved even by their lordships being assembled that night to deliberate freely upon the present question. He was entitled therefore to ask, was the danger now so great, so urgent, as to require the application of this law, and was it of such a nature that it could not be repelled without it? Upon that ground he was willing to argue the point. The noble earl had said, that even in the very year of the Revolution (uttering the word even with an emphasis that clearly indicated his triumph at the discovery) the law of Habeas Corpus was suspended. He certainly could not deny the fact; but he wholly differed from the noble earl in his inference. That suspension was permitted at a time of unquestionable danger and difficulty, when the Crown was unsettled, when the Sovereign was newly seated on his throne, when his claim was not generally recognised, when his enemies were daring and active, and when the exiled family was fomenting cabals and stirring up enterprises for the recovery of their lost dominion. Such a period was, of all others, the one most likely to be fertile in conspiracies and plots; but even then our ancestors, jealous of their freedom, would not consent to part with it for more than a month at a time. What comparison, however, was there between those dangers and the present? But if precedents were to be resorted to, let their lordships look a little further. In 1695, when the life of King William was threatened by foreign emissaries and domestic traitors, when there was an avowed plot to assassinate him, and when the country was menaced with invasion, in that very year, in the midst of all those dangers, our ancestors passed the celebrated statute for regulating trials of high treason, securing to persons accused of that enormous crime, every facility of defence, and which now formed one of the brightest pages of our legislative code. (Hear, hear.) He wished, therefore, when precedents were quoted, in justification of the present measure, that the spirit which animated our ancestors should be followed throughout, and that it might be imagined that every thing was done when the power of Government was secured, without remembering that the people also had an interest in the preservation of their own liberties and freedom. (Hear, hear.) The instance he alluded to was the first, and, with one exception, the only time, in which the law of Habeas Corpus had been suspended, without the existence of foreign war or domestic rebellion. In 1715 there was a rebellion; in 1745 there was a rebellion; in 1794, in 1798, and in 1801, there was a war with France and a rebellion in Ireland. The single exception in time of peace was in 1722, when a plot was discovered against the Sovereign, connected with the schemes of the Pretender, who published a proclamation, desiring the King of England to retire to his dominions in Germany, where he very modestly offered to procure him the title of prince. The enemy was then to have received assistance from some of the first persons in this country. Some of the conspirators belonged to that House, and many of them were actually seized and imprisoned; the first duke of the realm was sent to the Tower upon suspicion; and it appeared that many foreign officers were engaged to take the command of the troops. But was that a danger like the present? No one would venture to compare the two cases. Yet, under such circumstances, even the proposition for suspending the Habeas Corpus was strongly resisted, and in the House of Commons the minority was 193 to 246. At that time too it should be recollected that the Crown had an army which did not exceed 20,000 men, while now we have a standing army, for Great Britain alone, of four times that amount. Nor was that the only difference. There was then a pretender to the Crown, who still retained numerous and powerful adherents. Now both kingdoms were under the sway of an undisputed and legitimate succession. Besides, what was the influence of the Crown at that time compared with its present influence? (Hear, hear.) Fortified and entrenched as they were to the very teeth, by that influence, and by a large military force, he would ask, had they no other securities still? Let them look at their laws. There were enactments which restrained the liberties of the press—which regulated the circulation of newspapers and periodicals—oaths—and yet they came to ask for a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. (Hear, hear.) He did not wish to underrate the danger that might exist; he could have no interest in doing so. Whatever of rank or of property he possessed, he was anxious, like every other man, to transmit unimpaired to his children: and if the schemes mentioned in the report of their lordships' committee were capable of being carried into effect, he could not be so foolish as not to know, that he must be among its victims. Whatever, therefore, he might do or say in resisting the present motion, could only be from what he considered his paramount duty. In the first place then, he contended that any conspiracy attended with an utter improbability of success, as the present was allowed to be, was not a case that called for a suspension of the Habeas Corpus. What was the nature and character of this conspiracy? They knew the chief actors in it; for the Report distinctly stated, that they were the persons who attempted to excite an insurrection on the 2d of December. Who were they? Persons of great consequence and connexions in the country, whose co-operation gave a formidable character to the attempt? No. They were miserable wretches reduced to the lowest poverty and distress, who would probably have been driven to seek relief on the highway, if there had not been a prospect that the discontents of the country were such as might prompt many to follow their wild schemes. What was their object? To produce insurrection, by calling persons together under the pretence of seeking Parliamentary Reform, without any previous concert and design, and trusting wholly to chance for the means of stimulating their instruments in the work of sedition. That was the whole extent of the plot; and the attempt was made in the way that was projected. The mob assembled at Spafields; they were addressed in inflammatory language: to be sure, they were provided with ammunition, having about 20 or 30 balls and a pound of gunpowder concealed in the foot of an old stocking. They were not followed by more than two or three hundred persons, who plundered a few gunsmiths' shops, and a gentleman received a wound, from which he sincerely hoped he would recover. Such excesses ought, undoubtedly, to be repressed and punished; but in order to do so, was it necessary to suspend the Habeas Corpus? Those formidable rioters fled even at the very mention of a dragoon; they did not wait to see their horses' heads at the top of a street, so admirable were the military arrangements of that great General, Lord Viscount Sidmouth, than whom, Bunhill-fields never saw a braver commander. (a laugh.) His lordship then took a review of the different societies designated in the Report, and the circulation of seditious and blasphemous publications, as there described, observing that there were laws and Acts of Par-ligent, chiefly of modern date, under which all these offences might be prosecuted and punished. With regard to the statute to which he had before alluded, respecting societies having secret committees and secret correspondence, he had read the Act that morning, and he thought it as strong as it could be made against societies of the description mentioned in the Report. With respect to what they had heard of profane parodies upon the Church service, there was little that could be called new in them, however reprehensible. They must all be aware that at a former period a parody upon the Litany was written, even by a dignitary of the Church, which had never been selected as any object of marked reprobation. As to the blasphemy there might be in these modern productions, were there not laws to punish it, were there not equally laws to punish sedition? The members of societies, associated for the purposes of unlawful combinations, might be punished under the existing laws: seditious publications might be punished under the Act of 1797, which provides for the safety of the King's person. With all these provisions, therefore, surely it ought to be distinctly proved that they were insufficient to meet the evil, before new and extraordinary enactments were resorted to. It was not because they happened to have an incapable Attorney-General, or a negligent and inattentive Secretary of State, that the liberties of the people were to be suspended, nor were Ministers to call upon that House to repair the consequences of their own laches, by enacting laws oppressive to the community. Would it not have been a much wiser policy in the Ministers of the Crown to have resorted only to those measures which were strictly called for by existing circumstances, and which would have met with unanimous support? How much would this have added to the real strength of the Government, how much would it have tended to keep down the spirit of discontent? Much of that spirit arose from the extreme pressure of distress, and surely it was of no small importance to satisfy the people that nothing more was wished to be done than what was actually necessary for the security of the State, and the welfare of the community. As to the precedent of 1794, unnecessary as he thought it was then, and was proved to have been, he thought his noble friend had shewn that the situation of the country was then very materially different from what it now was. He, for one, would have consented to a new law for preventing meetings in the open air without a previous notice to the magistrate, signed by seven respectable householders, and for preventing them from adjourning such meetings from time to time with a sort of menacing expectation, as his noble friend had happily expressed it, of the proceedings of Parliament, or he would have consented to a measure for preventing such Meetings within a certain distance from the metropolis during the meeting of Parliament. He would have agreed to such a measure, because he conceived such meetings called by unauthorized individuals, as productive of great evil, in the spirit to which they gave birth, and the riot and turbulence they tended to produce. He would also have most willingly and cheerfully consented to a bill for the better security of the person of the Prince Regent. These two measures would, he conceived, together with the existing laws, have been amply sufficient to meet all the evils of the sedition, or the traitorous conspiracy dwelt upon in the Report. Had these measures only been resorted to, the unanimity of Parliament would have been secured in their support, an advantage unquestionably of the greatest magnitude, for would it not tend rather to increase the discontent, when it was found that the measures proposed by the Government, met with opposition in Parliament on the express ground that they unnecessarily infringed upon the liberties of the people? What was, in fact, the danger? Was it not clearly proved, that whatever was the spirit that existed, or the projects entertained, they were confined entirely to the lower classes of the people? None of the higher, or scarcely any of the middle ranks, were implicated. What then could be effected? Those who had the best means of judging of the true character of the French Revolution, were decidedly of opinion, that had not the system that led to it been supported by the wealth and influence of no less a person than the Duke of Orleans, and by the talents and means of persons in the highest ranks of society, that Revolution could not have been effected. The danger, therefore, was not of that imminent nature that the Ministers of the Crown would have the House believe. It might, he was persuaded, be effectually met and guarded against by the enactments already existing, with the addition of those he had alluded to, and in which he was ready to concur. How came it, besides, that all this danger was not seen long since? The noble Secretary of State seemed to have had no apprehension of danger from the first meeting in Spafields; did the abuse which was lavished upon the opponents of Ministers in a greater degree than upon Ministers themselves, serve to shut the eyes of the noble viscount to the danger which he professed afterwards to discover? It was really impossible to contemplate, without the most ludicrous sensations, the interview which took place between the principal orator upon that occasion and the noble Secretary of State. The contrasted manners, the opposition of character, the mildness of the noble Secretary, and the tone assumed by the other, was altogether a scene which would have been highly diverting to a by-stander. Nothing, however, of longer at that time seemed to have been discovered; it was only on a sudden some time afterwards that all the danger seemed to have burst upon the Ministers, and now, without any proof of the insufficiency of the ordinary laws, they were to be called upon to suspend the liberties of the people. He was glad, how-never, to find that it was thought not necessary to extend this measure to Ireland; he trusted it would therefore be deemed unnecessary to keep up so large a force in that part of the United Kingdom, and that thus a considerable saving would be effected. He also trusted that this acknowledged state of tranquillity, this admitted loyalty in Ireland, would induce a favourable consideration on the part of the Ministers of the Crown of the claims to civil rights of a large portion of his Majesty's subjects in that part of the United Kingdom, and that they would at length receive what they had so long and anxiously sought for, and what they were justly entitled to, a free participation in the common rights of the subjects of the realm. He could not conclude without again expressing his deep regret that Ministers had not rather chosen to ensure the unanimity of Parliament by moderate measures, than thus to increase discontent by measures for abridging and suspending the liberties of the subject—measures, unfortunately, which, by the increased discontent they generated, tended to others still stronger, and thus ultimately to the utter subversion of the Constitution. It was impossible to contend, that powers were wanting to provide for the safety of the country. Was the British Constitution, as he had read in a celebrated writer, as variable as the weather? Was it only fit to sail "on the smooth surface of a summer sea," and when "the tempest rages and the whirlwind roars?" was it not able to carry us through our dangers? Such was not his opinion of the British Constitution. Upon these grounds he should dissent to the second reading of this bill, and should not have thought himself worthy of a seat in that House, if he had not raised his voice against a measure which, in his conscience, he thought would be one of the most fatal in its consequences that had been ever adopted by Parliament. (Hear, hear.)

The Duke of Sussex, differing as he did from the noble lords opposite, felt it his duty nevertheless to say, that he believed they acted from the purest motives. He believed, that what they proposed, was from a regard to the Constitution; yet, he could not avoid saying, that from personal knowledge, he saw no grounds to believe that such a conspiracy ever existed as that of whose existence the noble lords over the way attempted to persuade the House. He was present at the examinations which had taken place before his worthy friend the present Lord Mayor, at the Mansion-house: he could not lend himself to support the idea of any conspiracy ever existing, and, in his opinion, he was the more confirmed, when he considered the amount of the subscription raised preparatory to the far famed 2d day of December. That subscription, would their lordships believe it, amounted to no less than the formidable and enormous sum of ten pounds sterling!! (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) For the waggon hired on that memorable occasion, 1st had been first of all paid, and 2^d. afterwards, and he believed there was at this moment 10s. of the hire yet to pay. (Hear, hear, hear.) With respect to the ammunition with which this waggon was loaded, that ammunition had been placed in the waggon at the head of Chancery-lane, and was contained in what? Why, in an old stocking, (Hear, hear.) and it consisted of 50 balls, none of which would fit a pistol. (Hear, hear, hear.) There was a tremendous cannister in the waggon, containing no less than one pound weight! (Hear, hear.) Really when such were the mighty facts of this case, when such were all the proofs of this conspiracy, he would ask were their lordships prepared to say they would go beyond the limits of the present existing laws? Were they really disposed to magnify such molehills into mountains? (Hear, hear.) Attached to the venerable fabric of the British Constitution, no man would ever feel more anxious than himself to take every precaution to prevent that fabric being dilapidated, but never could he consent to the adoption of measures for abridging the liberty of Englishmen, for depriving them of their native, their legitimate rights, when there was no case made out to justify such measures being adopted. (Hear, hear.) Glorifying in the name of a Briton, because that name was connected with every thing dear to the human heart, he could only say, that while he lived, he should ever consider it his highest honour to maintain, unimpaired, the sacred rights of Britons. (Hear, hear, hear.) This was a subject nearly as serious as voting life and death, guilty or not guilty; and it was impossible to vote away the liberties of Englishmen in this manner. The duty of an honest man was only to vote on that side on which his conscience lies, and therefore he should sit down in voting against the measure. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Grenville considered the question now before their lordships to be one of the most important that had ever engaged the attention of Parliament, and while he was aware of that importance, he trusted their lordships would give him credit when he said, that no man could have more hesitation than he had in sanctioning the measure now proposed for their lordships to adopt, especially in a time of peace. His noble friend (Earl Grey) had justly observed, that the proper question before their lordships was, whether at this important crisis there was such a case made out, as would justify their lordships in suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. He, for one, acknowledged he had seen that case sufficiently made out. He was old enough to remember the riots of 1780, when the metropolis was for five days in the hands of an infuriated mob, which at first consisted of as few persons as those collected at Spasfields, but which, as their lordships knew, was soon increased by immense numbers. If their lordships would look to more modern occurrences, they would find sufficient in the history of ill-fated France, to shew the baneful consequences resulting from attempts to undermine moral and religious habits. For one, he was decidedly of opinion, that the revolution of that country had been accelerated by nothing so much as the publication of pamphlets of a most irreligious and seditious nature, which were given to the lowest and most ignorant of the people, whom the want of education rendered to a considerable extent savage. He was persuaded that some extraordinary legislative measures were necessary in the present crisis. Never would the revolution in France have been accomplished, had the morals and religion of the community not been subverted, and he begged to assure their lordships, that when once the religious habits of a country were attempted to be undermined by the sophistry, or ridicule of the profane, when once her sacred institutions were turned into scorn, there existed but little hope for that country. He would not enter at present into the question respecting Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, but he certainly would assure their Lordships, that the manner in which that question was at the present moment agitated through the Empire, deserved their serious attention, for he was persuaded, that the name of Parliamentary Reform was assumed to cover a wild project which must end in the total and irremediable overthrow of the country. These projects of Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments were not submitted to individuals capable of judging of their propriety, but on the contrary were directed to the poorest and most wretched classes, who were thus taught to look upon them as their ancient and imprescriptible rights; but, unfortunately for its supporters, that part of the Constitution they referred to was some hundred years prior to where the true and authentic history of the country had commenced. Thus were the most insidious attempts made use of to subvert the principles of the poor, and to cherish ideas which had no existence excepting in the visionary minds of those who promulgated them. He certainly thought the experience of the last six months had justified some extraordinary measures, for it would be a mockery to speak of the protection we enjoyed under our laws, when it was seen by experience that the peace of the country could be disturbed whenever madmen chose. On looking at this subject, he did not think it necessary to go into a sort of comparative scale of the dangers of the present moment with the dangers of former periods; because, in the fluctuating state of society and nations, he thought it hardly possible to select one or two striking circumstances, and to say that the absence of some circumstance in this case, which there was in another, must put out of consideration those evils which it was necessary to guard against. Never, till the present moment, was the hope entertained in this country of detaching the minds of the great mass of the people, not from this or that sect of religion, but from all religion whatever. The seditious writers of the present day, who deluged the country, and filled the air with their ignorant and wicked productions, did not make it a question by whom the Government should be administered, but whether a Government should exist at all; whether the whole frame and constitution of the country was not so corrupt as not to call for a mere Reform of Parliament, but such a Reform as would amount to a complete insurrection. It was not for the security of this or that individual, or of this or that class of persons, but it was for the security of the whole community that he thought it necessary that Parliament should interfere to arm Ministers with those powers which, he feared, were the only means left to protect the safety and security of the nation. How it was that the law was not sooner enforced, and that the evil was allowed to reach so great a height, without any measures having been adopted to check its progress, he was unable to say: but it was sufficient for him, for the present purpose, to be convinced, that the evil had in fact advanced to a magnitude which required this measure. He deeply regretted that it should be necessary to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, even for the shortest time: but since that was necessary, he was happy that the suspension had not been extended beyond a period when the subject might be reconsidered by the present Parliament. God grant that it might not be necessary to continue the suspension longer than the earliest period mentioned. But if the circumstances of the country should remain as they were, he must vote for its further continuance, from a conviction that it was justified by the necessity of the case.

The Duke of Gloucester was sorry to detain their lordships even for a moment longer at that late hour, but he could not reconcile it to himself to give a silent vote on this most important question. No man could possibly be more unwilling than he was to support any measure for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; but he was convinced of the necessity of the measure, under the present circumstances of the country, and would therefore join his noble friend in voting for the second reading of this bill, regretting, at the same time, that he was compelled to differ from so many other noble and respected friends.

Lord Holland did not mean to discuss the subject at any length in the present exhausted state of the House, and rose to say a few words, merely because, on a question of such magnitude, he could not rest satisfied with giving a silent vote. The general subject had been so well explained on both sides of the House, that it was unnecessary to recur to it. The only question was, whether the necessity existed for resorting to extraordinary measures: and then, whether if the necessity did exist for some extraordinary proceeding, the present measure was that which was best calculated to answer the intended purpose. With respect to the course adopted in 1794, it would be recollected that other measures had then been resorted to. The Habeas Corpus Act was not suspended in 1795; nor during the dissolution of Parliament; and he hoped it never would be suspended in such circumstances. It should be observed, that though the complaint now was that there was a decay of all religion among the people, the increase of the Methodists had often been lamented in that House. The two things were incompatible, and if Methodism had spread to so great an extent among the people, that very circumstance created a very strong degree of doubt as to the necessity of the present measure. It did not appear to him that the present Ministers were at all likely to exercise these new powers with harshness and cruelty: but still there must be a bias on their minds to create an alarm in the country, because otherwise the distresses were such that they run a risk of being unseated. Upon the whole, he could not think himself justified in voting for the second reading of the bill at present, because three previous requisites were wanting. In the first place, it had not been shewn that existing laws were inadequate to answer the purpose: secondly, it had not been shewn that they had been enforced, such as they were: a fact so obvious, that his noble friend (Grenville) admitted that he was unable to account for the circumstance: thirdly, it did not appear that this was the proper mode to meet the evil.

The House then divided on the motion for the second reading of the bill,

Content - - - - 84	Not Content - - - 23
Proxies - - - - 66	Proxies - - - - 12

150

35

Majority - - - - 115.

The bill was then read a second time, committed, reported, read a third time, and passed. Adjourned at two o'clock.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

PRESENT.

Duke of Sussex	Earl of Darnley
Duke of Somerset	Earl of Lauderdale
Duke of Bedford	Visct. Torrington
Duke of Argyll	Lord Say and Sele
Marquis Wellesley	Lord St. John.
Earl of Derby	Lord Montfort
Earl of Thanet	Lord Holland
Earl of Essex	Lord Foley
Earl of Albemarle	Lord Auckland
Earl Grosvenor	Lord Alvanley
Earl of Rosslyn	Lord Erskine
Earl Grey

PROXIES.

Duke of Devonshire	Earl of Darlington
Duke of Leinster	Earl of St. Vincent
Marquis of Downshire	Viscount Anson
Earl of Jersey	Viscount Clifden
Earl Cowper	Lord Byron
Earl of Waldegrave	Lord Ponsonby

PROTEST

IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS, AGAINST THE BILL FOR SUSPENDING THE HABEAS CORPUS.

DISSENTIENT,—Because it does not appear to us, that, in the Report of the Secret Committee, there has been stated such a case of imminent and pressing danger, as may not be sufficiently provided against by the powers of the Executive Government under the existing Laws, and as requires the Suspension of the most important security of the Liberty of the Country.

Augustus Frederick.	Grey.
Bedford.	Wellesley.
Albemarle.	Thanet.
Foley.	Grosvenor.
Sundridge.	Auckland.
Alvanley.	St. John.
Montfort.	Say and Sele.
Essex.	Rosslyn.
Lauderdale.	Vassal Holland.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, February 24.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett presented petitions from Ludlow, Driffield, Blackburn, &c. praying for Retrenchment and Reform. Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir R. Fergusson, in presenting a petition from Perth, in favour of Parliamentary Reform, protested against the attempts made to confound those who were desirous of Reform, with those who were desirous of revolution; thereby making a libellous attack on the great mass of the nation. (Hear, hear.) This was more particularly the case with respect to the inhabitants of Scotland, who, though zealous reformers, were among the most loyal of his Majesty's subjects. (Hear, hear.)

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Staniforth presented a petition from Hull, praying for Economy and Reform.

On the motion that it be laid on the table,

Mr. Brougham observed, that he had received a communication from a gentleman at Hull, a warm friend to the constitution, who had assured him that the meeting at which the petition originated, was most fully attended, and that nothing could be more temperate and orderly than the conduct of the persons assembled. This was not an exception to the general circumstances: quite the contrary. With one solitary exception, at all the meetings called for the purpose of petitioning Parliament for Reform, the proceedings had been carried on with a peaceful and decorous spirit, that would do honour to any cause. (Hear, hear.)

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Gaskell presented a petition from Wakefield, for Economy and Parliamentary Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Sir J. Newport, in consequence of the indifferent state of his health, requested that his name might be withdrawn from the Committee on Public Expenditure. After a few words from Mr. D. Gilbert, lamenting the circumstance, Sir J. Newport's name was accordingly withdrawn; and, on the motion of Mr. Brougham, that of Mr. Robert Smith was substituted.

PETITION FROM MR. HUNT.] Lord Cochrane moved, that a petition should be read which within the last ten minutes had been put into his hand. It came from an individual who was ready to prove at the bar of the House, the falsehood of certain imputations on the public that had lately appeared in the journals as the report of the secret committee. He (Lord C.) thought there could be no doubt, that allegations of this nature should be examined before the House proceeded to suspend the liberties of the country. The individual in question stated, that Lord Sidmouth knew beforehand the proposals and intentions of the parties who excited the tumult at Spafields; that certain instruments, resembling pike-heads, had been ordered, by a person in the dress of a gamekeeper, to be made at the shop of one Bentley; that those instruments were nothing more nor less than pikes, for securing the head of a fish-pond against marauders; that certain police-officers had come to this same Bentley, and had ordered him to fabricate some more spikes similar to those he had made for the gamekeeper: and that these imitations, fabricated by such orders, were the pike-heads produced before the committee of secrecy. The petition contained much other curious matter, for the truth of which he (Lord C.) did not hold himself responsible; but he thought that it ought to be examined into, and a committee appointed for the purpose, because it would be satisfactory, that the proceedings of the House should be grounded on truth, or that if the allegations contained in the petition were false, the individual who had attempted thus to impose on the House, should be severely punished for his contempt of their proceedings. It appeared to him a most extraordinary circumstance, that though a private person, when accused, was allowed to exculpate himself in the best manner he could, the whole people of England should be condemned, unheard, by a selected committee, (and all knew how committees were selected.) This was so extraordinary and unjust, that he there, in his seat, protested against it, and he trusted the House would not sanction such a proceeding by its vote, when it was notorious that no serious disturbances had taken place. It was true, that a small body, calling themselves Spenceans, had precipitated an attack on the property of the country: but they were not above 100 in number, even in the opinion of the Lord Mayor; that a few desperate individuals might have evil designs he had no doubt, but that the constitution was in danger from any such wretched individuals, no one could seriously imagine. The petitioner himself, on his way to the Spafields meeting, met those coming from it who were said to have hired the waggon from which such inflammatory speeches had been made; that it was extraordinary that the Courier should have stated those resolutions to have been made as part of the proceedings of the meeting, which were absolutely rejected by the petitioner, and which Ministers were in possession of long before the meeting. It was averred in the petition, that so far from Spafields having been fixed on with any settled design, Palace-yard was the place originally chosen for the meeting; from whence there could have been no intention of attacking the Bank or the Tower. The petition from Henry Hunt, of Middleton-cottage, near Andover, was then read. It stated in substance, that the petitioner had been the mover of several petitions which had been favourably received by both Houses of Parliament, and of one in particular at the Spafields meeting, which had been received by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent; that he had lately read the report of the secret committee, which, as far as he was able to disentangle it, endeavoured to shew that Spafields had been chosen as the centre for an attack on the Bank and on the Tower; and that at the second meeting, the banners of revolution had been unfurled, and an insurrection actually begun. The pike-heads had actually been fabricated, and delegates appointed from different meetings in the country. With respect to the first allegation, the petitioner, as he could not know the thoughts of men, could say nothing, but he trusted a simple narration would remove all suspicion from those who were principally concerned in the business of the day. The petitioner, while in the country, had received a letter from a person of the name of Preston, requesting his attendance at a meeting to be held in Spafields; he wrote to know the object of the meeting, and received for answer a newspaper called the Independent Whig, which contained an advertisement dated from the Carlisle Arms, and addressed to the distressed mechanics, mariners, and others of the metropolis. Petitioner hesitated not to accept the invitation, and attended the meeting; he found there a memorial ready prepared, which a stranger put into his hand. Petitioner finding it contained propositions he could not approve, and, among others, one to lead the people to Carlton-house, refused to accede to it, and moved instead, that a petition should be presented by himself to the Prince Regent. John Dyer had furnished Mr. Gifford, the magistrate, with a copy of the other resolutions, which were in the hands of Lord Sidmouth before the meeting was convened; so that whatever took place was owing to the connivance of those who knew beforehand what would be proposed. With respect to the second allegation in the report of the committee, there was nothing like previous concert in the transactions of the meeting. A second day had been appointed without any decided preference, but only with a view to the probable meeting of Parliament; at that meeting the petitioner was to carry down the Prince Regent's answer to the petition that had been presented him; the petitioner had informed Lord Sidmouth of this, who, so far from making any objection, or advising petitioner not to do so, said that petitioner's presence appeared to have prevented mischief; so that his lordship could have had no desire to prohibit the meeting. The petitioner, and others connected with him, had nothing to do with the unhappy disturbances on the day of the Spafields meeting. He met the rioters on his way to the meeting, and proceeded to the place appointed, where the strongest resolutions were passed against violence and tumult; so that at a third meeting, much more numerous than either of the preceding, every thing passed off in the most orderly manner. As to the pike-heads, he was ready to shew that a person of the name of Bentley had been employed by a gamekeeper, to make spikes for the preservation of fish in a fish-pond; that the first set succeeding extremely well, more had been ordered; and that after this, Bentley had been sent for to Bow-street, and ordered to make others similar, as a copy of what he had furnished the gamekeeper with. Delegates from Hampden Clubs having been mentioned, the petitioner begged to shew that they were not termed delegates, but deputies; that they had met only three times, and that in an open room, to which newspaper reporters were admitted; that they had separated by an absolute dissolution, and not by an adjournment; nor were they to meet again in March, as was alleged in the report of the committee.—The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.—SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.] Mr. Brogden brought up the Report of the Committee appointed to search the Lords' Journal with respect to the proceedings of the Secret Committee appointed by their lordships to examine into the sealed paper recently presented for their consideration. The Report comprehended the Report presented to the House of Lords, by their lordships' Committee, and was ordered to be printed.

Lord Castlereagh then rose, and, in adverting to the importance of the question he was about to bring before the notice of the House, stated, that he had never felt himself in a more painful situation. It was his duty, and it had been the duty of other men in public situations during these latter times, to submit to the mortification of calling on Parliament for extraordinary powers at periods of extraordinary danger; but severe as that duty was at all times, it must be peculiarly painful and grievous for him to find that it was now imposed on him, not at a period of war and confusion, but after the return of peace, and when it might have been hoped that tranquillity had been restored within, as well as without the kingdom. He should have hoped, that after the dreadful record that the whole world had been furnished with, of the sufferings inflicted by a neighbouring nation on themselves and others, by an unprincipled overthrow of all that was established and sacred; after the memorable lesson taught us by the fall of all those who had commenced the scene of plunder and devastation; after the dangers and sufferings in which all had been involved by the dreadful convulsion, we should, on the return of peace, on the close of a war that had so proudly rescued us from impending destruction, have sat down to contemplate in tranquil thankfulness, the dangers we had escaped. He should have thought it difficult to find any individual in this country, so devoid of all principle, or so prone to be acted on by profligate and abandoned adventurers, as to render it necessary to call on Parliament for its interference. But much as he might have flattered himself that few of such a description could now exist, or that they were unlikely to occasion any great portion of evil, yet no one, he thought, could look at that desperate and audacious spirit which had grown out of the French revolution, without feeling, that so long as a spark of that spirit remained, so long as a hope could exist of gaining any thing by the confusion and destruction of all order and government: desperate men might arise, who would endeavour, at all hazards, even to the disregard of life, to make themselves masters not only of the reins of state, but also of all the property of this great country. It might be matter of surprise, that characters should exist, bold and dangerous enough, to risk their own existence in such a cause; but the character of the times in which we lived was such, that so long as there was a hope of gaining any thing by disturbance, so long would such men attempt to destroy the public peace. But while he was not surprised that such men should exist, it was a consolation, that if we had not passed the whole of the revolutionary dangers to which we had been exposed, we had surmounted a great part of the difficulties, and had escaped the acmé of the trial: because we might congratulate ourselves, that the contagion was confined to the inferior orders of society, who, from want of information, were more likely to be operated upon by the attempts of designing men; though no one, who was not disposed to shut his eyes, would contend that no danger at all existed, however the noble lord opposite (Lord Cochrane) might be disposed to depreciate the amount of it. The dangers had descended in the course of years from the higher to the lower classes, and became principally operative among the last, as they saw in the instances of the Luddites, and of the Spenceans, who promulgated the most mischievous doctrines, calculated to impose upon and mislead the lower classes. These doctrines were calculated to destroy all the component principles of society, and were full of every transgression against the laws. Indeed, their absurdity might be supposed calculated to counteract their objects. (Hear.) Yet, with such evidence of treason before them, the House would not do their duty if they were to sleep over the danger. If he admitted the absurdity of the doctrine, as contrasted with the circumstances attending the earlier periods of the French revolution, it was not to be supposed that in the present case there were not considerable talent and ability employed in drawing off the unwary. Look at the documents of the Spencean society, and they would shew great talent and ingenuity occupied in drawing them up. Look at the various libels circulated against all sacred and established institutions, and it would be seen they were not the offspring of men of a very vulgar turn of mind, but of men of considerable talent and perverted education. His learned friend (the Attorney-general) knew how difficult it was to treat many of these libels. If the conspirators and other disaffected persons were not of high rank and importance, yet it appeared that there were persons of eminence, who so discharged what they considered their public duty, that these people viewed and recognized them as engaged and directed to a common object. Regarded by them thus, they were looked to as a future committee of public safety. (Loud cries of hear, hear, name, name, order.) He did not feel it his duty to mention any names. (Hear.) He was only speaking on what the committee had felt itself entitled to report. If the higher classes were not connected, yet it did appear that the conspirators, however foolishly or wrongfully, persuaded themselves and others, that when a fortunate event should arrive, a movement would be made as the avant garde of a revolution, and that then certain individuals of eminence would place themselves at their head. (Hear.) Though such individuals might not, and perhaps could not, be justly charged by the laws of their country, yet in the eyes of God and man they stood responsible for the calamities that might thus be brought upon the country, and for the lives of the wretched persons who might be convicted and suffer through the delusions practised upon them, by their being taught that they were so countenanced. (Hear, hear, hear.) Having made these preliminary observations, he should proceed further in what he thought a fair view of our danger, and what ought to be done to meet it. The report was from a committee, not formed of one party exclusively, but of gentlemen of various opinions on general politics; and he did not go too far when he observed, that this committee was unanimous that a conspiracy exists, having for its object the subversion of the institutions, laws, and constitution of the country. If the information proceeded to the extent, he contended that its object was not to be looked to as a future and eventual circumstance, on vague and uncertain grounds, but as a desperate conspiracy which threatened an insurrection, and which had, in point of fact, exploded already. (Hear.) It was true, it had not been joined by all the evil-disposed who were expected to join it, yet it did appear, from the extent to which it went, and from the means provided, that they did sincerely look for some likelihood of success. (Hear.) In this respect there was an additional sign of danger compared with that of former cases: then the House judged from circumstances. He remembered no instance, except indeed in Ireland, of the seditious having gone the length of war, and attempted to seize the metropolis by force of arms, and overturn the State. (Hear.) Here was a proof of the dangerous circumstances in which we were placed. There was a character of wildness and desperation in this treason of the lower classes; but the guilt and danger were more imminent, for it left nothing to calculation. The fact of a conspiracy was established, and proceedings had gone so far as to attempt to levy war, and to aim at the subversion of the Government by force of arms. But it would not be wise, in providing the proper means of guarding against dangerous machinations, to be regulated merely by the consideration of the violent and daring attempt to seize the metropolis and the Government. He did not hesitate to say, that if the matter stood only on the transactions of that day, and if he saw no intention to organize the country in order to support that or similar efforts, he might have regarded the affair as contemptible, considering that the attempt was put down: but he should disguise the truth if he narrowed his view merely to the metropolis, or separated that from the organized system carrying forward in various other places under the mask of Reform. He did not deny, that some individual societies meant sincerely to pursue what they considered Parliamentary Reform; yet many of them had very different views, and considered what was called Paliamentary Reform as a sort of half measure, or rather as an embarrassment. In this class there was a general purpose of co-operation by means of physical force, by which they expected to be able to control the legitimate authorities, and to force the legislature to those changes which they might demand. The House was not bound to trace these Hampden and Spencean clubs through all their bearings and ramifications, and have every particular of their various and different regulations. Nothing could be legally done against them except what was proved: but who doubted, that almost all of them proceeded upon the principle of self-extension? The greater part of them put on the mask of a Reform: for instance, the Hampden Clubs, which were vehicles for sending forth the worst principles tending to revolution. Some might be sincere reformers; but the great mass received the Spencean doctrines among them. It appeared manifest, then, that there was a most wicked conspiracy for subverting the constitution, and that the conspirators had proceeded to arms. The large meetings were meant merely as instruments for covering the evil design, and those most active in the clubs were among the most active to assemble such meetings as that in Spafields. It was not for him to examine into the views of the individual who had presented the petition (Hunt); but admitting all he said in his petition, yet it did not shew that the meeting was not deliberately called to feel the pulse of the people; and that, because on November 15th they were not sufficiently ripe for action, the 2d of December was looked to, as the public mind might by that time become more exasperated, and so afford a fairer prospect of success. We must, therefore, look to our situation in a treason of this description, availing itself of all possible means and instruments; but the meetings were only part of their schemes; which he did not believe they yet abandoned, hoping, as they did, for a convenient moment to make a desperate effort, after they had gradually more and more corrupted the minds of the unthinking, more particularly of the manufacturing class, who, of all classes, ought least to promote revolution. Though agriculturists might retain a degraded and impoverished existence, a revolution always ruined manufacturers. They ought therefore to look with horror at such a change: yet unfortunately, they were exposed to the arts and stratagems of deluders, who exasperated and poisoned their minds. Such being the nature of our danger, he felt himself bound now to state the system of measures which Ministers thought it incumbent on them to recommend to the House, with the view of strengthening the Executive Government. He then referred to a bill brought into the other House, and which would probably come before the House of Commons—he meant the bill by which a temporary suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act would be occasioned. The proposition of no public measure could give him such great personal pain. He wished to take the fullest responsibility. Though in the practice of the constitution the measure had been repeatedly resorted to, yet no measure ought to be adopted with greater repugnance. No law was so useful and so characteristic of the constitution as the Habeas Corpus Act; yet they would betray their duty, even to the liberties of the country, if they neglected a measure above all others calculated effectually to provide for the safety of the State, and its security against the blows levelled at it. (Hear.) Perhaps the necessity for suspension might grow in a considerable degree out of the tenderness with which the crime of treason was treated. The crime lay under a greater jealousy of proof than any other in the evidence requisite to convict. Two witnesses were required to prove the overt act. The State might hear and know of the crime intended to be committed, and yet could not arrest the conspirators, who were almost on the point of deluging their country with blood. For some particular reasons they might not have complete legal evidence, and the criminals would avail themselves of a Habeas Corpus. By the proposed measure the objects of conspirators might be defeated before they exploded, through the information of Government. Without it they could not deal effectually with conspirators, for all their operations would be fettered. He felt strongly his reluctance to suspend this great and important charter of our liberties; yet during the last 25 years there had not been a more imperious necessity for doing so than now. He would propose it with every proper guard. For the present, he should reserve himself on the subject: but he had no intention to propose its continuance beyond the present session of Parliament, leaving it to their wisdom to renew it, or to let it drop. It was a great gratification to find that nothing existed to render the suspension necessary in Ireland, which was in a state of tranquillity, and which, he hoped, had drawn useful lessons from experience, and was improving in loyal and peaceable dispositions, by which her prosperity would be best promoted. From this indispensable measure, to which he resorted with great reluctance, he should proceed to notice others which he also considered indispensable to our safety. A law was passed in 1793, on the occasion of a daring outrage offered to his Majesty in the exercise of one of his most solemn functions—going to deliver his speech from the throne in Parliament: a similar atrocity had, as they well knew, been disgracefully attempted towards the Prince Regent. A law was made to regulate proceedings upon attacks on the Sovereign. In what he meant in this branch of the subject, there could not be a second opinion. He wished to extend the same legal protection to the person of the Prince Regent as to the King. For this purpose he should therefore bring in a bill. There was another important point for Parliament to consider. It appeared now, as it had on former occasions, that hopes were entertained by the disaffected, of seducing the soldiers and sailors from their allegiance; for this object systematic efforts had been made. The House would not hesitate to say, that it was indispensably necessary to protect the soldier against these enticements: and therefore, to make this measure a permanent part of the law, regarding this great crime. The soldier was bound by his oath of obedience and fidelity to the King; therefore he could not suppose two opinions on this point. He came now to a branch of the subject which had occasioned great differences of opinion in 1795: but he trusted that the motives which influenced the Legislature in 1795 and 1799, would produce the same result in the present instance, with respect to the prevention of seditious meetings. The bill was passed for three years. The act of 1799 rendered all secret illegal, and all those affiliations, &c. which aimed at employing physical force. Though it was declared, and held to be legal, to meet and petition, and though no obstacle was to be thrown in the way of the right of petitioning, yet it was felt quite necessary to stop the progress of dangers growing out of the diffused principles of the French revolution, by a combination of various societies spread throughout the country, and who, as they increased, think themselves superior to the Parliament and the State. The House did not view this as a temporary danger in 1799, but thought it so abhorrent to the constitution as to deal with it by a perpetual law. But this law was rendered ineffectual in operation from an inadvertency in framing it. Several provisions of the act of the 39th of the King referred to parts of the 36th of the King, which was only a temporary law, and expired. So far, therefore, as the act of the 39th depended on that of the 36th, it was defeated in its operations. It became therefore necessary to avert the apprehended danger, to renew the act of the 39th with the provisions of that of the 36th, called the Sedition Bill. Formerly there had been meetings at Copenhagen-house, and other places, and proceedings, alarming to the loyal and well-disposed, but no public acts of violence had been committed. The Legislature did not wait for the effects; but provided against the nature and character of them. At large indiscriminate public meetings, popular orators tried the effect of their seditious harangues in leading the people to the commission of flagrant crimes, such even as high treason, and managed themselves in the way best calculated to work upon their blind instruments. This case the House had now before them. The thing was actually done in 1817. Under the pretence of seeking a Reform, the meeting was held for the purpose of seeing whether the minds of the public were sufficiently ripe. Government must be besotted if they waited for a repetition of those disgraceful transactions, for which Parliament had before passed a bill under circumstances comparatively speculative. There was nothing to record as to the manner of executing the former law of suspension, to render them doubtful with respect to passing it now. It announced to the people the determination of Parliament, that the right of petitioning should not be perverted into the direct means of corrupting the public mind. The public mind was responsive to nothing so much as to the fixed and declared opinions of Parliament. The representation, which was vilified by some, was also responsive to the mind of the public. He did not doubt when Parliament spoke with authority, that many deluded persons would change their conduct; and that the meetings would disappear as before, under the moral influence of the law, and without the necessity of enforcing its execution. There were systematic arrangements for promoting blasphemy, treason, and immorality. In general we could have no better security against them than the moral and religious habits of the public. At present restraints were necessary: nothing seemed better adapted for this purpose than to put the debating societies under the regulations of the act in 1795. These debating societies were held in some room in every public-house resorted to by the disaffected and their clubs: they were called generally, Societies for Light and Information. The Spenceans go to the Hampden Clubs. There had been societies of United Irishmen, London Corresponding Societies, &c. &c. Yet the Spencean Clubs carried on them a most particular mark of oblation. The noble lord (Cochrane) had said, that the Spenceans were only about 100 in number; but the evidence went far beyond that which was stated by some of the officers of the clubs themselves. They professed to aim at general happiness, as all the reformers did. (Hear.) If one looked at the Spencean creed, it was a beautiful specimen of this. The Hampden Club people must not think their system more beautiful than the Spencean. The scheme of the latter was the general distribution of the land. It was extraordinary that in these times such a sect as this should exist in direct hostility to all the fundamental principles of society. The Hampden Club was found passing the same resolutions as the Spencean. The committee had documents shewing that Hampden Clubs at Sheffield, &c. made references to the Hampden Club in London; and in September, 1816, it was resolved that any member paying 20s. to the club at Sheffield, should become an honorary member of the club in London. These country clubs referred to that in London. But it would be futile to waste time in special pleading on the difference of the clubs, for they converted their names from one denomination to another with great facility. The Hampden Club made resolutions in the same words as the Union Club, and the Bath Union Club does the same with the Hampden. The Government would be drivellers if they did not proceed against the whole of them, as a common enemy. (Hear.) The Spenceans sought to entwine themselves around them all. The other clubs were contented to let the Spencean principles be infused into them, as a principle of plunder. These wretched mechanics occupied themselves in discussing agrarian laws, and schemes for making all England a sort of parish-property. In their goodness, however, they proposed not to destroy the present land-owners, but to allow them pensions out of the parochial funds. All this was described in florid language. He had the Spencean creed in his pocket: it was drawn up with much ability and considerable eloquence. It was worth buying for a curiosity. They held out to their converts the same delusion that Buonaparte used to encourage his armies with—namely, that at the end of the war they should all obtain certain lands; and he believed these phantasmagorists and promoters of a golden age, would, after fighting and triumphing in the sacred cause of mankind, find themselves just about as near obtaining their promised reward of acres, as Buonaparte's soldiers were to getting their landed remunerations. This system was clearly nothing but a cloak under which to fight against what were called the privileged order, the land-owners, and those monsters, as they were termed, the fundholders. (Hear.) Such, however, were the rewards held out for traitorous exertions. (Hear.) It was an object to inoculate their principles into all the clubs. One could hardly tell what was the original and what the incidental disposition of many of the clubs. Now he should propose in viewing all these evils—first, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; secondly, to extend the provisions of the act of 1795 to the security of the person of the Prince Regent; thirdly, to embody in one act the provisions of the former acts against seditious meetings in two branches : one against tumultuous meetings, and the other to regulate the Debating Societies, taking the provisions of the 39th of the King, against all societies administering illegal oaths, and all those bound together by secret affiliations : also to make the appointment of a delegate from one society to another a proof of their affiliation. (Hear.) He hesitated not to contend, that the provisions of the law ought to be permanent against aggregating societies : and trusted the House would see it made effectual. But he did not wish the law against Debating Societies and seditious meetings to remain in force longer than the necessity of the case ; therefore he had taken a shorter period than formerly. He hoped that the sense of Parliament, and the sound and the discerning part of the community, would make the prevailing absurdities fall to the ground with rapidity. Though the theories were of so absurd and disgusting a character, yet they were dangerous enough to call on Parliament to act with a vigilant and determined hand, to relieve the public mind from the bondage of despicable men, countenanced too much by the conduct of men of higher rank and importance. (Hear.) They must therefore be prompt and efficacious. He was as reluctant to propose those measures as any gentleman could be on the other side of the House, whatever language he might assume respecting the Constitution. (Hear.) Ministers would have betrayed their duty, had they hesitated from mere personal repugnance. On these grounds, then, he exercised this painful act of duty arising out of the report. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill for the more effectually preventing seditious meetings.

Mr. Ponsonby said, that having been a member of the Committee, he might, perhaps, mention some things that ought not to be mentioned. If he did so, he should wish the noble lord to correct him. It was true the Committee were unanimous. The noble lord was right in saying that there was nothing in the report not believed in his sober judgment, and, as far as he knew, of the other members, this was correct. The noble lord mentioned several remedies for the cure of the distemper ; and stated three or four measures he wished to introduce and carry. He would extend to the Prince Regent the protection given to the King ; in the propriety of which, he (Mr. P.) was disposed entirely to concur. It was better for Parliament to do this upon a particular occasion, than to legislate on such a point generally, thereby incorporating the Regent with the King ; as there were circumstances attending the King not strictly applicable to the Regent. The noble lord wished also to guard against the seduction of the troops : he would agree to the introduction of such a law. The Parliament gave to the Crown an army, for the use of which the Ministers were the responsible persons : but still it was the King's army ; and the law ought not to be so loose as that a doubt should exist in the minds of any, whether any part of that army belonged to the King, or to the mob. (Hear.) The noble lord also wished for a law uniting the provisions of the 36th and 39th of the King, so incorporating them into one effectual act. As far as the noble lord had stated his intentions, it was impossible for him at present to give an opinion upon it : but he for one felt no objection to the introduction of the bill. It was his sincere desire to go every length, consistent with duty and propriety, to strengthen the hands of Government, and provide for the general security. As for those foolish and criminal people called the Spenceans, nothing could be more absurd and contemptible, than their designs when known, understood, and watched : but he yet could imagine, that if they were allowed to run their length, they might become far from contemptible—they might become formidable. (Hear.) He only, however, assented to the introduction of the bill, not pledging himself to a single clause it might contain. But to the proposal to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, he would give his decided opposition. (Hear.) He had a particular dislike to debating by anticipation. He wished always to argue only on what was before the House. (Hear.) When the bill came before them, he should state his sentiments unreservedly, and at as much length, if necessary, as he should think befitted him. With respect to the duty of Ministers in making the communication, he felt it due to them to say, that had he been in the Cabinet, he should have thought it, under all the circumstances, his duty to make it. (Hear.) He did not wish to raise any alarms, or to throw odium on any persons : but he must observe, that the noble lord might have been a little more prudent in his observations. It seemed unbecoming in him, as a Minister and a member of the Committee, so to express himself as to draw down a suspicion on the head of any man. He was sure that was not the feeling of the Committee. If they had felt it right to do so, they would have been manly enough to have done it properly. (Hear.) He did not, however, know on whom the noble lord intended to throw any imputation whatever. (Hear.) He did not feel it desirable to say any more at present. Of some points he had given his unqualified approbation ; on others he required time for consideration : and to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act he expressed his opposition, on the fullest reflection from the day when he was appointed a member of the Committee. The nature of the case did not require this remedy. He could not vote to give such a power to any administration ; not even to one composed of his best friends in the world, unless he was convinced, by good reasons, that the Constitution could not be protected by any other means. His opinion was, that other means existed, and therefore he decidedly objected to it. (Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the conspirators in their proceedings had looked forward to the appointment of some committee of public safety, which they imagined might be composed of some individuals, who it was thought improbable would be connected with them.

Sir Francis Burdett said, that having so very different an impression from reading the report of the Committee of Secrecy, from that of the noble lord opposite, or the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Ponsonby) near him, he could not give a silent vote on the occasion. Seeing so much exaggeration of well-known facts, and such unauthorized insinuations against persons who were innocent: believing that an attempt was made to create alarm for no other purpose, than as a ground for measures which would prevent the people from demanding their rights, he felt that he should not be doing his duty if he did not oppose in limine these new regulations which Ministers had proposed. He called them new regulations, though they might plead precedent in their favour, because the circumstances, when they were first enacted, bore no resemblance to its condition now, when their re-enactment is contemplated. It seemed to him absurd and ridiculous to pretend that there was any necessity for new laws to suppress or guard against the efforts of a few wild enthusiasts. It appeared ludicrous for men of property, to whom an alarm was now sounded, to stand in fear, lest they should be deprived of their property by a plan that was known to exist for more than twenty years, and which could have no formidable adherents. He was convinced that they would neither surrender their estates, nor stand by and see them taken from them. (Hear.) He could not believe that the gentlemen of England would exhibit such weakness, or would be compelled to yield to such projects; but if there was any danger proceeding from the scheme of dividing the land of the country, he was sure that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act could bring no remedy or afford any protection. The most efficacious measure that could be adopted in such a case, would be the arming of the country for its own safety, on the plan proposed by Sir W. Jones. The men of property might then be protected against the Spencean plan of the societies for the division of land, and of the ex-Spencean plan of the noble lord, for seizing the national funds. (Lord cries of hear.) The report of the Secret Committee, and the speech of the noble lord alluded to pamphlets of various kinds that poisoned the public mind. He held in his hand a pamphlet which was written in the temper of the noble lord's speech, and contained useful hints. It was entitled, "Reform the Watchword of Revolution;" and contained, among other recommendations, advice to all the friends of order to oppose the revolutionary doctrines that were now prevalent in Europe, and to stand up against Reform, because it might prove the occasion of introducing a foreign army to suppress disturbances, and might lead to a state of things that would end in despotism. Now, whether this would be the consequence of the solemn league between the Sovereigns of Europe, he could not say. If it was, a foreign army could only be called in, because a native one was not prepared to plunge their swords into the bosom of their countrymen. The liberties of the country were sufficiently endangered by the standing army we already possessed. It was considered as the police of the country, or as the auxiliaries of the police. It met us every where, and if allowed to exist much longer in its present magnitude, would endanger our freedom and subvert the Constitution. Wherever a Government was supported by a standing army it became a Military Government, and a Military Government was another word for despotism. If we were to have a standing force, let it be on Sir W. Jones's plan; if we were to have a protection against the Spencean societies, let us neither look for it from the suspension of our most sacred laws, or the throwing new powers into the hands of Government. Could Mr. Spence's disciples prevail on the land proprietors to divide their estates; could that pamphlet, which the noble lord said was well written, induce those who had property to allow those who had it not to deprive them of it, and to parcel it out as they pleased? (Hear.) If mischievous blasphemies and seditious pamphlets were published for effecting these objects, for overthrowing our Constitution, and sapping the morals of the people, had we not laws for them? If conspiracies existed, could the conspirators not be brought to punishment on our present system? If blasphemy was published, could the authors of it not be brought to trial, and suffer punishments adequate to the offence? Where was the power of the Attorney-General? What greater control could he claim over the press? Could he not by ex officio informations and special juries destroy the liberty of the press altogether? Indeed, it would be better to destroy the liberty of the press altogether, to make an Act against any free public communication of your thoughts, than to lay such traps for us as we are at present liable to fall into. An ex post facto law might as well be made, and every person transgressing it punished. Adverting to the report of the Committee of the House of Commons, he remarked, that he saw nothing in it about the Union Societies so much spoken of in that of the other House. In them the most dangerous conspiracies were discovered, and plans were said to be hatched to overturn the State. If his Majesty's Ministers were aware of these combinations, and really thought them so formidable, why not take measures earlier against them, why delay so long to call Parliament together? (Hear, hear, hear.) One would have supposed that the noble lord was himself embarked in the conspiracy (Hear.) from his long concealment of it. The Prince Regent in his speech from the throne said nothing about them, and did not even hint at their existence. He was so far from it, that he praised the fortitude and patience with which the people bore their privations. If combination, and treason, and conspiracy had existed then, why not mention them? If all was hope and tranquillity at that time, what had since occurred to alter, not only the opinions of Ministers, but the measures of Parliament? (Hear.) With respect to clubs, he himself belonged to more than one of those from whom danger, treason, and conspiracy were said to spring. He (Sir Francis) owed allegiance to the laws and the constitution, but he owed no allegiance to the Ministers of the day, he owed no allegiance to the borough-mongers of the House, and he believed that the cry of treason was raised from a dread of a Reform of the House. (Hear, hear, hear.) The measures proposed were intended to prevent the people from meeting to express their grievances, now so severely felt, and to demand their rights, now so universally understood. (Hear.) He happened to be Chairman of one of the dangerous and denounced Hampden Clubs. (Hear.) It was now it would appear treason to meet for political discussion, or to correspond with others of the same opinions. (Hear.) He remembered the time when such was not the case. He remembered that in 1780, Mr. Pitt, who then had great influence over him (Sir F.) from the principles he maintained, had supported the cause of Reform without being exposed to the charge of sedition. He had given strong reasons for Reform. That Reform had not taken place, and all the evils under which we at present laboured, had arisen from the failure of the attempt. Without Reform we could have no security for our rights or our property, against that sect to which the noble lord belonged. (Hear.) He (Sir F.) was a member of the Hampden Club; he had the misfortune likewise to belong to the Union Club, both proscribed by the noble lord. He was called a traitor for mingling in such societies; whereas he taxed the noble lord with being a traitor—he would tell him he had committed offences for which he ought to be impeached (Hear, hear); and for which he would have been impeached, if he had not been protected by the general participation of his crime. (Hear, hear.) He had committed more treasons than all the Union Clubs put together! he had endangered more the safety and the Constitution of the country. (Hear.) The noble lord was an old offender. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) Let his conduct in Ireland be considered; let the bloody course he there pursued be duly taken into account, and this country would see reason for being on its guard against him. (Hear, hear.) He should not be allowed here to adopt the measures which he introduced there. Ireland, during the season of his power, had witnessed scenes at which the blood curdles—scenes which he could not venture to describe—scenes that would for ever exist as a lasting stain in the History of England. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord had not only dealt in corruption by retail, but had carried on the trade by wholesale: he had sold the Irish Parliament at once. Having led it to disgrace itself by its shameful prostitution, he induced it to commit suicide upon itself, as an act of political justice. (Hear, hear.) Adverting to the report, the hon. baronet described it as vague, general, and indefinite. It said, there were few, if any, of the higher orders that had lent themselves to violent projects. He would ask, are there any? (Hear, hear.) If there are any, let them be named. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) The report was said to be unanimously agreed to by the members of the Committee, who were not all ministerial. There were some, he allowed, in the Committee, who sat on the same side of the House as that where he now sat: but without meaning any disrespect to them, he would say, that they were all notorious alarmists. (Loud cries of hear.) A noble lord (Milton,) one of them, had said on a former evening, that he never heard Reform mentioned without its shaking every nerve in his body. (Hear, hear, and no, no.) So far as the Union Societies were concerned, the report of the Commons said nothing; and although a petitioner presented a petition to the other House, which was so strangely rejected (Order), there was no evidence that it had done any thing to deserve such notice. This society had existed only a short time, and had done only one act, or issued one declaration. If the lords were mistaken in this case, what reliance could be placed on their Report to others? Might not their allegations against other societies turn out equally unfounded? If there were evidence against them, why not produce it? (Hear.) He might ask in the words of a Roman poet:

Quo cecidit sub crimine? quisnam
Delator? quibus indicis? quo teste probavit?
Nil horum: verbosa epistola venit.

If these societies, however, and the other persons against whom the report was drawn up, were really so dangerous, why not make a special law for their particular case, rather than suspend the law for the whole nation? With regard to the change in the law of treason, he saw no necessity for it. The Prince Regent was, to all intents and purposes, the Sovereign; but he saw no necessity for the statute of 1796, which modified the ancient law of treason. With respect to the gagging-bill, he thought it intended against the Reformers. If so, in God's name, let any petition for Reform be declared high treason at once. (Hear, hear.) Till it was so, he would support it with the utmost of his ability, as he believed in his conscience, that without a Reform, security of property and personal liberty could not exist much longer in this country. (Loud cries of hear.)

Mr. W. Eliot trusted, that the importance of the subject would plead his apology for a few observations. The measures proposed were of such consequence, that they should neither be adopted nor rejected, without the fullest consideration. He (Mr. E.) would not follow the hon. baronet (Sir F. Burdett) into all the topics of his speech, as general declamation could have little effect, where strict argument and deep reflection were demanded. The laws proposed were not brought forward as speculative improvements of Government, but as necessary precautions for its safety. (Hear, hear.) A nation might be in such a situation as to be obliged to choose between two evils, and resort to measures not positively good in themselves, but indispensable to preserve acknowledged benefits. A suspension of some privileges might in some cases be necessary to protect the rest. Particular laws might sometimes be strengthened or altered, that the frame of the government might be kept from destruction. The question here was merely a question of danger. (Hear, hear.) He stated it to be a question of danger, because, though he (Mr. E.) agreed with his right hon. friend (Mr. P.) on the general matters of the report, he differed with him on the extent of the danger. Now, if it were necessary to make out a large combination—if it were necessary to shew powerful parties, established over different parts of the country, prepared with all manner of force and union for acting against the constitution—if this were necessary to lay the grounds of the proposed measure, he (Mr. E.) allowed they would be uncalled for; but he submitted whether, if affairs arrived at this extremity, we should not speak of the field, and give up legislation? (Hear, hear.) The danger, though not of this kind, was far from being trifling. It consisted in attempts to corrupt the great body of the people, both morally and politically. (Hear, hear.) The people might by some be despised, and their efforts treated with contempt, but the House would see the impolicy of this kind of language or conduct, when it considered the danger of separating the moral from the physical strength of the nation. (Hear, hear.) The process with which this mischievous and unfortunate result was to be brought about, was by immoral and blasphemous publications, by societies expressly formed for overthrowing the Government; and by others acting under the mask of Reform, but Reform of a wild and fanatical kind. It was said that these societies were nothing, because they were of a partial nature; but their effect would be measured when their union and combination were weighed. Let any one consider in his own neighbourhood, Manchester for instance, the effect of a society of the lowest of the people meeting for discussions on the foundations of government and society, the extent of obedience due to the civil power, and mooted the most delicate questions on resistance or submission; and suppose another society at some distance corresponding with it, and entering into its designs, which spread over others; would there not be reason for apprehending danger? This was the real state of the case. There were several combinations over the country, some of them of a malignant nature, and would any man tell him that there was no danger?—(Hear, hear.)—danger that struck at the root of social order—danger that required the strongest measures to repress it? (Hear, hear, from the Ministerial benches.) He therefore concurred with his right hon. friend, (Mr. Ponsonby) as far as he went, and was disposed to go farther, and to yield that power into the hands of Ministers, which he was disposed to deny them. Not that he in ordinary cases would give up his personal liberty or that of the country into the hands of Ministers, with whom he differed, if he did not believe in his conscience that there were strong grounds for the measure. (Hear, from the Ministerial benches.) He did so, however, to protect the people from themselves, (Hear) to preserve that grand and generous system under which they enjoyed a degree of happiness and liberty, never before enjoyed by any other nation: convinced that, whatever arts might be employed to distract and delude them, the Constitution under which they lived was still deeply engraved on their hearts, and cherished in their affections. (Hear.) But though the great body of the people are sound, those who were acquainted with history had not to learn that great dangers might arise from a corrupt and despicable minority. (Hear.) If at present, when there were so many manufacturers without work, discharged sailors and soldiers, and such a mass of general and irritating distress, if the means of inflammation were not crushed, it might be afterwards necessary to put such a power into the hands of Government, as would amount to despotic sway. (Hear.) He, and some of his friends, had been called alarmists by the hon. baronet. He had entertained the same sentiments 25 years. He therefore allowed, that he might have a prejudice in favour of opinions that had flowed in a perpetual current through his mind for so long a period; but if the proposition was true, as applied to him (Mr. E.) on one side, might it not apply to the hon. baronet on the other? (Hear.) If he (Mr. E.) had seen dangers where there were none, had not others seen none where they really existed? (Hear.) And while he was accused of being too sensible to fear, might he not advise others to take care that they were not too confident of security? (Hear, hear.)

The Hon. Mr. Lamb denied that the report was in reality what it was called, a libel on the people of England. It took the utmost care to distinguish between the sound part of the people, and the incendiaries; between those who endeavoured to delude them, and the more worthy part of them, who had not been misled or excited. The hon. baronet, in order to throw discredit on the report, and on those of this side of the House who concurred in its statements and inferences, had described him (Mr. L.) and his friends as notorious alarmists. This giving of names was neither decent nor parliamentary, nor gentleman-like. (Order.) If this language was not consistent with the usage of Parliament, he would then say, that the hon. baronet's expressions were not consistent with usual good taste. (Hear, hear.) If he (Mr. L.) were to retort upon the hon. baronet, and call him, in return for notorious alarmist, a notorious jacobin, (Hear,) it would not be decent or Parliamentary; and yet there might be as much reason for this charge on the hon. baronet, as for that which he had brought forward against others. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) The hon. baronet had alluded, not very properly, to a noble friend of his (Lord Milton) on a former debate, but he had entirely mistaken his meaning. He would not attribute motives to any one; but without meaning any thing disrespectful to the hon. baronet, he (Mr. L.) might say, that to censure as he (Sir Francis Burdett) had done, and to deal about general imputations and insinuations, required, in order to justify it, a degree of talent, of wisdom, and of purity, which, with all his wishes to think well of the hon. baronet, he could never recognize him to possess. (Gries of hear.) With respect to the report he would say, that he firmly believed the truth of its facts, and the justness of its inferences. It was founded on the best evidence that could be procured; and, above all, was qualified by the evidence of circumstances. There appeared to the committee to be danger, and danger of the most alarming kind. The danger arose from clubs determined to carry their objects by physical force. It was not the Spencean plan that appeared on paper, with all its absurdities about it; but it was a general system of combination cruelly oppressive in many cases, and highly detrimental to the interests of the country. Many had relied on the absurdity of the Spencean plan, as destructive of its danger: but he (Mr. L.) was afraid he could not pay so high a compliment to the people in this or in any other country, as to suppose that the absurdity of a project, if the end seemed desirable, was a sufficient argument against any attempt to realize it. (Hear, hear.) It was certainly wild and visionary, if viewed in all its parts; but its commencement in plunder might not be so objectionable to its adherents. It might be said of it, as was said of Reform, that some would take steps and gain a beginning, some would go the length of Brentford, and others would pass on to Windsor. So the Spenceans would seize the property of the country, and wrest it from its present possessors, whatever might afterwards become of them or of it. They reminded him of what Napoleon said when he was advised not to enter the palace of the Thuilleries before his coronation as emperor, "I will enter it to-morrow," said he, "and I shall not go out so easily as the last inhabitant." (Hear, hear.)

Sir Francis Burdett explained.—He did not mean alarmist in a bad sense; but jacobin could not be used in a good one, as it generally passed for cut-throat.

Lord Milton, in explanation of his meaning on a former debate, said that he used the expression about Reform, touching a chord that vibrated without his controul, not for the purpose of declaring that he was alarmed at Reform, but for stating that it was a subject on which he was almost always disposed to speak long; and, in delivering his sentiments, on which he might be tedious to the House.

Sir S. Romilly.—Before the House proceeded to adopt any new measure, there were some considerations that appeared worthy of its attention. He was not disposed to underrate the evils of the country, or the dangers that arose out of them. He felt that the evils were great, and the dangers were formidable. (Hear.) When he so spoke, it became him to say what he meant. These dangers, then, did not appear to him to threaten the Constitution. The persons mentioned in the report were too insignificant; they could not carry their designs into execution. The danger appeared to him to threaten individuals. His right hon. friend (Mr. Eliot) had not succeeded in proving to him the necessity of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, nor had the noble lord shewn the necessity of his other measures. There was great danger of rashness in legislating; and if there had been a due consideration of what the law was as it at present existed, and how far Government had endeavoured to carry it into execution, he was convinced that the committee would not have recommended any change. The noble lord was mistaken in his speech, in supposing that no law existed against secret meetings. There were strong, efficacious, and severe enactments against such seditious or secret meetings, against societies that took oaths, against societies that corresponded or had an interchange of delegates, against societies that required contributions of money; all persons who are found guilty, are liable to transportation for seven years. All these clauses were embodied in the 39th of the King, c. 79, which was still in force. The hon. and learned gentleman read the act itself, which he said was still the law of the land, and sufficient to suppress all dangerous clubs, societies, or meetings. The clause against debating societies had dropt out of this act by the expiration of the 36th of the King, from which it was adopted, but every other part of it yet remained in force. Had these societies grown up under the Government, or without its knowledge, while they had such means of suppression in the act in question? The concluding paragraph of the report "that the utmost vigilance of Government, under the existing laws, was found inadequate to the dangers," was very remarkable, and shewed that the committee were not aware of this act, or did not know what efforts Government had used. If these laws were not effectual, what could be effectual? What steps had been taken by Ministers to enforce them? The only other part of the report referred to blasphemous and seditious libels. It should be known here likewise, how far existing laws had been enforced before new powers were claimed. Punishment for a second offence in publishing libels was very severe. Why had not prosecutions taken place for a first offence, so as to lay the foundation of a punishment for a second, if it should be repeated before a new law was claimed for a severe visitation on a first? He did not urge extreme proceedings in enforcing laws, but he thought their whole extent should be tried before the Legislature was called upon to make new statutes. An extreme desire to procure conviction might be hurtful, as in a case at the Old Bailey, where a person (Watson) was put on his trial capitally for an offence of which, on the statement of the case to the learned judge, he was acquitted; and from this circumstance, although his crime was great, turned the sympathy of the spectators into a kind of indiscreet triumph. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded a speech of considerable length (for which our limits allow us no more space), by declaring his opinion that the proposed measures were as uncalled for by necessity, as they were contrary to the constitution.

The Attorney-General said, that the Government with reluctance introduced any measures of additional severity. The noble lord was not mistaken in calculating the effect of the existing laws, as his hon. and learned friend (Sir S. Romilly) had stated. If statutes could be evaded, it was necessary to amend them. His hon. and learned friend asked what the law-officers of the Crown had been doing? They had looked long and anxiously at the subjects of the report's complaints, but they could not reach them. The most blasphemous and seditious publications, as they appeared every where, they were unable to restrain from their numbers. The rule on which he acted was to prosecute as little as possible. Formerly a single passage or article in a newspaper was all that those in his situation had to prosecute; now he could not follow up the 20th part of the publications pointed out to his attention. They were distributed by children, and if any interruption was given them, there was the loudest clamour against the invasion of the liberty of the subject. He could tell the House, however, that some of these publications had been under consideration, and the delinquents would be sent before a jury of their countrymen. He would rather, however, err on the side of lenity, than appear to run down the liberty of the subject by numerous prosecutions. The hon. and learned gentleman explained the case of Watson, and shewed, that after the information given before the magistrate, and the grand jury finding a true bill, it was necessary to bring him to trial on the charge for which he was indicted.

The Solicitor-General observed, that the report was not confined to the proceedings of one description of societies, but described an evil resulting from a combination of causes, for which the law at present furnished no adequate provision. There was undoubtedly a law for the punishment of riots, but there was none at present to prevent them. He knew of no provision made by any statute that could be applied to these societies, which acted independently of each other, though upon principles common to all, and assuming even the same denomination. Had his hon. and learned friend (Sir S. Romilly) looked into the 39th of the King, cap. 79, with his usual accuracy, he must have seen, that those associations to which he had referred were not within its meaning; and his own opinion was, that they had been organized for the purpose of evading it. The object of the act was certainly to prevent unlawful confederacies, but it did not extend to societies which communicated with each other by delegates at public meetings, and, perhaps, this was an omission in that act.

Mr. Brougham declared, that although suffering under severe indigestion, yet having listened to the noble lord's new plan of legislative measures, and the conversation to which their disclosure had given rise, after hearing the concessions made by his right hon. and learned friend (Mr. Ponsonby,) natural perhaps to him as one of the committee upon whose report these measures were founded, he must express a very material difference of opinion. That diversity of sentiment which it must always give him pain to entertain might proceed from his ignorance of the evidence, from his being compelled to look at the Report, and the Report only; and if that should appear not satisfactory, the necessity he was under of opposing the practical result, which was no other than a suspension of the British Constitution. (Hear, hear.) There were some circumstances, certainly, which tended to make him a little inquisitive, as to the grounds upon which the Report was framed, and one of these was a remarkable difference between the conclusions to which two of his right hon. friends, who concurred in that Report, had come, and which had been stated to the House; the one (Mr. Ponsonby) thinking that the evidence did not call for a temporary repeal of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the other (Mr. W. Eliot) thinking that it did. This appeared to him a very important difference, because it shewed that those who alone had access to a knowledge of the evidence, upon whose report they were to act without further inquiry, did not agree in the same conclusions. This difference must proceed from different views of the extent and amount of the danger, which was in fact the whole substance of the question. He knew not, then, how to estimate the magnitude of that danger, when he found two such distinguished and enlightened members of the committee opposed to each other toto calo with regard to the measures necessary for repelling it. Another ground for the suspicions he entertained was, that although the existing laws were stated to be insufficient, it did not appear that the committee had satisfied themselves whether the utmost vigilance of Government had been exerted in enforcing them. On the face of the Report itself, many things appeared calculated to destroy its effect. Let the House advert, in the first place, to that passage in which the most scrupulous care might have been expected, that in which reference was made to the degree to which reasonable attempts had been traced upwards in society. To this point public attention had been naturally directed; every man was anxious to learn who and what were the conspirators; but the Report, instead of satisfying this curiosity, merely informed them, that "a few only" of the higher orders, or even of the middle classes of society, were engaged. If the committee had meant any thing by these expressions, it was incumbent upon them to have spoken out, to have declared their meaning explicitly, and not to have launched these charges, or rather these insinuations, vaguely and indirectly, when they called upon them to lay down their constitutional rights, to submit to a gagging bill to-day, to the punishment of libel by transportation on the next, and to a total suspension of the constitution on a third. (Hear, hear, hear.) Required, as they were, to give unlimited credence, their entire faith, to the accuracy and justness of the Report, it was to be lamented that any part of it should be unsatisfactory. When he considered the very small extent to which actual insurrection had gone, and the smallness of the means by which it had been proposed to maintain it, it did appear marvellous to him, that twenty-one hon. gentlemen should upon such evidence gravely state, that a few wretched Spenceans had met in a place not far distant from the Bank, which they had devoted to pillage, for the purpose of afterwards taking the Tower by a coup de main. They had, it was true, no other military means than a few pike-heads; but Government, he must presume, was utterly unprepared for such an attack. It also appeared by the report, that, without a single sapper or miner, one of their ulterior objects was to be the destruction of all the bridges, an achievement which, although he had no great knowledge as an engineer, he held to be impracticable with such means. (A laugh.) This, therefore, was an additional indication of the looseness or haste with which the statements and conclusions of the committee were drawn, and of the disposition by which they were influenced to believe in the existence of some great public danger. He knew well that the distress now felt was most severe. In consequence of the unprecedented number of hands which had been thrown out of employment, some riots had taken place, and some discontent existed; there were also a few mischievous persons, he believed, willing to convert those discontents into disaffection, for private and wicked purposes; but the conclusion which he drew from all this was, not that the constitution was defective, but that the powers with which the Executive was armed, its civil and military police, and the laws already in force, were more than sufficient to suppress the evil. In support of this conclusion he need refer only to the conduct of Ministers themselves, in order to see whether the danger was real or imaginary, and the alarm professed at it genuine or pretended. His opinion was, at least, that they wished to make the most of it; for they had advised a further prorogation of Parliament at the latter end of last November, when these same disorderly meetings were taking place in the metropolis; and when, to use the language of the Report, the rioters "had assumed the symbols of the French revolution." Tricoloured flags seemed indeed to be great engines with the Spenceans, and one of their best matured schemes was to encourage the manufacture of ribands of three colours. (A laugh.) One would have thought that the wearing of so visible a badge was not the surest bond of any criminal combination; and when he saw observations of this sort mixed up with statements of a design to blow up bridges, and to take fortresses, with no more ammunition than had been found in an old stocking, he could not help regarding it as rather a strange production, and not likely to obtain the greatest degree of credit. An hon. friend of his (Mr. Lamb), who always spoke with great force upon every subject, had observed, that they ought not rashly to despise doctrines because they were absurd, or were entertained only by obscure persons: but it might also be added, that the more absurd an opinion was, the more easy it must be to explode it, and the shorter must be its probable duration. Many were the absurdities which by persecution were forced into reputation, and many established as martyrs who would otherwise have been the laughing-stock of society. No doctrine that ever had been promulgated was more likely, from its monstrous extravagance, to die a natural death, than that of taking away men's property, and doling it out to parishes for the purpose of again equally dividing it among the community. But even a doctrine as ridiculous as this might possibly be magnified into importance by persecuting the miserable enthusiasts who professed it. There was indeed another class of Spenceans, whose object was pillage of a less philosophical kind, who prowled about the highways, and sometimes frequented public places in the shape of pickpockets, and with regard to whom it would be quite sufficient to hand them over to his learned friend the Attorney-general. Mr. Spence, the visionary author of the new system, lived 20 years ago, and published his opinions in stupid prose about that time. Another person, now high in the confidence of his Majesty's Government (the Poet laureate), published precisely the same doctrines, at the same time, in more respectable verse: Down with Kings, Lords, Commons, and even Bishops, equal rights and equal property; and yet this had escaped the attention of the Attorney-general, whom he would advise to read (if any man could read), and compare the two publications. (A laugh.) Mr. Spence, however, was now dead, and the poet held an honourable office under the Crown. His argument was, if doctrines were dangerous, apply to the law for a remedy; for when had it ceased to be a crime to publish or to utter sedition? So long as the Spenceans dwelt on their reasoning, he would abstain from all interference with them; but the provisions of the 37th and 39th of the King, furnished ample security against the danger of seeing their schemes put in execution. The noble lord had greatly mistaken the law as it stands, when he supposed that the last-mentioned statute had become inoperative. He admitted, that if the 36th could not apply to attempts against the person of the Regent, it would be right to adopt some measure for the purpose of extending it to that point. With regard to the difficulty of trying persons for treasons of this particular kind under the statutes of William and of Queen Anne, that difficulty was greatly removed by the 39th and 40th of the King. Having now adverted to the carelessness that appeared to him to preside over the Report, he begged permission to refer to an insinuation thrown out by the noble lord, in which he seemed unwilling to except even all the members of that House. He had told them, that they who, in the discharge of a public duty, gave countenance to meetings which might terminate in mischief, were responsible before God and man for the consequences. He would tell the noble lord, that they who discharged their duty, were not responsible for the acts of other men. Such a hint would be received by them with perfect indifference; it would pass innocuous over their heads; they meant to abide by the Trial by Jury, to trust to the Habeas Corpus, and to be saved by those barriers which our ancestors had flung around us. But if the Constitution was in danger, and it might shortly become a question whether he should go home from that House, or against his will to some other place, then it became an important question for him to consider whether he should arm such Ministers with such powers, for the basest and most pernicious of party purposes. (Hear, hear.) The whole of these measures appeared to have originated in a design to distract and divide their political opponents, as well as to divert the attention of the country from the necessary redress of its grievances. He trusted that a signal failure would attend both these speculations, and was sure that his right hon. and hon. friends, after this discussion should be at an end, would re-unite to prosecute those objects of Retrenchment and Reform, in which they had been so actively engaged. The hon. and learned gent. concluded by stating, that with the exceptions he had already mentioned, he reserved to himself the right of opposing the new measures, although he did not object in limine to their introduction.

Lord Cochrane made a few remarks against so violent an encroachment upon the Constitution. He proceeded to state, that no resource would ultimately be left to the people, but that of withholding their money from the tax-gatherer, when he was interrupted by a general cry of "Order," and an appeal to the chair.

The Speaker declared, that the language of the noble lord was nothing less than to encourage resistance to the laws. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Cochrane said, nothing was farther from his mind than the idea of active resistance; but he conceived he was justified in alluding to a passive resistance, in withholding supplies which enabled the Crown to subvert the liberties of the people.

Mr. Canning did not rise to detain the House at any length, as there was no doubt with regard to the practical effect of the discussion in which they were then engaged. He pretended not to lend any aid to that side of the question which was already so triumphant, but was desirous of observing on some of the facts alleged by the hon. and learned gent. (Mr. Brougham.) He had often heard it remarked, that those who were the most incredulous themselves, were most disposed to make large demands upon the credulity of others; but he never in his life met with such an instance of it, as in the speech of the hon. and learned gent. He had required of the House to believe, that the whole conspiracy which had been disclosed in the Report was fabricated by his Majesty's Ministers, for the purpose of dividing a phalanx who were preparing to drive them from their stations. The extent of this belief must amount to this—that they had first devised a set of principles of more than ordinary absurdity and wickedness; that they had then caused them to be proclaimed by a set of men to whose capacity and situation they appeared the best adapted; and finally threw such an air of plausibility over the whole, as to impose on the understandings of five honourable members, accustomed to act in opposition to them. Of all the extravagant hypotheses upon which men were ever called on to act or reason, this surpassed what he had yet heard addressed to a rational assembly. But the principal fact alleged in support of this theory was, that Parliament had been prorogued in November, about the same time that the proceedings in Spafelds were going on; as if, because Government were aware of these proceedings, they were likely to be more cognizant of their whole character and probable termination than the unhappy man (Mr. Hunt) whose petition had been presented to them that day. He freely acquitted that individual of any such guilty knowledge; he believed that he repaired to those meetings in the perfect innocence and vanity of his heart (a laugh); and that when he thought only of making a splash, he was an unconscious agent in rebellion. His Majesty's Ministers were not unapprised of the possibility of mischief; but so far was he from thinking that it was a sufficient cause for summoning gentlemen from their distant residences, he believed that, had they been assembled, their dispersion would have been an act of infinite wisdom. It was not till Government discovered, in the process of inquiry, that the insurrection was of a more alarming nature, that they resolved to apply to Parliament; and made their reluctance yield to their sense of duty, in asking for additional power. The whole question, however the terms of it might be stated, simply was, Are the existing powers of the Constitution sufficient to protect it from the danger that threatens it? To him it appeared a danger assuming various shapes, as time, place, or circumstances altered; now operating by irreligion, now by sedition, and sometimes by a combination of all means, however unlawful or atrocious, against the whole frame of society in this country. (Hear.) Was it true that doctrines manifestly absurd always carried with them their own practical refutation? Could they apply such a rule to the doctrines which were first started 20 years ago, which appeared to have lain since dormant, and now went forth aimed—not, he agreed, to their own realization, but to that stage, which, if once reached, must involve all in a common destruction. He did not impute to them that they would divide the land, but he did impute to them that they would take the land. He did not think that they would ever succeed in effecting an agrarian division of the soil, but he thought it possible that, if not prevented, they would strip the owners of it, and of their possessions. How could such a doctrine be represented as entirely visionary and absurd, when, to say nothing of modern events, the early History of Rome abundantly proved how well calculated it was to produce a popular impression? Was it no alarming symptom, that a large class of individuals professed objects of speculation which it was allowed would be mischievous in practice? The noble lord who spoke last, had re-echoed sentiments often repeated before, that Parliament was enacting laws against the people: they were indeed enacting them for a majority of the people against that desperate and active minority, that aimed at the destruction of all the bonds of society. And why talk of numbers, when the history of passive majorities, and active and triumphant minorities, riding in blood over the necks of a slaughtered people, furnished a warning that no foe was to be disregarded for the smallness of his force. Why talk of absurdities? as if the history of the French Revolution was not a conquest effected by absurdity over reason! Who, when at the commencement of the Revolution, the Convention decreed death to be an eternal sleep, would not have exclaimed against the possibility of such a doctrine making any progress? who would have imagined that the boasted sovereignty of the people would have ended in the extermination of the most valuable part of the people from the earth? He would not contend that we were now to dread the same consequences; but he used the argument to shew, that absurdity afforded no protection against proselytism, nor minority any safeguard against defeat. It was asked, who was to take the lead in any insurrectionary measure? That had been answered by his hon. friend, in a speech that did him immortal honour. Such a man as could take the lead did not perhaps at present exist: it was occasion that would make him. Did Robespierre, at the commencement of the Revolution, ever look up to the dreadful eminence he afterwards attained? No; but circumstances over which he could exercise no control, raised him to a height from whence he trampled on the necks of his prostrate countrymen. Was this fiction? Would any man who had seen the publications circulated with such devilish zeal, say they were not formed for the eradication of that creed which was the support of all human virtue, the consolation of all human affliction? (Hear.) Would any contend that no mischief could emanate from societies where obscenity was mixed with the contempt of all social order, and where the relaxation of rebellion was infidelity? When such was the crisis, who could doubt whether the arm of Government should be strengthened to meet an emergency so unexampled? We had before had political differences; but then, principle was opposed to principle, and not a negation of all order inculcated: we had before had differences in religion, but they were differences in point of doctrine, and not a negation of all Divine authority, which stripped the victim of his creed, in order that he might become a remorseless assassin.

The question was then put, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill, for more effectually suppressing seditious meetings."

For the Question, Ayes 190, Noes 14.—Majority, 176.

The Bill was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Wednesday.

Lord Castlereagh then presented a Bill to extend to the person of the Prince Regent, the statute of 36th Geo. III. for the better preservation of his Majesty's person; and a Bill to extend the 37th of his Majesty, for rendering more penal the seduction of the soldiery. They were both read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Wednesday.

The House adjourned at half after twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, February 25.

The House went into the proceedings in Sir Edward Owen's Divorce Bill. Mr. Warren attended as Counsel for the Petitioner. It appearing, however, that execution had not been sued out upon the judgment in the Action below, in consequence of the Defendant in that Action having sued out a Writ of Error in the Exchequer Chamber, and stated in behalf of the Petitioner merely for delay,

The Lord Chancellor observed, that the House considered it essential in those cases that there should be proof of every exertion having been made to execute the judgment of the Court below; there must be, however, at all events, in this instance, proof that the Writ of Error was merely sued out for the purposes of delay. The consideration of the case was therefore postponed sine die.

On the motion of the Earl of Lauderdale, an account was ordered of all Offices abolished during the present Reign, of all Offices regulated, and of all those which had been created during the same period, and were now held by individuals.

The Malt Duty Bill was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, February 25.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS.] Sergeant Onslow presented a petition from the Licensed Victuallers of London and its vicinity, 2,200 in number, complaining of the unconstitutional manner in which licenses are granted, and praying for redress. As he understood a Bill on the subject was now in contemplation, he should only move, that the petition be read, and do lie on the table; which being done, the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Barclay concurred in thinking that this was a subject requiring immediate investigation.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Stanley presented a Petition from the town of Clitheroe, praying for a Reform in Parliament; and another from the township of Leigh, which had formerly been rejected on account of a want of signatures. It was now duly signed; and though he was not prepared to go to the extent the Lancashire petitioners had done, he agreed with them on many subjects. The distress in the petitioning township was so great, that the poor-rates were 15s. in the pound.

Sir F. Bardsley presented a Petition praying for Retrenchment and Reform, from the parish of Arnold, in the county of Nottingham.—Ordered to lie on the table.

A Petition from Southwark was presented by Mr. Calvert, which, he said, had been agreed to by a most respectable meeting, with the exception of only one individual. The meeting was composed of Whigs, Tories, and neutrals. The petition prayed for Reform and Retrenchment, and complained of the Septennial Act.

Mr. Barclay wished the House to attend to the tone and character of the Petition, which was signed by most respectable inhabitants of Southwark, of all parties. The distresses of the public could not, in his opinion, be removed by a Parliamentary Reform only. On that subject he had his own opinions, but he hoped, that as the House had not on former occasions been deterred from legislating by a popular clamour, so now he hoped that, when popular clamour was in favour of a particular measure, however irregular popular conduct might be, they would not be deterred on that account from considering fairly the subject proposed.

Sergeant Onslow said, that as he was connected with the county whence this petition came, he must say that it was signed by respectable characters, and that he commended the temperate language in which it was couched. He would go as far as any man in the way of Retrenchment, but could not agree to a committee on a radical change in the constitution of Parliament. He could never consent to that, nor to any measure, unless accompanied by some plan to which he could give his assent. The subject had often occupied his attention; but the plans of many illustrious men had never met his ideas, as better, for practical purposes of representation and liberty, than the existing system.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Atkins Wright presented a Petition from the city of Oxford, praying for Retrenchment and Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Bennet presented a Petition from Church-Stretton, Salop, in favour of Reform. He did not support the doctrine of Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, but he would not contend that nobody else should. The spirit of the Constitution allowed differences of opinion. Let that which was good be defended, and that which was wrong be defeated by argument. The report of the Committee threw calumnies on the people of England. He would say, that a more loyal body had not existed, than the people of the place whence this petition came.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Speirs presented a Petition from the Burgesses, Householders, and other Inhabitants of the Royal Borough of Renfrew, praying for Retrenchment and Parliamentary Reform.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Sir Ronald Ferguson presented a Petition, for the same objects, from the town of Dysart.

Sir W. Geary presented a Petition from Faversham, praying for Parliamentary Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS.] Mr. Courtenay brought in a Bill for the better application of the money raised in Ireland by Grand Jury Presentments for the maintenance of the Roads—Read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Thursday three weeks.

DUTY ON WINE.] Mr. Sharp presented a Petition from certain Wine Merchants, in which they alleged, that ruin must happen to their trade if the duty were not diminished more than one half; from the duties being so high, the loss to the Revenue, in the Port of London only, had been 348,000*l.* within the last year.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, Government certainly had not entertained any idea of lowering the duties. The article of wine was one from which the greatest revenue ought to be drawn.

Mr. Ponsonby thought the right hon. gentleman pursued the worst means of obtaining the greatest revenue. By reducing the duty, Ministers would find the revenue increased, and therefore it was their duty to reduce it.

The petition was laid on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

A message from the Lords informed the House, that their lordships had passed an Act to enable his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as he might suspect of conspiring against the State, and desired the concurrence of the Commons to the said Act.

On Lord Castlereagh's moving that the Bill should then be read a first time,

Mr. Ponsonby complained that the noble lord had intimated no intention to press the Bill, nor had any one understood that the Bill would pass through any stage that night.

Mr. Bennet said that the noble lord, with as much clearness as he usually indulged in, expressly stated that the Bill would not be read till Wednesday.

Lord Castlereagh then gave notice that he should move the first reading to-morrow.

Lord Stanley presented a petition from the cotton-manufacturers, touching the Report of the Secret Committee: among other things they stated, that they had no Spenceans among them, nor any that held such nonsense, and prayed that no measures might be adopted inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir Francis Burdett said, he had a petition to present from the inhabitants of the city of Westminster against the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and he trusted, if time were given by Ministers, that the example of this petition would be followed by many places. He believed other measures proposed by the noble lord were objectionable to the petitioners, as well as that for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, as far as the noble lord revealed them in his little despotic code of last night.—He moved that the petition be brought up.

Lord Cochrane observed, that there was the greatest propriety in the conduct of all persons assembled to hear and agree to this petition.

He entertained no hostile sentiments against the Constitution, and knew none who did. Pass bill or not, in one sense it was indifferent to him. He had never belonged to the Union Club; but of the Hampden Club he was a member; there he had attended but once, when only three members were present. He should never abstain, or be intimidated by the threats or power of Ministers, from meeting his constituents, or those whom he thought it proper to meet, not even by the terror of dungeons, chains, and punishments. He had before displeased the right hon. the Speaker by saying, that the people had no resource but one. It was far from his intention to suggest any thing improper; but when he saw on their journals and records of better times, when oppressive measures were attempted, that the House had thought it its duty to the public to feel it had the power of withholding the supplies (a salutary practice which they had relinquished); then he thought it right to advert to what had been the practice, and a right, he must suppose, delegated to the House by the people. He implored the House to pause in this mad career, before they enacted a change greater than any they could impute to the Reformers; such as a suspension of the liberties and Constitution of the land. Whether Ministers wanted only to serve a present purpose, to alarm the timid, and rally them around them, whatever their object was, even though they did not mean to carry their powers into execution, he should protest against the proceeding as unnecessary and wicked.

Mr. Long Wellesley said, that many at the Westminster meeting deprecated the principles there preached. If the gentlemen of the country at large took up the subject, he was sure many counter petitions to that now presented would be received, respectfully signed.

Sir Francis Burdett was desirous that the gentlemen of England should meet throughout the country to hear what were the sentiments of all England. In such a case, whatever the result, he, for one, should give way to the general opinion; but it was of attempts to suppress opinion that he complained. He was very sorry that persons of rank, property, talents, and character, in whom patriotism was naturally supposed to exist, and which was the case in England with such persons generally till of late years, did not assemble. They could guide by their information, character, and talents, and lead the people after them, as they were wont to do. The people used to bow to their authority even when not entirely convinced. There was the force of a general character among the gentry of the country. He hoped this was not to be altered. If we looked at Spain, we should find a remarkable circumstance; in the day of trouble, persons of the highest rank and of the most ancient families, stood still, and quietly looked at the great struggle, and left their own country to be fought for by other nations. (Hear, hear.) Sorry should he be if such ever should become the degraded state of this country. He wished for something liberal, rational, and patriotic, according to old constitutional practice and principles.

Mr. F. Robinson observed, that he never thought any comparison would be made between the nobility of Spain and the gentry of this country. Was it to be supposed that the gentry of England would see their country fought for by other nations? If there were any parts of this country wherein the union of the gentry and the people was disturbed, it was not owing to the gentry, but to the efforts of those who strove to break asunder all the bands of society. The hon. baronet was of ancient birth, of high character, and of considerable property, and he had no doubt was respected and loved by those who were connected with him; but why should he not suppose similar circumstances to exist respecting others? Why should he express himself so as to traduce others, as if they were cut off from the affection of those around them? What grounds of fact could he have for such aspersions? How could he conceive himself justified in drawing such a picture, unless he meant to infer that the gentry of the country were conspirators against the liberties of the country? He (Mr. R.) believed that the country gentlemen had no stronger wish than to protect the people.

Sir G. Heathcote denied that his hon. friend had accused the gentlemen of England of detaching themselves from the body of the people. He (Sir F. B.) only lamented their supineness. He expressed his desire to see them cordially join, and wisely guide the sentiments and feelings of those over whom their rank and property gave them a natural influence; and he regretted that the legitimate direction which superior information and improved judgment would give them was not claimed or exercised:—He wished them to meet along with the people, that they might rescue the people from those that would mislead them.

The petition was then read.

Upon the motion that it do lie on the table,

Sir F. Burdett wished, that the country might have an opportunity of expressing its sentiments, and took occasion to express his regret that the gentlemen of England were not more forward in conveying their wishes and views to the Government. Upon this a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson) had founded a charge against him of slandering the gentlemen of England, an imputation which he entirely disclaimed. He merely took the word from the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. L. Wellesley), who had said that the body of the people were in favour of arbitrary measures. He (Sir F.) did not put the gentlemen of this country on a level with the degraded nobility of another; but he had complained of their supineness, and had alluded to the better times of our history, as affording a great contrast in their character. He liked frank and free opinion on all occasions; and at a time like the present it might be desirable to have the sentiments of the great body of the nation. A certain portion of the people were alluded to, as if they could either form no opinion, or as if their opinion was not worthy of attention—as if they had no rights to protect, and no interest in the acts of their Government. The House was accustomed to hear from the noble lord opposite such phrases as these—degraded rank, lower orders, and other unwarrantable expressions. Now, for his part, he knew of no degraded rank in the state to which the noble lord could apply this denomination. The only degraded ranks that he knew were the sinecurists, (Hear, and a laugh,) who, in these times of distress, fattened disgracefully on the public money. He most certainly knew of a privileged order—the peers of the realm, and the commons of the land; but he would acknowledge no other distinction. The commons included the whole people, not lords; and neither admitted of higher or lower orders, degraded or dignified ranks. Nothing could be more wicked and mischievous than such language. The people should be treated as all upon the same level; none of them degraded by situation, or unequal in point of right; they should be taught to unite for the common good of all; to respect each other and themselves. The rights of the wealthiest and the poorest had, in the eyes of the law, the same foundation, and did not admit of this mischievous classification. When taxes were the question, then there was another distinction of the people, into rich and poor; and it was said such a tax will affect the one class without affecting the other, as if the real income of the labourer was not affected by the assessments made on his employer. The price of the poor man's labour was just what his employer could afford to give him; and the situation of the former was as much injured by what the latter gave away in taxes, as if he had himself paid them. The money taken out of the rich man's pocket, which was the poor man's bank, was as much a loss to the poor man as if it were taken out of his own. This was a time for union, that the country might be able, by common effort, to support those grievous burdens which a mischievous policy had brought upon it, and which weighed it to the ground; and not a season for calling the people names, and arraying them against each other as if they were natural enemies. By joining their common strength to support their common calamities, much might be done to alleviate their sufferings, and alleviation, he was sorry to say, was all that could at present be expected.

Lord Castlereagh entirely disclaimed the use of the terms attributed to him, in the sense alleged by the hon. baronet. He never called any part of the people a degraded rank. In speaking of those who engaged in treason, he used the phrase; but it was applied to those only whom their treason degraded by folly, absurdity, and wickedness. (Hear, hear.) He never meant to use any such phrase to any part of the people.

The Hon. Mr. S. Cocks expressed his disapprobation of public meetings in the present state of the public mind. He was a friend to liberty, but it was regulated liberty, order, and independence.—He defended the character of the gentlemen of England.

Mr. Ponsonby said, the Report of the Secret Committee praised the principles, the temper, the conduct of the people generally. It was obliged to confess, that in some parts acts had been committed, or principles encouraged, of which it disapproved; but it excused even the offenders, on the ground that they were acted upon by designing men, who took advantage of their distress to mislead and delude them. As a member of that committee, he would ask, what undue partiality could be attributed to him? It was not a partiality surely to his Majesty's Ministers—he generally opposed them. It could not be a partiality to the measures of which the report was made the ground-work—he had expressed his protest against them. It could not be a partiality proceeding from interest; if he had any interest, it was on the other side. (Hear, hear.) His interest led him to please the people. He could assure the House, that neither interest, partiality, nor prejudice, had been the motives of his conduct; and he acted entirely from a sense of duty, and the deliberate conviction of his own mind; and that whenever he felt that sense of duty, he would regulate his conduct by its dictates, whether he acquired popularity or not by the course he pursued. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Folkestone said, the words of the Report amounted to a declaration that the nation was universally infected with mischievous and seditious principles, and was prepared to proceed to acts of treason and rebellion. What else could justify gagging-bills for the whole people? (Hear.) Nothing but charges that would amount to a libel could justify such measures. The noble lord explained the meaning in which he understood the words of his hon. friend (Sir F. Burdett,) and contended they were not liable to the construction put upon them by a right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Robinson.) He admitted that it was too much the practice of the gentlemen of England to withdraw from public meetings, which they ought to countenance by their rank, instruct by their superior knowledge, and guide by their temper and moderation. If at the present moment danger were apprehended from these meetings, as he saw was done by an hon. gentleman, (Mr. Cocks,) surely the best mode of preventing it was the attendance of men, who, from their rank, influence, situation, and connections, had the greatest authority with the people, and could rescue them from the hands of the discontented and factious. (Hear.)

The Hon. Mr. Law felt it necessary to remark that the report was not a libel on the whole nation, as it expressly excepted from any charge of disaffection or discontent the whole of the higher ranks, or even the middle classes of society, and almost all the agricultural population. That could not be a libel, therefore, upon the whole, which made such important exceptions. But, said the noble lord (Folkestone) the remedy is intended for the whole population, therefore the disease must have infected the whole. This sort of reasoning could only be admitted when the noble lord pointed out a way of legislating for traitors as a distinct class in the community, like certain kinds of manufacturers, a way of making laws to restrain or punish any individual without having reference to the whole. All laws must be general, though the evils be only partial.

Mr. Brougham was glad to hear from the lips of the hon. gentleman that there was so limited a range of danger; that there were none of the higher ranks infected; that the words "few, if any," meant literally none at all; and that, by such an ingenious mode of interpretation, we got quit of an important part of the charge of insinuation. (Hear.) The report had been called a libel on the whole people of England. He (Mr. B.) was not one of those who concurred in that opinion: but if the report was not a bill of indictment, the measures grounded upon it were a sentence against the whole nation (Hear): if they passed into laws, the people would be condemned without being accused, punished without being tried. (Hear, hear.) They had been acquitted of offences by all who witnessed their conduct and admired the fortitude with which they bore their sufferings; they had been acquitted of offences, and declared from the throne peaceable and well-disposed under distresses of which few in the House, or in affluent circumstances, could have any idea. None of those who in Parliament gave their opinions coolly on the pressure of the times, who spoke of the necessity of patience and resignation under suffering from night to night in the House, could have any idea, either derived from their own experience or what they saw in their families or in the world, except among the objects of their charity—they could have no conception, unless that derived from fictitious tales, of what it was to feel the agonies of hunger (Hear); and yet to this state many were reduced who still, in circumstances so deplorable and hopeless, had not only behaved peaceably, but decorously; had not only abstained from crimes, but had exhibited the utmost fortitude in bearing their calamities. Would it not appear then a monstrous injustice to pass sentence of condemnation on such a people for the errors of a few, mentioned in a vague report, and, while they were meriting the admiration and praises of the world, to deprive them of the benefits of the Constitution? (Hear.)

Mr. W. Eliot thought the report could not be declared a libel on the whole people of England. It said the great body of the nation was sound. (Hear.) What it said was not that the whole nation was infected, but that practices existed calculated to shake the foundation of social order. (Hear.)

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

LORDS OF THE ADMIRALTY.] Sir M. W. Ridley rose to move for a reduction of such of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty as could be spared without detriment to the public service. He would not point out the number that might be reduced, but leave the determination of that point to the counsels of his Royal Highness. If he were required to deliver his own opinion he would say, that two might be spared, four being enough to perform the effective duties of the Board. The cry of retrenchment had resounded through all parts of the country: it had been echoed from one side of the house to the other, and all professed to have the same object equally at heart. He did not expect much in point of real saving from the measure he now proposed, but it would be laying the foundation of a system of reduction by which the undue influence of Ministers might be abridged. Previous to the reign of Henry VIII. there was no navy: in time of war, when ships were wanted, they were either hired from the merchants at home or purchased from foreign traders. In the reign of Henry a sort of navy-board was established, dock-yards were built, and commissioners were appointed to regulate them. This lasted through the subsequent reigns till the time of Charles I. when some alteration took place in the management of the system, and two committees, consisting of three individuals each, were appointed to superintend the new plan of naval administration. Whatever disposition the Admiralty Lords of the present day might feel to imitate their predecessors, there was one point to which he did not think that they would be anxious to carry their imitations: he alluded to the salaries formerly enjoyed, for he had found from old documents that the Lords Commissioners in the time of Charles received but 3*s.* a day. (A laugh.) During the disturbances that afterwards occurred in the reign of Charles, the navy was neglected and became insignificant, till Cromwell, by great and constant exertions, raised it to a degree of high eminence and power. All branches of the service were improved: the number of ships was increased, and the dock-yards became more important depots. In the feeble administration, however, of Richard, Cromwell's son, the navy again fell to decay. On the restoration of Charles II. the navy revived, partly under the direction of the Duke of York, but chiefly from the activity and attention of Mr. Secretary Pepys, who first introduced regularity and system into his department. The conduct pursued by that distinguished individual was well worthy of the imitation of the Ministers of the present day. He did not cast his eyes about to see from what quarter he should procure such persons as would best secure or augment his parliamentary influence, (loud cries of hear from the Opposition);

but, on the contrary, he looked for the most able professional men, whose knowledge and experience fitted them best for performing the duties of a naval administration. Since that period a navy board had been in constant force, though the commissioners had varied in numbers: sometimes they were 5, sometimes only 4. In 1702, when Prince George was at the head of the naval lords, their number was only 4: in 1706, the number was the same. In 1709, when Lord Orford was first commissioner, the number was 4: in 1714, under the Earl of Strafford, the number was 5: in 1717, under Lord Berkeley, it was 5: 1775 and 1776, under Lord Sandwich, the number was still 5. Since that time he was aware that the number was usually 6. Perhaps the business of the Board had increased during the long wars that had succeeded; but though that number might be necessary during the operations of war, he saw no reason why it should be continued in peace. The appointment of six lords was neither consistent with former practice nor with the necessity of present circumstances. Mr. Secretary Pepys, in his naval administration, laid down a rule which was well worthy the attention of his Majesty's Ministers: he took care not to employ any gentlemen who were not masters of naval affairs, and distinguished at the same time for strict integrity and regular habits of industry. (Shouts of hear, hear.) To this testimony he might add the recommendation which some years ago appeared in the Report of the commissioners appointed to investigate the state of the naval management. They had stated their conviction as to the necessity of employing the most effective means for the right administration of the navy: and observed, how much depended on scientific knowledge, on ability, on uninterrupted industry, and recommended that no other circumstances should be permitted to introduce any persons into the Board of Admiralty management except the being fit for all the duties of the situation. How far his Majesty's Ministers had complied with this recommendation, he left it to the House and to the public to judge. (Hear, hear.) When it was seen that a cornet of hussars, without the slightest pretensions to naval knowledge, was made a Lord of the Admiralty, what motive could be supposed to have influenced the minds of those who made him so, except such a motive as was too obvious to every understanding to make it necessary for him even to touch upon it? (Shouts of hear, hear.) He must be permitted to regret that it was not more the custom of the House to attend to the recommendations of its committees. Had it done so in the present case, it would not now be his duty to make his present motion: but he must say, that it was absurd to appoint committees for the consideration of different subjects, and yet to entirely disregard all their suggestions. The committee had observed, that in time of peace it might be a fair subject of deliberation whether some reduction might not take place of the number of these Admiralty Lords without any detriment to the public service. (Hear.) The question was, whether the present was such a time as they had contemplated. At the period of their observation the number of seamen employed was 140,000: the present number was about 19,000. At that time there were 1,200 vessels in service: at present, he believed that the vessels of every sort and description did not amount to 200. Could any thing, then, justify the continuance of these useless lords, unless it was meant to say that their office ought to be kept as sinecure offices for the reward of the friends of Ministers. (Hear, hear.) He really was at a loss to know what ground of defence would be resorted to. The noble lord on a former occasion had talked of the Board of Admiralty having been constituted on its present scale at the time of the Revolution: he trusted that he had entirely shewn the fallacy of that supposition. The noble lord had also said something about innovation: but this charge of innovation in itself against a useful reform came with a very ill grace from him who was recommending the monstrous innovation of removing the very bulwark of our liberties. (Hear, hear.) At such a time it became the House more especially to take care, that before they rejected a motion like the present, their motive for so rejecting it was solely for the public good. They ought to shew themselves incapable of any bias, except toward the common welfare. He concluded with moving a humble address to the Prince Regent that he would give directions, in conformity with the clause in the speech from the throne, to reduce the number of the Lords of the Admiralty in such a way as was not incompatible with public safety, and was most suitable to the exigencies of the times. (Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, it certainly had not been in the contemplation of his Majesty's Ministers to submit any recommendation to the Prince Regent for the abolition of these offices, but, perhaps, it would have been better if the hon. member had waited for the opinion of the committee of finance on this subject. Gentlemen on the other side, had adopted a course which seemed to him to be in direct opposition to those parliamentary rules which had been framed on a comprehensive view of public utility: he alluded to that course of insult and unconnected notices respecting different places and appointments, (A laugh from the Opposition.) the perpetual renewal and suspension of which over the heads of the House, kept the public mind in perpetual agitation. He could not admit that office was to be tried by that strict rule which the hon. bart. seemed to contemplate, that public business was always to be done by the fewest possible hands. If the principle of making persons in high office perform all the labour possible, without any such relaxation as they might be supposed to require, were acted upon, offices of state would be filled by very different persons from those who now filled them. (Hear, and a loud laugh from the Opposition.) Did the hon. gentleman mean to say, that the labour performed should be precisely as much as a man could perform without any relief? Did they mean to hold out the expectation that any men of liberal rank in life would submit to such a rule? And would they go further, and drive out of the administration all those young men of high birth, whose accession to a government was one of the best pledges for the security of the Constitution? Would they tie down persons of this description to the same laborious routine of duty as a banker's clerk, or a merchant's apprentice. And as to these different notices of motions for retrenchment, he felt that, altogether, their amount was but trifling—not above 4 or 5,000*l.* at the most. He did not mean to undervalue such a saving in a time of distress like the present; but he thought that saving would be a detriment rather than a benefit to the country, since it would tend to throw office into less enlightened hands. (A laugh.) In his conscience he believed, that nothing was more likely to do mischief to the public service, than that the navy should be solely in the service of naval men. As to any individual against whom this motion might be aimed, he should not enter into any particular defence, but was prepared to say, that a few offices should exist in which young men of high rank in life might find a motive for studying the Constitution of their country. (A laugh.) Few men could be statesmen at once; they must learn through the gradations of inferior offices to manage the high departments of the State. It was true, that there had been some instances of men emerging into the height of public life at once. Mr. Pitt started at once into that distinguished situation which he continued to fill during his life: but there had been other great men, perhaps, of not inferior talent to Mr. Pitt, who had risen by slow gradations to the highest rank. Mr. Fox had not thought it inconsistent with his character or talents, to take his seat as a member of the Naval Board, though he had not the slightest professional knowledge of the navy; nor was he the only illustrious man who had begun by filling this minor office. Sir Robert Walpole, and others, had first come to the notice of Parliament and of their Sovereign, through this very office. He would contend, then, that if the circle of offices was to be narrowed or abolished, serious mischief would accrue to the Constitution: for one great source of the education of statesmen would be cut off. He never understood that the noble lord on the opposite bench (Lord Althorp) had thought himself unfit to take seat at the Navy Board, though not a professional man; and Lord Spencer, he had put quite as much confidence in lay lords of the Admiralty as any other administrators. Having thus protested against the principle of the motion, he came to the business part of the question. He did not find that it had been proved that the numbers were too great during the war; and though he was willing to allow a distinction between peace and war, yet he denied that it would be a fair argument to say, that because the number of ships in commission was less in time of peace than in war, that therefore the duties of the Admiralty were less arduous. During war, they were forced to neglect many of the details respecting the dock-yards, which, however, were of the highest importance, and occupied their attention in peace, quite as much as the attention of such persons could be expected to be occupied. (A laugh.) He must contend that it was very useful that the Admiralty Board should be so constituted as at the same time to sit in London, and to send out a competent commission to act at the outports. He apprehended that gentlemen would see that great delay would be saved to the public business, by thus preventing the necessity of that sort of communication which must be kept up between the Board and common agents, before any thing could be transacted. As to the general argument used by the hon. baronet, he was ready to admit that the House had a claim on Ministers for such economy, as was safe and consistent with their duty; but, considering that the reduction of the officers of the Admiralty would be detrimental to the interests of the nation, he should move the previous question.

Lord Althorp said, if seven lords of the Admiralty could do the whole duty in the time of war, it was not necessary to retain an equal number now, when the business was so greatly reduced. With regard to the outports, it was almost a useless branch in time of peace; and as far as concerned the necessity of two boards, it was very well known, that, as the board of Admiralty was now constituted, questions were seldom put so as to come to a majority, the business of the board being generally considered to belong to the first lord.

The Hon. Mr. Law did not view this as a question that ought to be discussed abstractedly on its own merits; the House would do well to consider it on general principles. Let them reflect that they were not called on to sanction the destruction of two offices, but of every office; let Ministers, when the body of the place was attacked, resist the enemy, and not give up a single outwork. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition benches.) Let not the House imitate the conduct of some of the weakest of mankind, some of the Roman emperors, who, when they surrendered one province after another, said, "We can do without silks, we can do without spices," forgetting, however, that every foot of ground they abandoned, must lead to the destruction of their empire. Let us not, therefore, imagine that we can do without two lords of the Admiralty, lest the same fatal consequences should attend us. (Laughter and hear.) If we did this, we abandoned the principle on which our whole empire rested. On this breach we must take our stand; here we must fight the enemy. (Hear.) It was not so much for the advantage of Ministers as for the interest of the country, that he would wish these offices to be retained. Ministers were by no means overpaid for the labours of their office; and if they did not find in the places now to be abolished, some gratification for the dreadful responsibility and uneasiness to which they were subject, a responsibility and uneasiness under which the firmest minds had sometimes been broken down, no opposition would be desirous of taking possession of the offices of Government. Would the House be willing to diminish the present influence of the Crown? Would they again reduce it to that state of anarchy in which it was no longer able to maintain itself against a factious opposition? Considering that violent changes were abroad, and that the most wild and wicked doctrines were preached by those who undermined where they could not attack, and desolated where they could not enjoy, he could not consent to strike out of the hand of the Crown the only remaining weapon by which it could defend itself. (Laughter and hear.) He should therefore vote for the previous question.

Mr. Warre observed, that the hon. member had spoken very eloquently about breaches and outworks; but he greatly doubted, whether Ministers would like his alliance on this occasion: he questioned whether they would thank the hon. gentleman for his fair and candid avowal of the military position they assumed. (Hear.) He (Mr. Warre) enquired not what was done in former days: if former administrations had done wrong, it now became the House to do right. (Hear.) All the episodes of the noble lord were superfluous to the question. Of the lords of the Admiralty, three of the sea officers, and one of the land lords, were efficient officers; but the other two offices were complete sinecures. As to the three officers who were to form a quorum at the outports, he supposed the noble lord thought that two would quarrel in a post-chaise, and want a third to settle the business. (Laughter and hear.) He gave his most cordial support to the motion.

The Hon. Mr. J. W. Ward would not shrink from asserting and defending the opinions he entertained upon this question. The other side of the House seemed to think that economy at all hazards ought to be practised, forgetting that though reduction and retrenchment might be good things in themselves, yet all reductions and all retrenchments were not expedient: they were for taking from the sovereign all his influence, and were not only anxious to strip off useless and expensive embroidery, but to deprive him even of decent and necessary apparel. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) He (Mr. W.) could not consent to lend his aid to the corps of political riflemen recently embodied, which was employed in picking off place after place, however important or serviceable; which attacked to-day the Admiralty, to-morrow the Stamp-office, and the next day the Post-office, and which, on the principle of such irregular troops, shewed no mercy and granted no quarter. Had gentlemen forgotten that a committee of retrenchment was now sitting? Did they not recollect that motions like the present could only obstruct its labours? It was true, that they had refused their confidence to that committee, because it was not formed merely of the immaculate uninfluenced members who sat on the other side of the House; but was it respectful to it, or to the House, in this way to press forward motion after motion? The conduct of hon. gentlemen on the other side on this occasion might be consistent with their conduct in general, but was it consistent with the vote of the majority of the House, which had given its confidence to that committee, though not formed according to some members' notions of ideal excellence. (Hear.) Had he been chosen one of that body, he should have begged to have been allowed to withdraw his name, convinced that, however assiduous and anxious to discharge its duties, the committee could never hope to keep pace with the rapid and sweeping abolitions recommended from the other side of the House. The examinations of persons, papers, and records by a committee, were idle and ridiculous if this system were continued. The whole House was not now the proper place where the subject was to be considered; it had delegated its authority to a number of its members, and whether the motion of to-night had been of a more sweeping nature, or directed against only one department, it was equally objectionable. The naval establishment of the country was, undoubtedly, at present very inconsiderable, (Hear.) though the military departments had been kept up: but had it been shewn in any way, that, because the latter might be reduced in some unimportant respects, it was fit to put an end to two political offices of the highest consequence. The noble lord had truly said that they were valuable as convenient introductions of young men to business: by means of these two places of lords of the Admiralty, useful experiments might be made upon the capacities and dispositions of young men. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) It was expedient, besides, to preserve them as inducements to individuals to devote their talents and industry to the service of their country; for as long as human nature continued what it was, such means would be required to stimulate exertion. The diminution of secondary offices would also be injurious, as lessening the competition among men who might become ornaments of the State: the number of persons who would be willing to contribute their services for a proportionate reward would be reduced, and the consequence would be, that all places would fall into the hands of an oligarchy, of all the most odious, viz. an oligarchy of wealth. (Hear.)

Mr. Banks commenced by referring to the proceedings of the committee over which he had presided. It had, he said, been his anxious wish to have established there some distinct rule and general principle by which offices should be judged. In that attempt, however, he had been strenuously resisted by the noble lord opposite, (Castlereagh) who had contended, that it would be much wiser to examine each place separately, to suggest certain abolitions, and if others were proposed by the antagonists of Ministers, to discuss them seriatim. The argument of the noble lord to-night had shewn that what he held to be fit up stairs, he considered most inexpedient down stairs; and, without much regard to consistency, he now turned round to oppose what he had before recommended. (Hear.) The House came to the consideration of this subject under the most favourable circumstances; for, not only were the general arguments decidedly in favour of the proposition of the hon. baronet, but the question seemed to be decided by the report of a committee made nearly twenty years, of which the Speaker had so ably discharged the duties of chairman, and which was composed of men of known integrity and prudence: the names of Lord Harrowby and Mr. Henry Thornton were sufficient to secure it from the charge of injudicious precipitation. That committee had possessed all possible information, and it had determined against the continuance of six lords of the Admiralty in time of peace. It was true that nothing had then been said of ambulatory lords, a sort of board of Admiralty in eyre, much talked of to-night, and to very little purpose. The broad and better ground of resistance to the motion was, that these offices formed a part of the justifiable influence of the Crown, and that young men were, by the hope of this reward, induced to devote their labours to the public service; yet this argument was most indefinite, and under this pretence of a nursery for statesmen the power of the Sovereign might be augmented to a most injurious extent. He admitted, that it was essential that persons in high official situations should occupy seats in Parliament, and he ridiculed the absurd notions of inconsiderate and uninstructed Reformers, who termed this practice an abuse of the Constitution: it was fit, however, that some limit should be assigned: in his opinion that limit was the duty discharged by the individual, since no parliamentary office ought to be preserved merely because it suited the purpose of the Minister. The bill he (Mr. Banks) had introduced did not indeed include the places in debate, but his measure was calculated for a state of war, and he could not therefore be charged with inconsistency. One hon. gentleman (Mr. Law) had vehemently insisted, that this outwork ought never to be abandoned to the enemies of royal influence; but he (Mr. B.) would advise him, if he endeavoured to defend every post, however insignificant, to take care that he had a sufficient garrison for such an extensive fortress; while he was protecting as outwork, the enemy might make himself master of the citadel. (Hear, hear.) The table was loaded with petitions, which, though idly praying Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, at least deserved attention when they required retrenchment; and he called upon all members who had presented them, to join in a vote in support of a motion for the abolition of two offices which were a useless burden upon the public.

Mr. Huskisson opposed the motion, contending that, although a committee might have decided against the places in question, their report did not extinguish the deliberate functions of the House.

Mr. Croker alleged, that ever since 1685, 1,000*l.* per annum had been allowed in all the estimates for seven lords of the Admiralty. It was remarkable that the office now singled out for attack was the only one that had remained always the same.

Sir G. Pole stated, that the salary had formerly been only 770*l.* a year. He observed, that lay lords could be of no service, and that the present secretary himself was not very useful; and said, that since the time of Birchall, in 1659, no secretary but the present had been ignorant of the neighbouring seas. He supported the original motion.

Mr. Canning said, after the menace of unpopularity which has been thrown out against those who might oppose the motion of the hon. baronet, he should hold himself guilty of a base dereliction of duty, if he were to shrink from an explicit declaration of his sentiments. The motion was avowedly the first of a series of attacks upon that established system of political office by which the administration of the Government of this country was practically carried on; and by which it had been carried on for upwards of a century,—that is, during the period of our history, when our laws and liberties had been best guarded, as well as best understood. The reduction of a number of such offices might undoubtedly form a fair subject for discussion: but to discuss it fairly, the system must be viewed as a whole. It was not by picking out details, and by putting this or that office separately upon its trial, that the expediency of a parliamentary administration of the Government could be usefully considered, or that the number of holders of office which might be properly and conveniently allowed to sit in the House of Commons, could be justly ascertained. As a matter of economy, the possible saving upon the two Offices in question, was by general admission too inconsiderable to be taken into account: no man had gravely insisted upon it in this debate. It had been argued, indeed, that saving, as saving, was good in itself,—good in principle without reference to amount; and it had been contended, that to this sort of saving, among others, they were pledged by the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. But he must be permitted to remind the House,—and he appealed to the general sense and recollection of all who then heard him, that this was not the class of office specifically in the contemplation of those who voted for the Address, and for the appointment of the Committee which grew out of his Royal Highness's recommendation. The reduction specifically in contemplation was unquestionably in those offices which are called Sinecures. In saying this, he did not mean to say that the House, either by the Address or by the appointment of that Committee, was precluded from carrying reduction beyond those particular offices; but he thought it material for the House to bear in mind, that the attention of the Government and of the Committee had been immediately directed to that peculiar species of reduction which had been most earnestly called for by the public; that this motion therefore was not necessary to quicken either the Ministers or the members of the Committee in the discharge of their duty; and that the suggestion of to-night was not (as was pretended) in furtherance of an admitted course of policy, but in recommendation of a policy which, so far from having been admitted, was then brought before the House for discussion for the first time. The new policy might be right or wrong in itself (that was matter of argument); but it must be examined and decided on its own separate merits. The labours of the Committee were active and unremitting: and the fruits of those labours had been neither small nor slow in growth. In one short week they had resolved on the abolition of all those great sinecure offices (those of the Exchequer he meant) which have long been held out to public view, as the great blots and stains in the official appointments of the State. He would not here examine whether it was a just or unjust view that had been taken of these offices. Undoubtedly he thought there was much of unfair prejudice, much of misapprehension and misrepresentation in the attacks which had been made upon them. Undoubtedly, he thought they could not be abolished, without the substitution of something in their room. It might, however, be true, that being (whether justly or unjustly) degraded in the public estimation, they had ceased to be the most fit rewards of honourable public service, and had thus lost the charm by which their nominal existence was prolonged. His own sentiments on this subject were indeed already recorded. The House might possibly recollect that he had twice voted for a Bill of an hon. friend of his (Mr. Banks) which went to abolish sinecures on an extensive scale; substituting for the abolished offices other means, to be placed at the disposal of the Crown, for the reward of public service. The details of that Bill, he thought, in many particulars faulty and ill-digested:—nevertheless, approving of the principle of the measure, he voted for it with all its imperfections in its head. To a Bill of the same kind he was still ready, in common with his colleagues, to lend his cordial support; and if his hon. friend would then accept such aid—to assist him in moulding and shaping his measure, in such manner as might best tend to ensure its ultimate success. Let him not, however, be supposed visionary enough to imagine, that such a concession, although involving nine-tenths of all that was professedly demanded, would satisfy those who clamoured most loudly for Retrenchment and Reform, and who inflamed the imaginations of the multitude with the expectation of impossible relief. Their purpose was not to amend what was really amiss in our establishments, but by cavilling alike at every thing that existed in them, and at every proposition for amendment, to feed and keep alive the discontentment of the times, and (if they could) to ripen it into disaffection. It would be vain to look for any other effect from this concession upon such men, than that their complaints and remonstrances might perhaps be transferred from the point conceded to some other on which concession was known to be utterly impracticable. What was the main grievance of which the clamourers of our day had been complaining?—Sinecures. Against which branch of the Constitution had their clamours been directed?—Against the House of Commons. Would it not then naturally be supposed, by any person ignorant of what had been passing during the last few years, that the Crown had recommended the abolition of Sinecures, and that this House had disregarded the recommendation? or that the House of Lords had passed some resolutions to that effect, which the House of Commons had refused to adopt?—But what were the facts? Why, that the House of Commons had twice abolished Sinecures, so far as its decision could abolish them; and that this decision of the House of Commons had twice been frustrated by the House of Peers! Such were the grounds upon which these equitable dispensers of public favour heaped obloquy upon the House of Commons, whilst the House of Peers stood blameless in their estimation. But fond indeed would be the fatuity which should imagine that there was any more of sincerity in their approbation than there was of justice in their censure. The House of Peers was unblamed only because its time was not yet come: The House of Commons was vilified because these men were wise enough in their generation, to know that that House alone stood between them and the ruin which they meditated;—that, the House of Commons once destroyed, the road lies open, without impediment, to the overthrow of the Peers and of the Crown. On every such matter, therefore, as was this night propounded for their deliberation, their judgment should be guided, not by the loudness of the demand, but by the propriety and expediency of the thing required. Clamour was not a reason for refusing what it might be right to grant:—but let no man flatter himself that clamour was to be appeased by granting what it would be right to refuse. He did not mean to dispute the right of any hon. gentleman to bring forward any specific proposition that might strike his fancy; but it was for the House to decide, whether, after having appointed a Committee systematically to examine our establishments with a view to all practicable reduction, it was either regular or expedient to take particular parcels of assigned work out of their hands, and, after day, to debate them separately in the House; thus resuming in detail the power which has been delegated in the aggregate. His hon. friend (Mr. Banks) had mistaken the nature of the objections to this practice which had been stated by his noble friend (Lord Castlereagh) or at least he had not satisfactorily answered those objections by asserting, that in the Committee up stairs, his noble friend had himself proposed to proceed on the same plan. His noble friend objected in the Committee to the laying down of those general principles which he required to be laid down in the House. To be sure he did,—and where was the inconsistency of doing so? Was not the House the place where general principles ought to be proposed and considered? And was it not peculiarly the province of a Committee to regulate the application of those principles, and to discuss the details which their adoption might involve?—This proceeding of his noble friend's, was not only perfectly consistent in itself, but exactly conformable to parliamentary rule. Not so the course adopted by his hon. friend, who insisted on laying down general propositions in the Committee, and on examining the details in the House,—thus inverting the order of parliamentary proceedings, and interchanging the natural and proper functions of the Committee and the House.—To come to the question immediately before them,—not only had the number of Commissioners remained invariable from 1688 to the present day, but the composition of the Board had always admitted a proportion (not uniformly the same, but a proportion) of lay members, mixed with those of professional habits and experience. He knew that the advantage of this mixed constitution had long been a mooted question. Some had wished all the members of the Admiralty to be of the land, some all of the sea: with others, who remembered the rough Admirals of old times, they had passed for a sort of amphibious body, breathing of salt and sea-weed, true phoca like their funny predecessors: others, again, cried out like Trinculo, in the Tempest, that this was not the sort of monster they wanted. He, however, was convinced that the Admiralty ought to be constituted partly of lay and partly of sea lords. He considered the motion of to-night as the perpetuum salens of successive and sweeping confiscations of efficient office. If Ministers could take so narrow a view of this question, as to be influenced by any calculations of their own immediate interest, then undoubtedly they would at once withdraw all opposition to the motion. The trifling sacrifice of direct official strength or influence which the proposed reduction involved, would, in the present state and temper of the country, be repaid to them tenfold in an accession of temporary popularity. Nay, had they been disposed to indulge that species of malignity which delights in catching an adversary in his own trap, they should at once not only have assented to the present proposition, but should have hastened to take the lead of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the whole train of their projected reductions, and to outbid them by the suggestion of others still more comprehensive. For, situated as Ministers happened to be, the loss would really be unfelt by them in carrying on an established administration; but far different would be its consequences to those who looked to succeed to their situations. When they had routed and driven them from the field,—when the happy hour had arrived for distributing their spoil and satisfying the claims of their numerous and expectant followers; they would find, that without these offices which they were then assailing, and other offices such as these, a new administration could not be formed with strength enough to carry on the ordinary business of that House for a single day. He protested that even on this account, he was most disinterestedly hostile to the present motion, or rather to the projects of which it was the sample and the harbinger. If he thought that the Crown ought to have the means of forming and sustaining an administration, he did not the less think that it ought to have the means of changing one: and he was well persuaded, that if we swept away these political and parliamentary offices, changes of administration could not only not be so easily effected, but could not be effected at all without material detriment—certainly not without most inconvenient interruption to the business of the State. They were told, that not the smallest influence of the Crown in that House ought to be tolerated, because it was not recognized in any theoretical scheme of the Constitution. But he maintained, and in doing so he only spoke what every man felt and knew, nay, avowed, whenever the purpose of the moment did not require the denial of it, that, in practice, the Government of this country could not be carried on without some proportion of such influence. The amount of it, he was far from denying, was matter of fair constitutional jealousy. Suppose the theory, such as it is contended for, carried to its full extent;—suppose a complete separation between the Ministers of the Crown and the Members of the House of Commons; the result would assuredly be an endless struggle between that House and the Crown. He might be told, perhaps, that few persons were in fact so much misled by an uncalculating attachment to abstract theory, as to desire that complete separation. Even his honourable friend (Mr. Bankes,) jealous as he was of a preponderating influence in the Crown, allowed, that the persons holding the highest offices of State ought to have seats in Parliament. But while his hon. friend admitted this principle, he, in a great degree, nullified his admission by the limits which he would prescribe to its operation. Was it to be believed that half a dozen insulated Ministers could withstand the assaults of that numerous body always to be found within those walls,—the systematic opposers, the designated successors, of any existing administration,—deprived as those Ministers would be of the aid and comfort, of the official knowledge and practical experience of gentlemen filling the secondary offices of the State? Suppose then, that the Crown were to take the theorists at their word, and rejecting his hon. friend's kind but utterly useless concession in favour of the Ministers themselves, were to determine to carry its self-denial still farther, and not to suffer any of its servants to sit in either House of Parliament: in other words, were to select its Ministers from amongst men not having seats in either of the two Houses of Parliament.—Suppose we were to find at the beginning of a new Session, that the Crown, thus impatient of the imputation or suspicion of influence, had appointed, for its First Lord of the Treasury—for its Chancellor of the Exchequer—and for its Secretaries of State—gentlemen of perfectly unexceptionable character, but wholly unknown to the nation; and that out of extreme reverence for the purity of Parliament, none of these gentlemen possessed, or would accept, seats as Members of the Legislature.—There would be nothing in this arrangement contrary to the theoretical Constitution, nay, it would be exactly conformable to that construction of it which had been of late so loudly claimed as the right of the people of England, and towards the practical adoption of which the motion of this evening tended. It would be only pushing to excess the principle of jealousy in which this motion was founded. But would any man say, that if such an arrangement were adopted, the practice of the Constitution would not be at an end? Would not a facility be given for arbitrary selection, and unfit appointments, over which that House had always watched with peculiar jealousy? Would not a road be opened to Court favour, which the parliamentary administration of the Government was particularly calculated to close? Would not Office and Parliament be equally degraded by a choice which separated their functions? And would not this separation infallibly lead to incessant jealousies, collisions, and conflicts? It was no reply to this argument to say, that it did push the hypothesis to an extreme. He admitted that it did so. But, if that be objectionable, it was objectionable only on this ground—that some mixture of official men in the Houses of Parliament was allowed to be highly expedient (if not absolutely necessary) in practice; although the letter of the Constitution was silent as to that practice, and although the theory of the Constitution was asserted to be adverse to it. If some there must be, the controversy was reduced from a question of principle to one of degree; and this reduction cut off at once as altogether idle and irrelevant those general declamations against the influence of the Crown in Parliament, which constituted all the eloquence, and almost all the argument, that had been employed on this and similar subjects of debate. Once admit that some official men must sit in Parliament—and away at once with all those brilliant and animating generalities which denounce as corruption the very name of influence, and demand its radical extirpation as indispensable to the well-being of the state! All such fine flights were by this single admission commuted for the much tamer task of measuring the quantum of that influence which it might be safe and convenient to allow. The controversy once brought to that issue, he was confident he would shew that there never was a period in our history when the quantum of influence was so low as it was at the present hour. The theoretical principles and the practical operation of the British Constitution were necessarily to be taken into view together, as explaining and modifying each other. The separate provinces of its several powers were easily described in theory: but it was not so easy to describe their actual workings, to trace the play of all the parts, and to delineate not only the structure of the mechanism, but its complicated movement and operation. The theory modified by the practice, formed in reality the Constitution under which we lived. The prerogative of the Crown, the high functions and authorities of the House of Lords, and the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, were capable of strict definition. But, when the definition was given strictly, the wonder was how the Government went on. With such a system of checks and balances,—of opposite tendencies counteracting each other,—it should seem that if each were to exert its specific power to the utmost, the whole machine must stand still. According to the theory of the Constitution, the Commons and the Crown were armed against each other,—the Commons with the right of granting or withholding the supplies, the Crown with that of interposing its Veto. In practice, how often had the supplies been stopped?—how often or how lately had the Veto been interposed?—The fact was, that the consciousness in each of the other's power, operated reciprocally as a check upon both; and the march of the Government proceeded unimpeded in a middle course, the result of contrary and combined impulses. The Crown, aware of the ultimate and irresistible strength of Parliament, proposed nothing that could call for or justify the putting forth that strength into full action. But, for the purpose of counterbalancing this irresistible strength in Parliament (or, to speak plainly, in the House of Commons) and for preserving its due weight in the Constitution, what efficient force did the Crown possess?—What—but a certain degree of influence in Parliament? He was not saying whether this change, from prerogative to influence, from conflict to compromise, was for the better or for the worse. He stated the fact as it existed; he knew of no advantage in shutting our eyes to what was evident and notorious. As things now stood,—as they had stood since the Revolution,—the effective monarchy of this country could not be upholden without a just share of influence in Parliament. He said “a just share,”—because he spoke of that avowed, direct, legitimate influence, which arose from having, in that and the other House of Parliament, a certain number of the political servants of the Crown; or (which was the same proposition in other terms) from the Crown's choosing its political servants among the members of the two Houses of Parliament. The more or the less of this influence was unquestionably matter of fair inquiry: and it remained therefore to examine whether the Crown now possessed that influence in a greater proportion than formerly, or in a degree excessively too preponderant for the general interests of the state. Try this question by comparison. A reference to former times,—to what are considered as the brightest periods of the Constitution,—would shew that the direct influence of the Crown in the House of Commons had, at every former period, been greater than it was at the present day; and the more remote the period, the larger the excess. Immediately after the Revolution the number of members of that House, holding offices under the Crown, was double, and frequently triple, the present number. During the Whig administration in the reign of George II.,—in Sir Robert Walpole's time,—it appeared, from authentic lists of divisions on great questions, that there were about eighty-five persons holding offices during pleasure under the Crown who had seats in the House of Commons. In the present House the number of persons holding such offices amounted to no more than about forty-five. In such a degree had the direct influence of the Crown actually decreased; but proportionally the decrease was infinitely greater. For be it remembered, the House of Commons then consisted of one hundred members fewer than since the Union with Ireland. Ireland had, till the year 1800, its separate Parliament. The comparison was therefore to be instituted between the proportions of eighty-five placemen in a House of Commons of five hundred and fifty-eight members, for the government of Great Britain alone; and of forty-five in a House of six hundred and fifty-eight, for the government of the whole United Kingdom. If any such direct influence was to exist at all, surely no man would assert that the present proportion of that influence, as compared with the past, was one that required diminution. Positively, no doubt, the influence of the Crown had increased, with the extent of our establishments—with the augmentation of our revenue; but only just as the nominal rental of every landed estate had proportionally increased within the last century, without augmenting in a degree at all proportioned to its nominal increase the effective power of the proprietor. Positively, the Crown might have more to bestow—as the proprietor of an estate might have more to receive, and to lay out—than formerly: but the value and effect might in both cases be less. Power was not merely positive:—to form a true estimate of its efficacy, we must compare it with that by which it was opposed. If he were told, that the Crown had now double the number of offices, civil and military, at its disposal, which it had some time ago, he answered, that the power of the Crown, was, in these latter times, controuled in the disposal of offices, by a degree of moral influence such as was never exercised over it before. The army and the navy, large as these establishments had been, were far less available, as sources of patronage, than in times when their numbers were infinitely less; when—as was notorious—preferences were given, without scruple and without shame, on account of political opinions or connections: when—as was notorious—a vote in that House given against an existing administration, would not only stop the preferment of the voter, but possibly strip him of his commission. What individual in our times had found his adverse politics stand in the way of his preferment in the army or the navy?—In how many instances, that must be in every body's recollection, had the direct contrary been fairly to be inferred?—He answered, then, that against the increase of patronage must be set off this mighty increase of the power of public opinion;—a power which, since the Revolution, had grown from a pigmy to a giant,—a power which watched over, and governed, and controuled, not only the actions, but the words of every public man; which, drawing its chief aliment from the publication of the debates in Parliament, held a warning terror over every member who spoke in that House;—a power, under the influence of which he then addressed them, knowing that to-morrow, whatever he then said, would be submitted to a thousand eyes, and criticised by a thousand tongues,—that every word he uttered, even every accidental verbal inaccuracy, would be held up to public notice, and fixed upon him as a reproach for ever. Was it possible to deny that such a power as he had described more than counterbalanced the so much dreaded influence of patronage and favour?—Was it possible to suppose that any minister could venture, in times like these, to stand solely upon the favour of the Crown, and to rely solely upon its patronage for support,—independent of public opinion? It had been truly said, that “words are things;” and mere names are often found to be indicative of the bias of popular feeling. Forty or fifty years ago, a minister was habitually spoken of as the “servant of the Crown;” at present, the “servants of the Crown” are, in common parlance, the “servants of the public.” Trifling as this instance might seem, it was a genuine symptom of the ascendancy which the popular part of the Constitution had been daily and hourly acquiring. This popular spirit did indeed pervade and vivify all our political institutions. But, on the other hand, to preserve the soundness and strength of the monarchy was not less essential to the conservation of our happily tempered form of government; and he could not believe that any thinking man, who considered the signs of the times, would imagine that the danger of the present day was from such an inordinate growth of the monarchical branch of the Constitution, as should be likely to overshadow and to blight the liberties of the people. So much as to the influence of the Crown,—which formed one of the alleged grounds, for demanding the abolition of two lordships of the admiralty. But it was not from this negative defence alone that he would argue the expediency of preserving them. The business of the country was transacted in that House; and by the practice, if not in the theory of the Constitution, the character of a British statesman was compounded from the union of parliamentary and official duties. Foreigners often asked, “by what means an uninterrupted succession of men, qualified (more or less eminently) for the discharge of these united duties, was secured?”—First, he answered (with the prejudices perhaps of Eton and of Oxford), that we owed it to our system of public schools and universities. From these institutions was derived, (in the language of the prayer of our collegiate churches,) “a due supply of men, fitted to serve their country, both in church and state.” It was in her public schools and universities that the youth of England were, by a discipline which shallow judgments had sometimes attempted to undervalue, prepared for the duties of public life. There were rare and splendid exceptions, to be sure; but in his conscience, he believed, that England would not be what she was without her system of public education; and that no other country could become what England was without the advantages of such a system. After education at the university came that education in that House which was the fruit of a sedulous attendance upon the business of Parliament; an attendance quickened by the ambition of one day sharing, or being thought qualified to share, in the administration of the Government. To fit men for the duties of the higher departments of the Government was one of the uses of such offices as those under discussion. He knew how obnoxious this part of his argument is to ridicule. He knew too that here, as in the case of preparatory education, there were splendid but rare examples of men who had leaped at once to the highest pinnacle of official situation. Such men (if such there were among those whom he saw opposite to him) could afford to strike the lower rounds out of the ladder of ambition. But exceptions are not rules; and, generally speaking, it was in such offices as these that young men were trained for higher stations. And how were they trained? By "signing their names?"—Idle sneer!—No. By learning (if nothing more) at least the habits and the punctuality of business; by associating with men of business—a description of society to which young men are not usually prone;—and by being induced, through motives and duties of more constant and certain operation than their mere duty as members of parliament, to give to this House much of that time which might otherwise be wasted in frivolous, and, it might be, not in harmless pursuits. His hon. friend (Mr. Ward) had justly stated this argument as applying with peculiar force to men, who, in the outset of life, hesitate between professional and political pursuits; but it was not applicable to them alone. He (Mr. C.) applied it also to those very cases which he knew were thought to be the most untenable,—the cases of young men of ancient name and family, whom the temptations of rank and affluence might lead far out of the road of official labour; but who, by being brought into these offices,—and being mixed in them with others of humbler fortunes, who had names to build for themselves,—continued, through a more advanced period of manhood, in that wholesome equality of intercourse which schools and universities had taught them; an equality which mainly contributed to maintain in the British constitution the animating and active vigour of a Democracy, corrected and restrained but not subdued, by an hereditary Aristocracy and an hereditary Crown. It might be true,—it unquestionably was true,—that many individuals passed through these offices as they had passed through the previous stages of education, without benefit, or at least without renown. But it was also true that these offices had been the nursing-places of great ministers and statesmen: and if but one of any six lords of the admiralty came out of this initiatory course the better prepared to serve his country with advantage, he could not but consider the cost of the whole six as wisely and economically incurred. In all free countries a share in the administration of the state had been the object of liberal ambition. To discredit that object, was to discredit freedom itself. To discredit it among the noble and the powerful, was to deprive the state of its natural props and ornaments. To discredit it among those who had not these inherited advantages, was to restrict the Crown in the choice of its political servants, to the wealth and aristocracy of the country. Even with all our present official institutions, which it was now wished to maim and to curtail, politics were perhaps the least alluring and advantageous pursuit of any of those to which a young man of talents and education can devote himself. The same ability, industry, and duration of service applied to other liberal pursuits, could hardly fail of meeting with more adequate and splendid remuneration. In the army, in time of war, the highest ranks and honours were open to the young candidate. At the bar, wealth, dignity, and fame, were placed before him; and, although it might not perhaps be in the competence of many to attain, by their exertions, to the eminence of the hon. and learned gentleman opposite, (Sir S. Romilly) yet, at the bar, that moderate degree of success which even the least sanguine might venture to anticipate as the reward of unremitting study and assiduity, would afford means of earlier competence than was afforded by a line of secondary office, with all its chances and vicissitudes, to the average even of tolerably fortunate politicians. Would the House then sacrifice a permanent and assured advantage to a temporary pressure, which that sacrifice could not in the smallest imaginable degree tend to relieve?—Would they, in obedience to the clamours of demagogues, destroy the power of carrying on the Government on the system which has, for more than a century, been found practically expedient and beneficial,—safe for our liberties, and conducive to our glory,—by destroying those minor offices from which the wants of the state in its highest departments are constantly fed and supplied?—This was the true point for the decision of the House. The interest of the present Ministers in the question was absolutely nothing,—except as their interest was inseparably connected with the public good. He had said that the acceding to this proposition and to those which were announced as intended to follow it, would really not disable Ministers; but would, indeed, be unpropitious to the hopes of those who sat opposed to them. If it were with any such personal views that their opponents pressed these reductions, they acted like the impatient expectants of a dilapidated inheritance. They would pull down the building to obtain possession of the ruins. Finding themselves unable to remove Ministers from their pedestals, they were willing to blow up a portion of the edifice with them into the air. But if it were possible that the real object of the motion was merely to turn them out, never certainly was such a compliment paid to any administration before!—Other administrations had been attacked for errors or misconduct of their own: the present administration was attacked for institutions long ago established; institutions which no ministry had ever hitherto dreamt of reforming; of which their opponents as well as themselves had, without scruple or remorse, enjoyed the benefit; and which were now first attempted to be brought into disrepute after a quiet unquestioned usage of more than a hundred years. Let it not, however, be supposed that Ministers would defend these institutions merely because they are old,—if they were not firmly persuaded that it was our duty not to suffer the interests intrusted to them, on the part of the public no less than of the Crown, to perish or to be wasted in our hands. He concluded therefore, as he began, with the declaration that, unimportant as the particular question was in itself, he was deeply and sincerely impressed with the mischievousness of its tendency,—with the danger that would ensue from its success (followed up as that success would be) to the whole frame of our practical Government. And while he acknowledged, on the one hand, that there never was a point which (selfishly considered) it would have been more convenient for Ministers to yield, he felt, on the other hand, so strong a conviction of the impropriety and inexpediency of yielding it, that—rather than do so voluntarily,—he would for his own part, be contented to stake the existence of the administration upon the result of their opposition to this motion.

Mr. Brougham was surprised to observe the manner in which the right hon. gentleman had misapplied his speech, which appeared to have no reference whatever to the present question. To what other question his observations had been directed, and to what arguments he had replied, he should not stop to inquire, as they did not belong to the discussion of that night. It was his wish to bring the House back to the question before them. With respect to the character which the right hon. gentleman had wished to fasten on the sea lords, the monster he described was not more strange or amphibious than that exhibited in the combination of a lord of the Admiralty and an officer of cavalry. He did not know what great office the person who afforded an instance of this amphibious character was in training for; whether for prime minister, leader of an opposition, or commander in chief, was yet to be discovered. If offices were to be called useful for training statesmen, it might be expected they would be such as required some attendance: not sinecures; not such as required no labour from the possession, except signing a receipt for a thousand a year. It was a bad object for the House to aim at a victory over the people. The abolition of useless places was universally demanded. The principles of retrenchment were recommended by those who better understood them than the right hon. gentleman, as the true means of adorning and fortifying the Constitution and the Crown. The committee, in which the Speaker took so prominent a part, as well as other honoured persons, unfortunately now dead, were now insulted, by being told that their objects were not reforms, but the countenancing of clamours, and the piercing through the sides of the Constitution. He should at that hour spare observations on the bewildering latter part of Mr. C.'s speech; but the right hon. gentleman made misrepresentations as to the diminution of the influence of the Crown, which he had said was operated by force of public opinion. He pushed that point too far. He had spoken of placemen in Whig times; but were there no other ways of influence than by seats in Parliament? There might be more influence exerted when there were only 50 placemen in the House than when there were 100. The increase of the revenue, and the means it afforded, were to be considered, as well as our extended foreign dependencies. As to the inducements to persons to enter into a political life, that was a large and delicate field which he should then abstain from touching. He wished Ministers had not spoken so openly about sets of political men, who entered on politics as a trade; which was not very well suited to present circumstances. As to the supposed profits of the exertions of a lawyer, the right hon. gentleman had a little overrated the matter. There might be some particular cases in his favour; but there was little hope in that profession of getting so large a sum as 14,000*l.* a year, with comparatively little or no labour at all. (Hear.) This, it appeared, was open to traders in another branch. The noble lord and the right hon. gentleman had attempted recrimination. The question itself they left unanswered. They said only, "what did you do when in office?" This was a wretched and miserable tu quoque, which they instantly paraded. If well-founded, it was beside the question. It did not apply to him, nor to those who were of no particular party, and still less to the people. (Hear.) It was irrelevant as well as false in application to his (Mr. B.'s) friends, who were twitted and taunted with it. During the time they held the places we were at war, therefore the argument was inapplicable. He implored the House to dismiss every consideration, except the state of the country, particularly if they wished to put down clamour. The right hon. gentleman himself had been the greatest deluder and wholesale dealer in clamour of all, from 1807 down to the end of his speech that night. Those who wished well to the Constitution of the country, and of that House, ought to feel the necessity of satisfying the just, reasonable, and right expectations of the people. (Hear.)

The House then divided on the previous question moved by Lord Castlereagh:—

Ayes . . . 208 | Noes . . . 152—Majority 56.

MAJORITY.

Abdy, Sir W.
Abercrombie, R.
Adlington, Rt. Hon. J. H.
Alexander, J.
Allan, Geo.
Apsley, Lord
Arbuthnot, Rt. Hon. C.
Ashurst, W. H.
Barne, N.
Barry, J. M.
Bathurst, Rt. Hon. C.
Beattie, Esq.
Benson, R.
Beresford, Lord G.
Beresford, Sir J.
Bernard, Lord

Binning, Lord
Blackburne, J. J.
Blair, J. H.
Bloomfield, Sir B.
Boswell, A.
Bourne, W. S.
Bridport, Lord
Broglie, J.
Brydges, Sir E.
Buller, Sir E.
Butler, Hon. C.
Calvert, John
Campbell, Gen. A.
Canning, Rt. Hon. G.
Canning, G.
Cartwright, W. B.

Casberd, R. M.
 Castlereagh, Visc.
 Chichester, A.
 Clute, W.
 Clements, H. J.
 Clerk, Sir G.
 Clive, Visc.
 Clive, H.
 Cockrell, Sir C.
 Collins, H. P.
 Colthurst, Sir N.
 Cotter, J. L.
 Courtenay, W.
 Courtenay, F. P.
 Cuckett, R. A.
 Crosbie, J.
 Croker, J. W.
 Curtis, Sir W.
 Daly, Jas.
 Davis, R. H.
 Davis, H.
 Dawson, Geo.
 Deroos, Hon. H.
 Desbrow, L.
 Doveton, G.
 Douglas, W. R.
 Dowdeswell, E.
 Drummond, G. H.
 Drummond, J.
 Dundas, Rt. Hon. W.
 Dunlop, Gen. J.
 Egerton, Sir J. G.
 Egerton, W.
 Ellison, R.
 Estcourt, J. G.
 Evelyn, L.
 Falkner, Sir F.
 Fitzgerald, Aug.
 Fane, J.
 Fane, Gen.
 Farriner, S.
 Farquhar, J.
 Follows, W. H.
 Finch, Hon. E. Gen.
 Fitzgerald, Rt. Hon. V.
 Fitzhugh, W.
 Fraser, C.
 Garrow, Sir W.
 Gascoyne, I. Gen.
 Gillett, D.
 Gicrawley, Vis.
 Golding, P.
 Good, I. S.
 Guilburn, H.
 Grant, A.
 Grant, C. jun.
 Graves, Lord
 Gunning, Sir G.
 Gurney, H.
 Hall, B.
 Hare, Hon. R.
 Harvey, Charles
 Heathcote, T. F.
 Holford, G. P.
 Holmes, W.
 Hope, Sir G.
 Horne, W.
 Hamilton, Hans
 Houlton, J. N.
 Howard, Hon. T. G.
 Hulse, Sir C.
 Hume, Sir W.

Huskisson, Rt. Hon. W.
 Jackson, Sir J.
 Jenkinson, Hon. C.
 Jocelyn, Visc.
 Jones, J.
 Irving, J.
 Kirkwall, Vis.
 Kynaston Powell, J.
 Iacon, E. R.
 Lascelles, Vis.
 Law, Hon. E.
 Leigh, J. H.
 Lloyd, Hard.
 Lockhart, W. E.
 Loftus, W.
 Long, Rt. Hon. C.
 Lovaine, Lord
 Lowther, Lord
 Lowther, James
 Lowther, J. jun.
 Lushington, S. R.
 Luttrell, H. T.
 Luttrell, J. T.
 Lygon, Hon. H.
 Maberley, J.
 McNaughten, E. A.
 Macqueen, T. P.
 Manning, W.
 March, Earl of Meyler, R.
 Michl, Gen. J.
 Milne, P.
 Money, W. T.
 Moore, Lord H.
 Moorsom, Sir R.
 Morritt, J. R.
 Needham, Hon. F.
 Neville, R.
 Nicholl, Sir J.
 Ogle, H. M.
 O'Neil, Hon. J.
 Osborn, J.
 Paget, Hon. Gen.
 Paget, Hon. C.
 Paget, Hon. B.
 Pakenham, Hon. H.
 Palmer, C. M.
 Palmerston, Visc.
 Peel, Rt. Hon. R.
 Percy, Hon. J.
 Perring, Ald. Sir J.
 Phipps, Hon. E. Gen.
 Pitt, J.
 Pitt, W. M.
 Pocock, G.
 Pole, Rt. Hon. W. W.
 Porter, Gen. G.
 Pringle, Gen. Sir W.
 Quin, Hon. W.
 Robinson, G. A.
 Robinson, Rt. Hon. F.
 Rochfort, G.
 Rose, Rt. Hon. G.
 Round, J.
 St. Paul, Sir H.
 St. Paul, H.
 Shawe, B.
 Sheldon, R.
 Simeon, Sir J.
 Singleton, M.
 Smith, Alderman
 Somerset, Lord G.

Somerville, Sir M.
 Spencer, Sir B.
 Staniforth, J.
 Stirling, Sir W.
 Sullivan, Rt. Hon. J.
 Sumner, G. H.
 Suttie, Sir J.
 Sutton, Rt. Hon. C. M.
 Thynne, Lord J.
 Tomline, W. E.
 Ure, M.
 Valletort, Lord
 Vernon, Gran.
 Wallace, Rt. Hon. T.
 Walpole, Lord
 Ward, Hon. J. W.
 Ward, Robert

Warrender, Sir G.
 Webber, D.
 Webber, E. W.
 Wellesley, W. W. L.
 Wetherell, C.
 White, M.
 Williams, R.
 Willoughby, H.
 Wilson, C.
 Wood, Sir M.
 Wood, Colonel T.
 Wright, J. A.
 Wrottesley, H.
 Wyatt, C.
 Yorke, Rt. Hon. C.
 Yorke, Sir Joseph

MINORITY.

*Althorp, Viscount
 Anson, Hon. Sir George
 Atherley, Arthur
 *Ackland, Sir T.
 *Browne, Dom.
 Burrell, Sir C.
 *Burrell, Walter
 Babbington, Tho.
 *Bastard, E. P.
 *Bentinck, Lord W.
 Bolland, John
 Barclay, C.
 Bennet, Hon. H. G.
 Baring, Sir Thomas
 Barnett, James
 Barnard, Viscount
 Birch, Jos.
 *Brind, Hon. Thos.
 Brougham, Henry
 Burdett, Sir Francis
 Burrell, Hon. P. D.
 Carter, John
 Calley, Thomas
 *Cust, Hon. W.
 Chetwode, Sir J.
 Calcraft, John
 Calvert, Nic.
 Calvert, Charles
 *Carew, R. S.
 *Caulfield, Hon. H.
 *Cavendish, Lord G.
 Chaloner, Robert
 Cocks, Hon. J. S.
 Cocks, James
 *Coke, Thos.
 *Davenport, D.
 *Dickinson, Wm.
 Duncannon, Viscount
 Dundas, Hon. L.
 *Dundas, Charles
 Deerburch, Viscount
 Fhrington, Viscount
 Elliot, Rt. Hon. W.
 *Fane, John
 *Frank, Frank
 Fazakerley, S. N.
 *Ferguson, Sir R.
 *Fitzgerald, Lord W.
 Fitzroy, Lord John
 Folkstone, Viscount
 Frankland, Robert
 *Fitzgerald, Rt. Hon. M.

*Geary, Sir W.
 Gaskell, Ben.
 Gippe, George
 Gordon, Robert
 Grenfell, Pascoe
 *Gause, Sir W.
 *Hamilton, Lord A.
 *Hamilton, Sir H. D.
 Hanbury, William
 *Heathcote, Sir G.
 Heron, Sir Robert
 Howard, Hon. W.
 Hughes, W. L.
 Hurst, Robert
 Jervois, G. P.
 Lester, B. L.
 *Long, R. G.
 Leigh, Thos.
 Lockhart, J. I.
 Leader, W.
 Lamb, Hon. W.
 *Lambton, T. G.
 *Langton, W. G.
 *Latouche, Rob. jun.
 *Lemon, Sir W.
 Lewis, T. F.
 *Lounds, W.
 *Methuen, Paul
 Marryat, Jos.
 Morritt, J. B.
 Macdonald, James
 *Mackintosh, Sir J.
 Madocks, W. A.
 Martin, Henry
 Martin, John
 *Milton, Viscount
 Molyneux, H. H.
 *Monck, Sir Charles
 *Morpeth, Viscount
 Moore, Peter
 Newnan, R. W.
 *Neville, Hon. R.
 Newport, Sir John
 North, Dudley
 Nugent, Lord
 Onslow, Arthur
 Ord, William
 Ossulston, Lord
 Peckell, Sir Thos.
 Pole, Sir C. M.
 *Portman, E. B.
 *Powell, W. C.

Protheroe, E.
Peirse, Henry
Phillips, George
Piggot, Sir A.
*Ponsonby, Rt. Hon. G.
*Ponsonby, Hon. F. C.
*Power, Richard
*Prittie, Hon. F. A.
*Pym, Francis
Ramsbottom, John
Rashleigh, Wm.
Ramsden, J. C.
Rancliffe, Lord
Romilly, Sir Samuel
*Rowley, Sir W.
Russell, Lord William
Russell, Lord G. W.
Russell, R. G.
Saville, Albany
*Sebright, Sir J.
Shaw, Sir James
Swan, H.
Scudamore, Robert
Sharp, Richard

Sefton, Earl of
Smith, John
Smith, Sam.
Smith, Abel
Smith, Wm.
Smith, Robert
Smyth, J. H.
*Spiers, Arch.
*Stanley, Lord
*Stemayne, J. H.
Thompson, Thos.
*Tavistock, Marquis
Taylor, C. W.
Tierney, Right Hon. G.
Townshend, Lord J.
Vaughan, Hon. J.
Wright, J. Atkins
Walpole, Hon. G.
Waldegrave, Hon. W.
Warre, J. A.
*Webb, E.
Wilkins, Walter
Wynn, C. W.

TALKERS—Banks, Henry—Ridley, M. W.
*County Members.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, Feb. 26.

Lord Sidmouth laid on the table two reports relative to the management of the Sinking Fund.

The Malta trade bill was read a third time, and passed. The coal bill, and the malt duty and office contributions bill were read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, Feb. 26.

ROCHESTER ELECTION.] Sir T. Baring, the chairman of the committee appointed to try the merits of the petition complaining of an undue return for the city of Rochester, reported from the committee, that the poll had been prematurely closed, that the sitting member, J. Barnett, Esq. had not been duly elected, and neither the petition nor the opposition to it had been frivolous and vexatious.

On the motion of Sir T. Baring a new writ was ordered to be issued for the city of Rochester, in the room of J. Barnett, Esq. whose election had been declared void.

WOOTTON BASSETT ELECTION.] Lord W. Russell presented a petition from Thomas Jeffries, who had been committed to Newgate for prevaricating on the Wootton Bassett election committee. The petitioner attributed his fault to want of preparation and fear, and stated that he had a wife and three children, and prayed the mercy of the House. He was ordered to be brought to the bar of the House to-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Lascelles presented petitions on this subject from the townships of Eckmondwyke and Barton.—Laid on the table.

Lord Derby presented a petition from Worcester, signed by 3000 persons in favour of Parliamentary Reform. He should feel it his duty to promote any plan which might secure a practical and salutary Reform; but he would never listen to any chimerical schemes of Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments, the tendency of which was, in his opinion, to lead to open revolution.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. J. Smith presented a petition from the town of Nottingham for a Reform in Parliament. Laid on the table.

HAMPDEN CLUBS.] Mr. J. Smith presented a petition from the members of the Hampden Club, praying that the Habeas Corpus Act might not be suspended, and complaining that they had been falsely criminated in the Report of the Secret Committee: they alleged that they had never harboured any designs against the Constitution; that their meetings had always been open, and they prayed to be heard at the bar of the House. The hon. member expressed his regret that the committee had not received evidence of this nature before they made their Report.

Lord Rancliffe hoped the House would pause before they proceeded with the measure in contemplation. After the noble lord who brought it forward had betrayed his country abroad, there was little confidence to be placed in the measures he might pursue at home.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

CITY OF LONDON PETITION.] Mr. Sheriff Brydges brought up a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the city of London, deprecating the intended suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

On the motion that it should lie on the table, Sir W. Curtis would not oppose that motion, but he disagreed with every word contained in the petition. (Hear, hear.)

Sir J. Shaw thought the language of the petition moderate, and deserving the utmost attention. He had no objection to three of the bills proposed by the noble lord; but, with respect to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, after all the attention he had been able to pay to the Report of the committee, and after the opening speech of the noble lord, he solemnly and conscientiously affirmed, that he could not see any ground laid for that measure. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Smith agreed with the worthy alderman, that there was no ground for such a measure; and he was surprised to hear another hon. alderman (Sir W. Curtis) say, that he disagreed with every word of the petition. He trusted he had stated the hon. alderman's words rightly.

Sir W. Curtis.—Perfectly right. (A laugh.)

Mr. W. Smith was sorry that he was so; for he hoped to have held out an opportunity of explanation.

Mr. Curzon exclaimed, that after sitting in that House 30 years, and at a time when the greatest differences had prevailed on this question, he had never seen it treated with such a scandalous want of feeling as by the hon. alderman who had thus raised a laugh on the subject. He would not say that he should ultimately oppose strengthening the hands of Government; but, unless they made out a strong case, he should not be willing to take away the liberties of the subject. It was impossible for any one who recollected the times of terror not to feel the alarm that he did: at that period no person could differ in opinion from Government without being suspected of designs against the country.

Sir W. Curtis said, he was not accountable for the laugh of the House. He had not himself shewn any degree of levity, but merely stated that his sentiments differed totally from those in the petition. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Curwen thought the peculiar and abrupt manner in which the hon. baronet expressed his dissent, without assigning the least reason for it, had an appearance of levity.

Sir W. Curtis said, he had given his reason at length in the Court of Common Council itself.

Mr. Philips observed, that as the district in which he resided had been referred to in the Report as infected by treasonable practices, he felt it necessary to state, having resided there since last Session, what he himself knew. Distresses and sufferings had been experienced, such as no gentleman not living in manufacturing districts could have any idea of. To adopt a phrase in the Report, "few, if any," were employed; and "few, if any,"—he might almost say none—who had employment, could maintain themselves. They might procure food, but they could not procure clothing, except in "few, if any," instances. (Hear.) At such a time of distress were they to compliment Ministers by surrendering to them the liberties of England? In the districts he was acquainted with, disaffection might be said to exist for ever, if Parliament or Government lent an ear to credulous persons. He remembered one story of a man's house having been burned down because he had spoken against the reformers: a story which alarmed many; but it turned out that the man had burned his house himself. He had been told of great disaffection in adjacent districts, but he could draw out no facts. He inquired of persons of knowledge and veracity, and was told there was no such thing. The Manchester people, indeed, had been told to petition for Reform, as the best mode of curing their grievances: but the town officers declined to call the meeting. This did not irritate the people, as might have been expected, for they met and conducted themselves with order and decorum. He had passed by one of these meetings for the purpose of observation, and never saw a public meeting more orderly. (Hear.) He wished for some knowledge of the characters of those who gave the information on which the Report proceeded; for if they were narrow credulous people, he should not give them credit. A most serious power would be given to municipal officers by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act: and they might be as credulous as the poor people they interrupted. They might make petition of any thing; even of a petition for dismissing the Ministers. (Hear.) He admitted that there always existed combinations to raise wages and regulate trade, which were injurious, and which he should like to see at an end; but as to treasonable conspiracies, he required much more information than he had received.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald had opposed the bill giving such extraordinary powers to magistrates, because he thought the measure sprung from an inadequate source. One part of the Report seemed calculated to excite alarm, and afford ground for extraordinary powers, by leaving it probable that some of the higher orders were engaged. He felt it not right to legislate the suspension of our rights and liberties, without distinctly asking for an explanation as to who of the higher orders were connected with it. If the expression was only a lapse, or something of the same slovenly character as the rest of the Report; if really some of the higher orders were concerned, then he called on Ministers to state the fact explicitly. At present the House was all in the dark. Were any of the middling classes connected with the conspiracy? The Report was general and mysterious; the charges were as vague as the powers called for were great. To the protection of the Prince Regent, and the prevention of the seduction of the King's soldiers, he readily assented. He did not belong to this country; but he would not vote for suspending this country's liberties on slight grounds, and he hoped English members would have the same feelings towards Ireland. The outrage on the Prince Regent, he believed, affected more deeply the friends of rational freedom than it did those of any other description. (Hear.)

Mr. Wrottesley was sorry the discussion was thus anticipated. An hon. member had given an account of Manchester, respecting which place he seemed sore. As to the distress there, all were aware of it: not at Manchester only, but in Staffordshire fully as much. In that county, manufacturers had suffered greatly; but he gloried in saying, that they had not run into the excesses of the people of Manchester. He wished the hon. member's friends at Manchester had confined themselves to their county, and not sent their orators, at so much per day, to other counties, where no sign of disloyalty appeared before their arrival. A meeting was held at Newcastle-under-Lyne, and attended by an orator from Manchester, who received 24s. 6d. for his expenses. He thought to seduce the people in the Potteries. He might be one of the hon. member's friends. In Staffordshire the people were disposed to be peaceable and grateful, if left without these emissaries; but he was happy to say, that the orator was literally hooted out of the town of Newcastle.

He hoped the hon. member would contrive to keep these people quiet at home. (Hear.)

Mr. Ponsonby expressed his great surprise and astonishment at the speech he had just heard, and the charges it contained (hear); particularly when he recollected, that for several years the hon. and learned member had co-operated with the hon. gentleman, and others on that side of the House, so very cordially, and could not then see in them any disloyal intentions, or any disposition to support disloyalty in others. (hear.) He had called the people whom he condemned, the friends of the hon. member. All this discovery of disloyalty remained secret till after he had pinned himself behind the back of the Ministers! (hear.) "I will tell the hon. and learned member, that my hon. friend is as loyal as he is: aye, and as any of his proudest or meanest connexions. No man, elevated to any dignity, could carry with him a more honest heart, or a more independent mind. But the hon. and learned member must have forgotten himself. I may therefore reasonably expect he will apologize." (hear.)

Mr. Wrottesley observed, that if in the heat of observation he had said that the hon. member was one of those persons—(cry of "friends, friends!") He then proceeded to observe, that he should think the hon. member the very last person he should conceive to be so connected. It was quite out of the question with him, he could assure the House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Philips observed, that the hon. and learned member had imputed to him soreness respecting Manchester. He had no more reason for soreness respecting Manchester than Birmingham and other places. He was not a representative of Manchester.

Mr. Brougham would not take up the time of the House after the well merited infliction on the hon. and learned gentleman, administered in the speech of his right hon. friend. (Hear.) That relieved him from the necessity of remarking on the prominent parts of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech, in which he called the emissaries of sedition the friends of his hon. friend. (Hear.) That was now at an end; thanks to the good sense of his right hon. friend (Mr. Ponsonby). The hon. and learned gentleman admitted that Manchester was distressed, but said that Staffordshire was as much so, and wished that Manchester would behave as well as Staffordshire; but there were the local knowledge and inquiries of his hon. friend, stating that Manchester had also behaved well. He had borne testimony to the good order of his own neighbourhood, where every thing was so still and quiet, that, to use a common phrase, you might hear a vas stir! (Hear.)

Sir Gilbert Heathcote observed, that Ministers went on the ground of secret societies, and that those who professed Reform were actuated by views of revolution. Where were the facts and proofs of this? Twenty years ago he had himself voted for Reform, and yet he had no such intentions as those now imputed to such numbers of reformers. (Hear.) The present laws he considered sufficient for the peace and tranquillity of the country. There was no occasion to destroy or suspend the most valuable privilege of the people. Why not have assembled Parliament sooner, when the mischief was said to be known in autumn? Besides, circumstances were now quite different from a time when we were at war, and were threatened with a French invasion; and the speech from the throne said, that the great powers of Europe had expressed their desire of peace and friendship with this country.

Ordered to lie on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS] The order of the day being moved by Lord Castlereagh for the first reading of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill,

The Hon. Mr. Bennet rose to oppose it. He would oppose in every stage this arbitrary, impolitic, and uncalled-for measure. After what had passed in the House to-night—after statements of various members, and from various parts of the country, he was surprised that the noble lord opposite should move the reading of this bill as a matter of course. He was surprised that no defence was offered, that no explanation was given, that no facts were stated for the purpose of inducing the House to enact a measure which suspended all the benefits of the Constitution, which enslaved the country, and placed the liberty of every man in it at the disposal of Ministers. If it could be shewn that nothing else would save us but the measures in contemplation—if it could be proved that the ultimate security of the nation demanded a temporary suspension of its rights—if a case of strong and paramount necessity could be made, he would be the last man in the House or the country to oppose a concession of increased power to the Government. But, he would ask, had any such case been made out? had any danger demanding the proposed remedy been clearly substantiated? He had a few observations to make on the Report as laying the ground of the powers claimed by Ministers, in which he was anxious not to be misunderstood. He would not discredit that Report, nor the members who composed the committee from which it originated, although he was surprised that his right hon. friend (Mr. Ponsonby) should have disgraced himself by accepting of a place in it, and sitting in the same chamber with the noble lord opposite. (Shouts of hear.) Could his right hon. friend think himself in safety with the noble lord? (Shouts of hear.) He meant no reflection on the private character, but alluded to the public conduct of the noble lord. Did his right hon. friend not remember the noble lord's conduct on a former occasion, when he induced his right hon. friend to grant him his support? The noble lord came down to the House at the beginning of the last war against the people of France, and by professing to have no designs against the people of that country, by declaring that there was no intention in the Allies to force upon it a government, by stating distinctly that there was no wish entertained to restore the old abuses and the Bourbons, he procured the support of his right hon. friend. He made all these professions, and produced these effects by them, at the very time that he had a declaration in his pocket that belied them; he declared there was no engagement to interfere with the choice of the French people, at the very time that he had made this country a party to an alliance for the restoration of the family they had chased from the throne. (Hear.) His right hon. friend should have remembered these things, when he was nominated a member of a committee in which the noble lord sat. He was free to say, that had he (Mr. B.) been nominated a member of that committee, no inducement on earth would have led him to risk his character by acting with the noble lord. (Shouts of hear.) He would now enter into a critical examination of some parts of the Report, the charges it contained, the alarm it was calculated to spread, and the manner in which it was drawn up. He would, in doing so, declare, that he was perfectly unbiassed; that he belonged to no party; that he would make his strictures upon it, not as a party Report, but would view it as coolly as if it referred to the Popish plot. It must, in the first place, excite some degree of suspicion and jealousy against it, that it was drawn up on ex-parte evidence, and resembled so much other reports, the allegations of which were found to have been false or grossly exaggerated. In 1794 charges of the same nature were brought forward, the characters of individuals were disgracefully traduced, accusations of treason were levelled against them; they were sent before a jury of their countrymen, with all the suspicion attached to them, arising from a previous sentence of condemnation by a committee of Parliament; and in the face of Parliament, that had declared them traitors, they were acquitted; no treason was found; the evidence was declared false or insufficient. This was not all; another Report was drawn up by a secret committee in 1812, that contained charges against individuals. When its allegations, however, came to be examined on oath, nine-tenths of them were found to be false. This committee itself was divided about the examination of witnesses, and the matter in dispute was laid before the House. Mr. Whitbread stated, that the Luddites had been excited in some instances by Government officers, who were hired for their detection and apprehension; and he laid before Parliament facts to confirm his statement. Had, therefore, a strict examination taken place, as he recommended, could any man doubt that Parliament would not have disgraced itself by finding itself imposed upon by false testimony—by making up a Report filled with falsehoods, and producing such a collection of trash as it had produced?

(Shouts of hear.) If the evidence taken before two former committees of the House on these recent occasions had turned out so completely unfounded; if, when examinations were afterwards taken on oath, it was for the most part overturned, what security had we that the allegations on which we were now called to legislate, on which we were required to sacrifice the rights of the people, and surrender the benefits of the Constitution, were founded in truth? Were we not authorized in believing, that the evidence before this committee was of a similar kind with that laid before others; and that this Report might be as erroneous as former ones? The first thing that he would remark upon was, that part of it which stated, that at the denounced meetings, "the most blasphemous expressions and doctrines are openly and repeatedly advanced, profane and seditious parodies of the Liturgy and Holy Scriptures are sung." Blasphemous and seditious doctrines he detested and abhorred as much as any man, and would go to any reasonable length to put them down; but he thought our present laws were sufficient for this purpose, and would not consent to enlarge the powers of Ministers under the pretence of stopping evils which the present laws could arrest. The laws against blasphemy were severe: why were they not enforced? Where was the Attorney-General, that he did not institute proceedings against, and procure its punishment? Was the whole nation to be exposed to the tyranny of Ministers? Was a new code of despotism to be enacted merely because we had an Attorney-General who was too timid, or too negligent, in the performance of his duty? (Hear, hear.) The next thing on which he would make an observation or two was, that part of the Report which stated, that the disaffected looked out for those people among whom the greatest distress prevailed, to excite inflammation and discontent. If they looked out for distress, he was sorry to say, that they could too easily find it; they could not long search in vain. Thanks to what was called the Pitt system, distress and ruin met us every where, in the cities, on the high roads, and in villages. There was no necessity to go about for proofs of misgovernment. After what he himself had seen, after what many hon. members had described, after what met the view of every person in society, there was no further evidence required of the ruinous and impolitic nature of the system on which the affairs of the country had for the last twenty years been conducted. There was no other food for discontent necessary, nor any necessity for the haranguing the disaffected, to heighten complaints, or point out the means of relief. He could not help remarking upon that plan of rebellion and insurrection which the Report attributed to them as means of obtaining redress, or taking the management of the country into their hands. "The design," says the Report, "was by a sudden rising in the dead of night, to surprise and overpower the soldiers in the different barracks, which were to be set on fire, to possess themselves of the artillery, to seize or destroy the bridges, and to take possession of the Tower and the Bank." How was this mighty project to be accomplished? (Hear.) Could a hope be formed of success? Could there be the least danger apprehended from such wild and absurd projects? (Hear.) Could they suppose that they could overpower a garrison without spreading an alarm in a case where a single watchman would not be surprised? (Hear, hear.) There were barracks in several parts of the town; there were barracks in the Park, and in other places: could they all be surprised at once? (Hear.) Could armed men be expected to start up from the ground in the neighbourhood of each of these garrisons, to surprise the sentinel, to attack a force of nearly 5000 (which existed about town), to burn their barracks, to destroy every vestige of their power, to seize their arms, and turn them against their fellow-citizens? (hear, hear.) He was willing to admit that some wild, mad, desperate, and mischievous enthusiasts might discuss the probability of success attending such enterprises in ale-houses; that they might, in their ignorant and intoxicated societies, start such absurd ideas; but could there be any danger from such instruments? Was there not strength enough in the existing law to restrain their attempts; and because they were so frantic and foolish, was the liberty of the whole nation to be placed at the disposal of Ministers? (Hear, hear.) But it seemed that their next attempt would have been to blow up the bridges. How was this to be done? How were the strong works of Westminster-bridge, Waterloo, and the rest of those massy structures to be overthrown? What preparations were made for the mighty undertaking? Why, we found six men in a waggon, having an old stocking, in which there was a little powder. (Hear, and laughter.) Could these absurdities be repeated without exciting contempt and ridicule? This pompous display of burlesque design in the Report, compared with the instruments and the means of execution, put him (Mr. B.) in mind of a performance which, perhaps, the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Canning) would remember better than he: he meant the drama of The Abbey of Quiddlenburgh. (A laugh.) To describe this enterprise in the style of that performance, there would be—scene, Spafelds—time, morning—enter waggon, with six men and the ammunition stocking. (Laughter.) From Spafelds they must proceed to blow up the bridges, without sappers or miners: they must take the Bank, defended by its guard; they must advance to summon the Tower, defended with artillery, and manned with soldiers; they must overpower all opposition, and take possession of the town. Was not such an absurdity, gravely advanced in the Report, sufficient to throw discredit on the whole? (Hear.) Then there came the story of the pikes; and great danger was apprehended from the manufacture of such deadly instruments. He believed firmly, that the account given of these pikes was the true one—that they were fabricated, not to attack the citizens of London—not for the purpose of rebellion and insurrection, but to defend a pond against depredation. (Hear, hear.) He lent a more easy credence to this story, because he remembered, that in 1794 (the secret committee of that day having like them discovered deadly instruments) there was said to have been found eight tailors and one pike in Tooley-street in the Borough. (Much laughter.) Mr. Giham, who went to search the house where these materials of rebellion were found, declared, that no mother ever looked with more delight and complacency on the face of a favourite and only child than he did upon this pike. (Much laughter.) Was not this account of pikes sufficient to excite the contempt of every rational man in the country? (Hear, hear.) Then came the mighty subscription, which was to support, encourage, and invigorate this dangerous conspiracy; and here it must be allowed there was a little improvement in the finances of rebellion since 1794. At that period the sum subscribed for carrying on the projects of treason was 91. 15s.; now it amounted to no less an extent than 10l. being 5s. more. (Laughter and hear.) He supposed, as they were to burn the barracks, they had previously robbed the military chest for such a supply. (Laughter.) "Shame! shame!" (exclaimed the hon. gentleman) to those who could produce this absurdity to Parliament, and, on the ground of its importance, call upon us for a surrender of our liberties." (Hear.) Now he came to the conclusion of the Report, where it stated, that, "few, if any, of the higher orders, or even of the middle classes of society, had lent themselves to these violent projects." A more vague, indefinite, obscure, and unjust insinuation was never heard; a more scandalous statement never appeared in the Report of any committee. (Hear, hear.) If there was a single individual why not mention it? Was there one gentleman, he would ask? (Hear, hear.) Was there one nobleman? (Hear, hear.) Was there one man of property? (Hear, hear.) Was there one in the middle ranks of life? (Hear.) If there was any one he ought to have been named. If there was none, then this part of the Report insinuated a falsehood. (Shouts of hear.) He said the Report was a gross falsehood. (Hear, hear.) Was the House to resort to the same arts, to get quit of its errors, as another House. (Order.) Was it to pursue a mean shuffling course; was it to say that a word was brought in, or a word left out, as suited its purpose? (Shouts of hear.) The whole people were in this Report libelled and arraigned; they were traduced in their characters, and were to surrender their freedom by such trash as this—"Trash," said the hon. gentleman, "which I only think fit for trampling under my feet." Yet upon vague and absurd allegations, the invasion of the Constitution was justified, and measures were to be passed, "by which I," said he, "may be apprehended and imprisoned to-morrow, by the command, and during the pleasure, of the noble lord; who declares, that I and my friends are responsible to God and man for the encouragement we give to any plan for reducing his power, or supporting the liberties of the people." Parliament, on such trash, was called upon to suspend the Constitution, and to surrender the rights of the people into the hands of Ministers. "Though those," said the hon. gentleman, "in whom I have the greatest confidence were to require such a sacrifice—though Ministers whose conduct I was convinced had always tended to promote the public good—though my own friends made the demand, I would oppose them, till they shewed, in the necessity of the case, a justification of their proposals. I will never consent, therefore, to surrender the rights of the people without such necessity into the hands of such Ministers as the noble lord, who would abuse the power intrusted to them, who had already embroiled their hands in the blood of their country, who had already been guilty of the most criminal cruelties. (Cries of order.)

Lord Castlereagh rose to order, and called upon the hon. gentleman to retract his expressions, or to prove his charge, and to name the individual Minister to whom he alluded.

Mr. Bennet, after order was a little restored, proceeded. He charged the Ministers with criminal conduct in abusing their trust under the last suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and obtaining a bill of indemnity to cover their delinquencies.

Lord Castlereagh spoke again to order. The hon. gentleman had not explained or retracted the charge made against an individual of embroiling his hands in the blood of his country. (Cries of hear, hear.)

Lord Milton could not help recalling to the noble lord's recollection, that the hon. member (Mr. Bennet) had charged him with criminal conduct only in the sense of illegally requiring a bill of indemnity to protect him from consequences. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, that if the hon. gentleman meant to say that he had committed cruelties, had imbrued his hands in blood, and been guilty of criminal actions, for which he required a bill of indemnity, he would reply by using the phrase that the hon. gentleman employed in speaking of the Report, that he uttered a falsehood. (Shouts of hear.)

Mr. C. Yorke said, that the act might be illegal, and not criminal. A bill of indemnity could protect against the consequences of the former, but not of the latter. If the hon. member adhered to the word criminal, his expression should be taken down, and made the subject of future deliberation; if he meant illegal only, he ought to state so. If all that he intended to say was, that acts were done that were against law, and that were covered by a bill of indemnity, his words might be passed over as parliamentary, and allowable. (Hear.)

Mr. C. Wynn regretted the charge, but as it was made generally against the Ministers (hear, hear, and no, no) and not personally against an individual, he thought the charge was allowable in debate, or at least not disorderly. On this ground he thought the debate might go on. He did not justify the expression, either as applied in one way or the other; but applied generally, he did not think it disorderly. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brand was convinced, from the use his hon. friend made of the expression, and from the scope of his argument, that he must have meant to convey the charge, that during the last suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, Ministers had ordered arrests for which they would have been actionable after the expiration of the suspension, had they not been protected by a bill of indemnity. This must have been the meaning of the word-criminal; and while the occasion thus explained its import, it defined its extent.

The Speaker submitted to the House, that the question was, whether the hon. gentleman meant to charge the whole of the Ministers of the Crown, or only one individual, with being guilty—first, of sanguinary proceedings; and secondly, of criminal acts. If the charge was directed against the whole administration, it was not disorderly to be made in the House; if it was a personal charge against an individual member of the House, it was certainly disorderly. The hon. gentleman was called upon to explain. (Hear.)

Mr. Bennet resumed.—He was the last man in the House to retract an expression that he had used, whether orderly or disorderly, upon a peremptory demand; but he had no hesitation in declaring, upon the word of a gentleman and a man of honour, that he meant the charge to apply, not to one hand in the Ministry, but the whole Ministry who acted under the former suspension bill; during whose fatal reign, acts of such enormity took place in Ireland. (Hear.) If there was any criminal act, he was aware that it could not be screened by a bill of indemnity; the connexion of the words therefore proved that by criminal he meant illegal, and that not as directed against a member of the Government, but the whole Government.

Lord Castlereagh declared, that he was satisfied that the hon. gentleman did not mean a personal charge. He could not, therefore, complain of what was said against the Government of which he was a member, but as a member of the Government. In his own name, however, and that of his colleagues, and on public grounds, if a charge of cruelty was brought against them, and they were described as embroiling their hands in the blood of the country, he would use the words that the hon. gentleman applied to the Report of a committee, of which his right hon. friend (Mr. Ponsonby) was a member, and say it was a direct falsehood. He could not deal out to the hon. gentleman any other measure of justice, than he himself dealt to his right hon. friend. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bennet resumed.—When he spoke of cruelties, they were impressed deeply on his mind; for they were cruelties perpetrated, not in remote regions, not beyond the bounds of our own country, not by a mandate to be executed at a distance, but at home, under the eye of Government, in the Castle-yard—

Lord Castlereagh rose again to order. If the hon. member meant to bring a direct charge against the Government of Ireland, he (Lord C.) was prepared to answer him; but he did not think it orderly, and he was afraid it might be mischievous, to make such accusations in the course of a debate, which had no connexion with them, and vilify the character of men, who would commit an irregularity in entering on their defence. (Hear.)

Mr. Bennet avowed, that he did not mean to pursue the subject; but as the noble lord had met his charge of cruelty with a negative, he thought himself called upon to state some facts as justification of his conduct in making it.—(Hear.) He might have been betrayed into too great a warmth of feeling, and might have used violent expressions, which he was sure the House would excuse. He meant to say, and he persisted in the declaration, that it would be fatal to public liberty, to put the powers which the bills before the House would convey, if they passed into acts, into the hands of men who had formerly possessed them, and who had outraged the rights of the people, and notoriously abused their trust. (Hear, hear.) He therefore should feel it his duty to oppose this bill in every stage.

Mr. F. Leavis did not come to the decision without serious regret. He should vote for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, with a full conviction that he was parting for a time with the great safeguard of our liberties. He should give his vote with reluctance, but he decided as he had done, because in the balance of evils between a temporary suspension of our rights, and the endangering their ultimate security, the former was the least formidable. (Hear, hear.) He had only to choose between evils. He was anxious to shew the reasons why he thought so; but he was sensible that in enlarging upon them he should merely be going over topics already discussed. He would vote for the suspension, therefore, because he thought every establishment that was connected with the freedom, the happiness, the order, or interests of society, was in imminent jeopardy. (Hear.) Whatever might be attributed to the committee, it could not be denied, that it was composed of men of integrity and worth, men anxious to perform their duty, and men who, without the means of judging, never have declared, that they could not come to the conclusion that they did. The House must take upon their authority what they took upon proof. If it was necessary, however, to look for proofs of disaffection and danger, could we not see them every where—flagrant lamentable proofs? Did we not see them in the wide dissemination of books of the most dangerous tendency and blasphemous character (hear); abounding in the most demoralizing maxims and the most fatal doctrines, tending to the overthrow of religion, of law, of order, and of property? Could any one shut his eyes to the profane parodies of the most sacred services of the church obtruded upon general attention, sold at every corner, spread not only over the population of the towns, but transmitted by post to the country, and scattering infection over the most secluded villages? (Hear, hear.) These things justified the greatest apprehension. This dangerous spirit that was gone abroad was not new; it was a remnant of what was seen in 1795. It was then suppressed, but it was cherished in the bosoms that first conceived it. It was then, as now, masked under the character of Reform. (Hear.) Reform had allied itself now with the dangerous sect of the Spencean philanthropists. This sect might be despised for the absurdity of its doctrines, but it was dangerous from their captivating quality: it was as formidable in one sense, as contemptible in another. From these sources proceeded our danger; but what was its magnitude? Was it of such amount as to justify the suspension of our most sacred law? He would not enter into a comparison of the dangers formerly and now; although he did not see that war very much increased them, or rendered a suspension bill more necessary then than now. What were the dangers we had at present to contend with? They proceeded from the public distress, which must always generate public discontent. Demagogues had fixed upon the discontents to turn them to their own use; and he was sorry to say, that they had no limit but our distress. The pressure arose from various causes, which did not admit of an immediate remedy: it arose from the change in our currency, from taxes, from the state of agriculture, and a variety of other sources, that legislation could not immediately reach. It had been said, conciliate; but how conciliate men who entertained the Spencean doctrines; and whose system could only be realized by a general distribution of the property of the country into new hands, and different shares? (Hear, hear.) A most important question he admitted it to be, was, whether the laws already in force were or were not sufficient to provide against the danger. This was a question which he certainly did not feel himself competent to resolve; but what he knew was, that whenever the country had been considered to be in imminent peril, the Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) What he meant was, that there never had occurred a crisis of great internal commotion, or of external war, in which this measure had not been resorted to. In his opinion an equal danger existed at the present moment. It was not enough to revive the act of 1799, at a time when all law and all property were exposed to the same hazard.

Mr. Torté suggested, as a point of order, that a bill coming from the Lords, and of which the House could not be supposed to have any previous cognizance, ought to be read a first time before a general discussion upon it was entertained.

Mr. Smyth, of Cambridge, observed, that if he differed from those who proposed the measure now under consideration, it was for a very logical reason; as the premises upon which the proposition was submitted to him, did not justify the conclusion. In order to supply this defect in reasoning, as it appeared to him, an hon. gentleman had remarked, that numerous were the instances in which the few had prevailed over the many, in times of political agitation. But if there were such instances, which it was impossible to deny, he apprehended that they had always remained as proofs that the Government under which they happened, had been sleeping at its post, and had been guilty of a negligence for which they were responsible to the State, rather than that they had furnished any argument against the permanent advantages of a free Constitution. Allusion had been made to the example of the French revolution, as illustrative of the truth of the position; but to his judgment it appeared, not that the French revolution was a triumph of the few over the many, but the triumph of the many over the few, who were interested in perpetuating abuses. (Hear, hear.) Neither could he forget that that revolution took place in a country where there was no want of a sufficient power to imprison, (hear,) but where no such law as the Habeas Corpus had ever existed. (Hear.) It followed, not from the absence of arbitrary power, but from the experience of its grievousness. With regard to the poisonous and destructive doctrines which were in circulation, he considered them to originate in poverty and discontent; and, although not likely to make an impression on the minds of a virtuous and contented peasantry, he agreed might make a very mischievous effect on those of unemployed artisans and manufacturers. But then the question was, might not these dangers be guarded against by the laws? To this it was answered by the Attorney-General, that seditious doctrines were now promulgated with such addressfulness, that it was impossible for the law to reach their authors. But if this was so, the obvious remedy seemed to him to be, to amend those particular laws, which were found to be inadequate to their original purpose; but he must protest against this as a reason for arming the Attorney-General with the power of depriving any man of the trial by jury; and still more, of depriving the mass of the community of their most valuable inheritance. (Hear, hear.) If, at a time of universal distress, a just measure of gratitude had not been returned to the unprecedented benevolence which it had awakened, and never had benevolence opened its arms, more widely, was this to justify them in making so alarming an inroad on the best securities of the Constitution? The principle of our Criminal Code had ever been, that ten guilty ought to escape, rather than that one innocent man should suffer. The proposed measure, however, went upon a different principle, and assumed, that no matter how many innocent should suffer provided public security was attained. (Hear, hear.) It was evidently a great departure from the maxims of our ancestors, and of which he knew no examples, unless in times of rebellion, or threatened invasion by a foreign foe.

Mr. Robinson could only account for the unanimity of the committee by the force of the evidence which had been laid before them. He knew that the reports of parliamentary committees were always exposed to a certain degree of odium and ridicule, and that they never proved satisfactory to the minds of all. If the danger were overrated by some, it was equally probable that it was undervalued by others; but it might be important to observe, that the present Report was not the first which took notice of the principles of the Spencean Societies. They were alluded to in the Report of a committee of that House in 1801, and although under a name somewhat different, viz. the Spenserians, still professing similar principles, and entertaining similar designs. He had heard it observed by an hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham), whom he seldom heard without admiration, that absurd doctrines might be persecuted into importance: but the doctrines in question were peculiarly calculated to attract the attention of the ignorant and desperate, in whose dispositions the common elements of treason were to be found. However despicable in its origin, the spirit of treason was of a subtle nature, and unless seasonably extinguished, might produce tremendous effects. (Hear, hear.) The Hampden and Union Clubs had proclaimed principles, the tendency of which was the same as those of other societies, and involved a combination of all that was wicked in hostility to the existing constitution of society. One formidable system of the character of these clubs surely was the practice of administering oaths; and another, that of keeping lists of names; for which no other reason could be assigned than an intention to single out those to whom they belonged as proper objects of popular vengeance. An hon. friend of his (Mr. Smyth) had observed, that the existence of a foreign war, operating in favour of the disaffected at home, had hitherto been the agreement upon which such a measure as the present had on former occasions been founded: but was not the reliance of the disaffected on foreign assistance at those times an evidence of their real weakness at home; and was not the boldness now manifested a proof of the consciousness they fully of their domestic strength? It was the duty of Parliament to afford protection to the people against those who would delude and betray them to their destruction. An hon. baronet (Sir F. Burdett) had contended, that a general arming would be the best means of defending property against the doctrines of the Spenceans; but such a measure must, in his opinion, lead inevitably to a civil war; and, therefore, if likely to be effectual ultimately, was a remedy which, for the sake of humanity, it was not advisable to adopt. Nothing short of some measure of this kind could secure property, satisfy all those who wished for any thing rather than the ruin of their country, and afford due legal protection to that part of society which was anxious only to raise and maintain itself by the exertions of honest industry. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Althorp considered it almost impossible for any man to argue fairly on the present question without some knowledge of the facts upon which the Report was founded. With respect to the amount of the apprehended danger, there certainly was room for much diversity of opinion; and it could not, he thought, be denied, that the absurdity of a doctrine was at least one circumstance against the probability of its success. When called upon to legislate in former emergencies, some men of note were, or were supposed to be, participators in the conspiracy: here it was admitted by the Report, that there were few, and, according to the new construction of it, none of that description, who were even remotely connected with it. In the present case, if one obscure delinquent were removed, it never could be discovered whether he had not an equally obscure successor. The only circumstances which he had ever known that could justify such a measure, were those which took place in the year 1795. To some of the minor and subsidiary measures of the noble lord he had no objection, for he disliked all public meetings convoked by unknown or anonymous authority; but he was decidedly hostile to a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, under the existing circumstances. We might boast of an admirable, and, perhaps, unequalled system of magistracy, but magistrates themselves did not always distinguish between what was directed against the Government and what was directed only against the Ministers. It was remarkable, that at the time of the mutiny in the fleet, this measure was not deemed necessary. (Hear, hear.) A connexion was, however, then supposed to exist between the mutineers and persons in the metropolis, and other districts of the country; but the circumstances were still thought insufficient by the Ministers of that day to warrant such a proceeding, because it was not believed that the disaffected held any correspondence with foreign countries. (Hear, hear.) It was not judged proper therefore even at that period of alarm, to remove so important a bulwark of the Constitution.

The Lord Advocate communicated some facts to the House, relative to that part of the kingdom to which he belonged, which must, he conceived, justify his Majesty's Ministers against the charge preferred by the noble lord. Publications had been recently circulated there, calculated to familiarize the popular mind with every immoral and seditious principle. These productions, however, were so framed as to evade the cognizance of the law, although their evident object was to bring, not only the Crown, but that House, and the Constitution itself, into contempt. A magazine of petitions had been opened in Scotland, and even speeches sent down to be delivered, which those to whom they were transmitted were incapable of reading. Immoral and irreligious as these doctrines were, which were thus inculcated and propagated, there was not sufficient foundation for any proceedings on the part of the law officers of the Crown. All that they could do, they did. Directions were given to watch very closely the conduct of those persons who were conspicuous in the seditions of 1796. The consequence was, that they were soon put in possession of information, that a regular conspiracy had been organized; and whether it were connected or not with persons in this part of the country he could not tell; but certainly the leaders of it were in active correspondence with such persons. It was found that an oath, of the most dreadful import, was used to bind together the members of this conspiracy.

"In the awful presence of God, I A. B. do voluntarily swear, that I will persevere in my endeavouring to form a brotherhood of affection amongst Britons of every description, who are considered worthy of confidence; and that I will persevere in my endeavours to obtain for all the people in Great Britain and Ireland, not disqualified by crimes or insanity, the elective franchise at the age of 21, with free and equal representation and Annual Parliaments; (hear, hear, from the Opposition.) and that I will support the same to the utmost of my power, either by moral or physical strength (shouts of hear), as the case may require: and I do further swear, that neither hopes, fears, or punishment, shall induce me to inform or give evidence against any member or members, collectively or individually, for any act or expression done or made in or out in this or similar societies, under the punishment of death, to be inflicted on me by any member or members of such society. So help me God, and keep me steadfast."

[The shouts at the end of this oath resounded from all parts of the House, but were loudest from the opposition benches.]

Many hundred persons were bound together by this oath, both in Glasgow and in its vicinity. Soon afterwards, information was obtained, that a meeting had been held, in which a was made for the; the oath, and of leaving out its most offensive terms; but such was the malignant disposition of that as sembly, such its determination to have nothing to do with persons who would flinch from their horrid test, that the proposition of amendment was unanimously rejected. The result was, that at the next meeting several persons were apprehended while sitting in full convolve. (Here the shouts from the Opposition were louder and more vehement.) Though these were all the persons who had been taken up, yet there were others in a different sphere of life who ought to have been apprehended, and who would have been taken up, provided the evidence against them had been more satisfactory. (Vehement shouts again from the Opposition.) This conspiracy was not confined to Glasgow; its ramifications extended through various parts of the kingdom; and so wide had the mischief spread, that he was in his conscience convinced that nothing but the passing of this bill could prevent the effusion of the blood of our fellow-citizens; for if a riot once commenced, who could say where it would end? He deeply regretted the great misfortune that such a measure should be necessary; but he was persuaded that the very safety and existence of the Constitution was concerned; and that the Constitution could not be preserved unless on this occasion one of its best and strongest bulwarks was suspended. (Cries of hear from the Ministers, vehemently re-echoed from the Opposition.)

Lord Milton felt no regret at a charge made against him that he had been duped by the papers laid before the committee of secrecy. He still retained his opinion as to the nefariousness of certain designing persons in the country, nor did he want the assertion of the learned lord to convince him of the dangerous nature of the proceedings of the disaffected. (Hear.) He was indeed considerably surprised at the course taken by that learned lord, for if he recollected right, the members of the committee of secrecy had, at the express request of that learned person, agreed to expunge from their report the oath which he had now divulged. This was extraordinary, and required explanation. (Hear, hear.) It did look indeed as if that learned lord had wished to keep back this oath perdu, for the purpose of a coup de main on the present occasion. (Shouts of hear.) He had stated before, that he had no doubt of the nefarious objects of many designing men throughout the country; but he denied that the intentions of such persons, however wicked, were a sufficient ground for removing the great bulwark of our liberties. It was not sufficient to say, that bad men had, in their vain imaginations, contemplated the overthrow of the Government; for when was the time that some persons did not exist whose desperate folly or wickedness would lead them to subvert all established order? It ought to be made out, that the danger likely to accrue to the Constitution was such as could not be resisted by any other means than by the suspension of that very Constitution. (Hear.) This suspension act was now, for the first time, with one single exception, attempted to be passed in a time of profound peace; and exception was itself a precedent that spoke strongly against the present measure; for it was occasioned by Bishop Atterbury's plot—a plot in which a great part of the gentry and many of the nobility were in different degrees involved. (Hear, hear, from some lord whom we could not see under the l.) The noble lord under the gallery did not to relish the subject, but it was nevertheless quite certain that the nobility and gentry of that day were to a great extent adverse to the reigning family. And, as to the quality of the plot itself, he would read a passage from the speech of George I. on opening the session of 1733, which would shew at least on what ground the Ministers of that day asked for the suspension of the great characteristic of the Constitution. The speech says, that “the conspirators have made the strongest instances for assistance from foreign powers, and have resolved to attempt the subversion of the Government. (Hear, hear.) To this end they have provided considerable sums of money, engaged great numbers of officers from abroad, secured large quantities of arms and ammunition, and thought themselves in such readiness, that had not the conspiracy been timely discovered, we should, without doubt, before now, have seen the whole nation, and particularly the city of London, involved in blood and confusion.” (Cries of hear.) How different was the state of things from the present, when we were also alarmed at the miserable plots of these wretched Spenceans. Could any man doubt that the Ministers of those days would not have acted like the Ministers of the present time? In a time of real and imminent danger, they were so far from shewing an eagerness to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and so little did they distrust the loyalty of the majority of the people, that they did not come to Parliament for any extraordinary powers till near six months after the discovery of the conspiracy. (Hear, hear.) Could any man be blind to the immense difference between the importance of that conspiracy and the designs of the present plotters, against the State? At that time the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Orkney, and the lords North and Grey, were among the conspirators, and the well-known duke of Ormond was himself to head an army of foreign invaders? (Hear, hear, hear.) Such was the motive, and no less a motive was sufficient to induce Sir Robert Walpole to propose the suspension of the Constitution; and for this reason as well as for many others, none could doubt that Sir Robert Walpole was a great man. In the year 1745, there was another suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; on which occasion, Lord Clarendon and Lord Lyttelton (then Mr. Pitt and Mr. Lyttelton), and another person, whose name was not necessary for him to mention, strenuously opposed it. Yet the suspension was then only for two months; and, indeed, so great had the jealousy always been of preserving this great prop of our liberties, that even in that dangerous year, after the Revolution, Parliament would not suffer it to be suspended for more than three months, and that by successive renewals of a month each time. All these circumstances made a strong impression on his mind, that our ancestors set a greater value on this shield of the Constitution than their careless and forgetful descendants. (Hear, hear.) He said forgetful, because they appeared from their indifference to have forgotten how, and at what cost, that constitutional bulwark had been obtained. It was a curious circumstance, that the want of such a bulwark had been one of the great causes of the French revolution. The people of France had been anxious to acquire a safeguard for their liberties; and if the monarch had not by mistaken men been induced to refuse such a concession, perhaps that revolution would never have happened. But however that might be, he would ask, whether any man in his senses could think of comparing the present state of England with its state in 1793? At that time there was an active correspondence between clubs in this country, and foreigners, and engagements were held out to violence by the promise of foreign aid. Oaths were framed, and passed current, quite as terrible as that quoted by the learned lord, and depôts of arms were proved to exist in different places. Under such circumstances it was thought proper to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and yet that suspension was suffered to expire; nor was it renewed even on the occasion of the dangerous mutiny in 1796. He could not but think that so much importance was attached to the wild notions of these visionaries, of whom so much had been said. History would shew that neither in this or other countries was the Spencean plan without a parallel. Doctrines as absurd, and equally assuming religion as their basis, had been frequently propagated. Germany had its Anabaptists—men who contemplated schemes of visionary reform with a bible in one hand and a battle-axe in the other; and yet what became of them? They were let alone, and their opinions died away of themselves. Our own country presented instances of enthusiasts not dissimilar. There was the insurrection of Wat Tyler, which though it had not religion for its basis, yet had its origin in some scheme of general Reform, of a nature not very different from that of modern times. The noble lord concluded by saying, that he should give his vote against the bill; for, to do otherwise, would, he thought, be voting against his country. “I feel,” said the lord, “great pain in this vote, though I cannot express the cause of it.” (Hear, hear.) The noble lord sat down apparently much affected. He was supposed in the last sentence to allude to a difference of opinion between himself and his father, lord Fitzwilliam.

The Lord Advocate explained.

Mr. Wynn expressed his regret that Parliament had not been earlier assembled to meet the difficulties with which Ministers were undoubtedly surrounded. That the spirit of turbulence had not subsided was evident from daily experience; and only this morning he had seen posted a hand-bill with the inflammatory title of “The Triumph of Justice over unjust Judges.” He was convinced that, had Government been more alert, the police might have been placed upon a footing to render the aid of military necessary only in extreme cases; but no investigation of the subject had been instituted, and it might become the duty of Parliament to interpose. Indeed upon a late occasion it had been his wish that the House should have taken the punishment of certain civil officers who had been grossly negligent of their duty into its own hands. He complained that efforts had been equally wanting to embody the yeomanry in the disturbed districts. Ministers might say, that some time since such a remedy would not have been proportioned to the disease; but their excuse was like that of the man who, after his house was consumed, said that he had not sent for the engines because the fire might have been extinguished at first by a wash-hand-bason. The real question was, the degree of danger to which we were exposed. Was the danger sufficient to justify the measure? In his opinion it was; and as long as danger existed, the nature of it, whether external or internal, was of no consequence. It appeared from undoubted evidence that the most treasonable correspondence had been carried on by means of clubs and delegates; and a connexion was thus kept up between them as the deliberative, and the people at large as the executive body. Surely this was sufficient to induce the House to arm Ministers with additional power; and to those who required evidence, he should reply, that if it were disclosed, all clue to detection would be destroyed. He illustrated this observation by reference to the case of Despard. Some honourable members had referred to periods of our history, when no suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was thought necessary; but at those times no such general dissension and discontent existed as at the present moment. If it were allowed to continue unchecked, the consequences might be dreadful; the lawless scenes of 1790 might be renewed; and when once the shedding of human blood had commenced, the popular fury was uncontrollable. The noble lord who spoke last had adverted to the mutiny at the Nore as a case in point, forgetting that the mutineers had not only no correspondence at home, but none abroad; and that a cordon of troops had been stationed on the banks of the river to intercept any communication, should it be attempted. He had referred also to the Anabaptists of Germany, whose doctrines, he said, had peacefully expired, forgetting that those doc-ines had existed as long as the individuals who detained them, upon whom the most grievous tortures and the most cruel deaths had been inflicted. The instance of Wat Tyler was equally unfortunate; for the rebellion had not been terminated without the greatest personal danger to the Sovereign, nor until 30,000 had taken up arms against him. Those who ridiculed the recent disturbances and the premeditated attack upon the Tower, would do well to reflect that not many years had passed since stronger fortresses in another country had yielded to the onset of an infuriated rabble. The suspension was necessary to stop the progress of the evil; and he believed that no man would wish to delay until it was necessary to meet the organized rebels in the field of battle. In the present times many dangers threatened that had not existed at any former period; and he conscientiously gave his support to the bill, because he felt convinced that it would prevent an actual rebellion.

Lord Althorp explained.

Sir S. Romilly would not long occupy the attention of the House, but he could not prevail upon himself to give a silent vote upon the most important question that had been discussed since he had had a seat in Parliament. All parties were agreed upon the inestimable value of that part of the Constitution which it was proposed for a time to annul: and there were few that denied that at present great evils existed, and that those evils required a speedy remedy. The question was therefore reduced to a very narrow compass, viz. Is this a case in which it is necessary to have recourse to such a remedy, and is the remedy adapted to the nature of the evils? (Hear, hear.) The first point must depend upon a preliminary question, whether other means had been duly resorted to, and had those means failed of success? The noble Lord (Castlereagh) had repeatedly declared, that the utmost vigilance of Ministers had been exerted; but it was now quite clear, from subsequent intelligence, that that utmost vigilance, in truth, amounted to nothing. (Hear.) It was admitted by the noble lord, that these traitorous designs had been proceeding for a considerable time before the aid of Parliament was required; yet, although Ministers had been fully apprized of the attempts upon the loyalty, the morals, and the religion of the people; though they had been in possession of the libellous and blasphemous publications so industriously circulated among the lower orders; yet, up to the present moment, not a single prosecution had been instituted against the authors. (Land cheer.) The excuse of the Attorney-General for this procrastination was most extraordinary and curious: in truth, he said, the libels laid before him were so numerous, that he could not see where prosecutions were to end. Where they were to end, he (Sir S. R.) did not pretend to decide, but it was not very difficult to determine where they ought to have begun. (Glors from all sides.) The libels might be numerous, but if they were, nothing had been publicly known of them till lately; and the more numerous, the more urgent was the necessity that some of the authors should be severely punished, as a terror and an example to the rest. He satiated the House to recur once more to the circumstances attending the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in 1794. Why different then had been the conduct of Government, for that measure had not been suggested to the House until after prosecutions had been instituted for sedition at every quarter sessions in all corners of the kingdom? (Hear.) At that period, at least, Parliament had not been required to suspend the rights of the subject until recourse had been had to the existing laws. He much doubted, indeed, if those laws had not been too severely enforced: some notorious criminals ought to have been selected, instead of the indiscriminate and sweeping punishments awarded every petty offender. (The Attorney-General smiled.) He was surprised to observe the smile of contempt on the face of the learned gent. intended as it was to deride the censure of conduct directly opposite to that which he had thought fit to pursue. (Hear, hear.) The learned lord, to the surprise and dismay of his friends, had produced an oath taken by many deluded inhabitants of the kingdom, with which Ministers had been some time acquainted. Were they not aware that the most severe punishment known to the law, might be inflicted upon individuals subscribing that oath? Did they not know that it was felony without benefit of clergy, unless the person taking it within 14 days afterwards abandoned his associates, and betrayed their purposes? As to the question, whether this suspension were adapted to the existing evils, the only individual who had contended that it was so, was the hon. member who spoke last: he contended that, as sufficient evidence could not be procured to convict, it was therefore proper to give Ministers unlimited power to imprison. As the delinquent could not be brought to trial, he was to be punished without it. (Hear, hear.) On the contrary, as (Sir S. R.) contended, that this measure was in no way calculated to meet the evil, Government could fix upon no individual of leading influence or talent, whose arrest would check the progress of dissaffection, and defeat the operations of the minor agents: all were alike insignificant, and the extent to which the infection had spread, and was spreading, was the real evil. Would the imprisonment of two or three poor wretches prevent the diffusion of the poison through all the intricate ramifications of society? If indeed they were publicly tried, regularly convicted, and exemplarily punished, some effect would be gained. The fact would be known; for the fact would be known; but the mere mark of confinement of two or three men would effect nothing in stopping the active mischief of particular individuals. In 1794 the state of things was widely different in another respect: then no petitions were presented humbly praying that Parliament would reform itself; the disaffected then refused to acknowledge any Parliament at all, and in its place substituted the National Assembly of France, which boasted of its secret and active correspondence with this country. (Hear.) Much as he censured the adoption of this measure now, he was not one of those who thought that the Habeas Corpus Act ought never to be suspended; under some circumstances it might be most wise and necessary; and those circumstances had existed when, on former occasions, persons of great consequence and influence were in league with an enemy, and when their arrest paralysed the traitorous designs of all their dependents. But was such the case at present? Where could Ministers find one man of influence or consequence among the disaffected of our day? Where could they find even a man of the middle rank of life, among the vulgar, ignorant, and deluded wretches, against whom Ministers were about to launch their vengeance? How then could this suspension be useful, unless indeed this Government followed the example of a state it had recently supported, against the avowed wish of the people, in which not merely obnoxious individuals, but the inhabitants of whole villages and towns, had been thrown into dungeons. (Loud cheers.) Was not this, he confidently demanded, a most powerful reason for refusing what was now required? Would the House intrust Ministers with a power by which persons of low rank and obscure occupations, in shoals, would be placed at the mercy of every truckling informer? (Hear.) The noble lord (Castlereagh) had adverted on a former night to the names of individuals in higher stations, who had been placed by these insatuated Reformers upon what they termed the Committee of Safety or conservative body; but because misguided and illiterate men had had the audacity, without the slightest authority, to place upon this list persons of the most undoubted loyalty and of elevated rank, did it afford such a presumption of guilt as to justify the bold declaration of the noble lord, that in the eyes of God and man, they were answerable for all the consequences of rebellion? (Continued cheers.) Undoubtedly, the names of those most respectable persons were found there, on account of the sentiments they were known to entertain: and the noble lord, a right hon. gentleman after him, had explained the declaration as a caution to certain individuals against supporting popular doctrines; which was as much as to say, that no man was to argue in favour of Parliamentary Reform, the Liberty of the Press, or any other topic displeasing to the other side of the House, unless he wished to fall under the dreadful denunciation of the noble lord. (Hear.) He (Sir S. R.) was not fond of making personal allusions, and he was the more unwilling now, because the noble lord had this night shewn a remarkable soreness upon some points; but he could not help just observing, that there was a period, even of the noble lord's life, when he might have had the misfortune to fall under his own denunciations, and to have been included in a list of a committee of safety. The liberality of the noble lord's opinions at one time, and the pledges of championship in the cause of Parliamentary Reform, given by him at an early period of his political life, before he had entered into office, or had been planted in any of the hot-beds or nurseries for young statesmen, might have rendered even him responsible in the eyes of God and man for the consequences of disaffection and rebellion. (Long continued cheers and laughter.) Reverting more immediately to the question, he called upon the House not to withdraw a protection from the lower classes, to which they were as much entitled as the most exalted individual he was then addressing. It was impossible to calculate upon the abuses to which the measure might be subject; and at its expiration, the Minister would only have to come down to the House with a Bill of Indemnity, and his responsibility would be at an end. Our ancestors had never consented to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, but in cases of extreme danger; and the proposal was now the more alarming on account of the precedent it would establish. It was now for the first time laid down, that under any circumstances of alarm the rights of Englishmen were to be dispensed with. Yet, in the year 1767 and 1768, when according to the letters of Dr. Franklin, great distress, unusual scarcity, and alarming riots prevailed, no person had ever dreamt of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. Now, however, in time of profound peace it was contended, that the race of Englishmen was so degenerate that they were incapable of their own protection; and in consequence of their weakness and pusillanimity were willing to make a voluntary sacrifice of their dearest rights into the hands of His Majesty's Ministers. (Cheers.) True it was, that dangers threatened the country; but he would ask, was there no danger in empowering a few individuals to imprison all the rest of the subjects of the Crown, and that too without the slightest responsibility? (Hear.) Was there no danger in this suspension, when the standing army was so overgrown, and when already Government possessed more influence than had ever before been enjoyed? Was there no danger even to general liberty, when foreign States, already sufficiently disposed to check its growth, should see this once free country placed under the absolute dominion of its Ministers on account of the absurd schemes of a few miserable Spenceans? Was there no danger in public opinion, and that even to Ministers themselves? Were they well assured that this measure would have, in truth, the effect of strengthening their weak hands? Would not the people see through the artifice of those who, under pretence of public security, were only endeavouring to secure themselves? (Hear.) In every point of view, he thought the suspension objectionable: the dangers might be great, but the existing laws had not yet been tried; and if tried, they would be found sufficient for every purpose of national protection.

The Solicitor-General considered the present bill as an evil that must be resorted to, in order to prevent a greater evil. He agreed that it was necessary, before a law was passed on this subject, to see what the existing laws were; for if the present laws were perfectly sufficient to prevent the evil, it was improper to have recourse to new measures. He denied, however, that the laws were sufficient to protect the country against the dangers which now threatened it. The House did not before suspend the Habeas Corpus Act because there were not laws in existence: he took upon him to say, that that Act had been continued from time to time, though every law stood upon the statute-book as it now did. With respect to the observation, that the law officers had not commenced prosecutions; if the existing laws were not sufficient, the neglect of the law officers was no reason why new measures should not be resorted to. As for himself, neither in that House, or out of that House, should he be deterred from doing his duty from the fear of any reproach or censure that might be cast upon him, either in that House or out of that House. The law officers, he maintained, were not justified in commencing prosecutions till they found sufficient evidence to ensure their success. One of the evils of a free Constitution was this—that we had no means of preventing crimes, but only of punishing them when they were committed. Prosecutions, however, had now been instituted; and many persons would have been prosecuted before, if the necessary evidence could have been furnished to the Crown. As far as his judgment went, no prosecution could be maintained against the societies, from the manner in which they were constituted. His hon. friend had said, that none of the higher classes were implicated in these designs; but he begged leave to state, that conspiracies, such as these, were not the less dangerous because they were conducted by the lower orders only. A multitude, whilst it was in power, was often more dangerous and ferocious than if it were under the control and direction of some of the higher orders. But low, and weak, and ignorant, as these conspirators might be thought to be, there were, however, such marks of consistency, of skill, contrivance, and ingenuity in their designs, as would do honour to wiser heads, if they were employed in a better cause. If there was no master workman behind to move these puppets, they were as dangerous as if they were composed of persons of greater rank and of more enlightened understandings. With respect to riotous proceedings in former times, it should be recollected, that, in 1780, it was the mere ebullition of a mob on a particular subject: there were then no oaths, no tests, no declarations, no subscriptions, no meetings, no delegates, which marked an organized system for the purpose of destroying the principles of the Constitution, and of depriving every man of his property, and endangering his life. An hon. member had said, there was nothing in the Report to shew that any danger threatened the country: but he had forgotten this—that it was stated in the Report, that it was one of the contrivances of those persons to try their forces, and then see whether they could carry their schemes into execution. When they went to the Tower, the conspiracy was to arm all the people who assembled in Spafields; and then to persuade others to join them, in order to complete their designs. The anxiety that was manifested by persons in the country to hear news from London, was a strong mark of the general combination that existed throughout every part of the kingdom. The doctrines of the Spenceans were absurd in the highest degree; but were we to be told, that a wild and visionary scheme could produce no mischievous results. Nothing could be more wild and visionary than the schemes of the French Revolution, and yet they all took effect. The very lowest orders in the metropolis of France carried into execution their projects, and overturned the government of the country. When he recollected, therefore, what had passed in France, he could not persuade himself that there existed no danger here. There had been, and was, a traitorous conspiracy in this country to overturn the Constitution; there was a scheme for the division of property, which, absurd as it was, threatened the destruction of all social order, peace, and security; and therefore, it was necessary to have a temporary suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, in order to guard the country against the impending dangers, and to preserve that Constitution which these wild, mischievous and traitorous persons were endeavouring to destroy.

Lord J. Russell could not give his vote on this occasion, without protesting against what he thought would be the most dangerous precedent that ever passed that House. He had heard with great astonishment and considerable regret, the arguments of an hon. friend (Mr. C. Wynn;) for whom he entertained a very sincere respect: and he must declare, that those arguments were so superficial, so weak, and so unsatisfactory, that he should not have been induced by them to give his consent even to a Turnpike Bill. (Loud cries of hear from the Opposition.) His hon. friend had measured the dangers of the country by the distresses of the country: he had said there was a great deal of distress, therefore there must be a great deal of danger; and thus he condemned the whole people of England. (Hear.) But was it because the people were starving that they must be dangerous?

Was it because they had borne their sufferings with unexampled patience that they must be accused of treason, and deprived of the only consolation which remained to them—that of being a free and independent people? (Hear.) In all former periods of our history, the Habeas Corpus Act had never been suspended except in cases of foreign or domestic war. Let the House remember, for it was worthy of their most serious consideration, that at that very time when upwards of two hundred persons were concerned in a conspiracy against the State, and even the presumptive heir to the Crown was suspected—at that very time, he said, did the House of Commons go up to the King, and present him with the Habeas Corpus Act. (Hear, hear.) The Report of the Committee spoke of the plot which had now broke forth; but who were the persons concerned in this plot? By what means were they to carry it into execution? What acts had they accomplished? And what were the dangers which still threatened us? Few, and weak, and wretched, were all the parties who were said to be engaged in this foul conspiracy; and no one, he presumed, would venture to assert, that they expected any foreign support. As to the blasphemous and seditious writings that had been published, why had not the ordinary laws of the land been enforced to punish and prevent them? But prosecutions, it was stated, had at last been commenced; and if so, why did not the Ministers of the Crown wait to see the result of them? If secret oaths, and profane and seditious publications, could be punished by the existing laws, what occasion was there to suspend that great and glorious bulwark of English liberty, the Habeas Corpus Act? (Hear.) The law officers of the Crown were now proceeding, by their own confession, to prosecute these persons under the ordinary laws; and therefore, the measure which Ministers now proposed, was no less unwarrantable than it was uncalled for. (Hear.) He was anxious that the House should preserve its character in the country at all times, but more particularly in these times of general distress; and he was well persuaded, that if they would secure the attachment of the people, and induce them to bear their burdens still longer with fortitude and patience, it should be by manifesting a spirit of conciliation, by listening to their complaints, and redressing their grievances; and not by depriving them of what he valued even dearer than their properties—lives—their personal security and liberty.

(Hear.) Mr. Gerrinay thought it a most mischievous doctrine, to say that this measure was calculated for the benefit of the Crown, and not for the benefit of the country. He considered the evidence sufficient to support the measure, and should therefore give it his support.

Sir Francis Biddle, in rising to oppose the motion, would not refrain from stating, in the first place, that nothing could have afforded him a higher satisfaction than to see the noble lord near him, (Lord J. Russell) coming forward as he had done in so manly a manner, in support of the constitutional liberties of his country, and defending with so much ability, those rights for which his revered ancestors had forfeited their lives. He was inclined to agree with the learned gentleman who had recently spoken, that the measure that night proposed for the adoption of the House, was not brought forward for the purpose of strengthening the power of the Crown. The measure, he was convinced, was not intended either for the benefit of the Crown or of the people, but for the benefit of Ministers, who find the trade of profitable expenditure in danger of being lost. It was for the overthrow of that system their fears were excited, and not for any dread of the subversion of the Constitution. They had no real apprehension from the disciples of Mr. Spence, a poor visionary, who died twenty years ago; and who never had an idea that he should make so great a noise in the world; and the country had as little reason to be afraid of his schemes as Ministers. But what both that House and the country had the greatest reason to dread was, not the Spencean, but the ex-Spencean system; that system, the profligacy and profusion of which, had entailed unheard-of burdens on the people, and which had created a debt, the very interest of which equalled, he believed, the whole rental of the kingdom. But that system was what Ministers were above all things most reluctant to part with. This was evident from the circumstances which nightly occurred; from the struggles which they made for offices, which they ought to be ashamed to defend. When asked to retrench a useless lord of the Admiralty, they say no; they must make a stand—a stand for the Constitution, as they pretend to understand it; but when the people demand a redress of grievances, they give them this measure, depriving them of the liberty which is their birthright. The learned gentleman had laid down a doctrine of the most unconstitutional nature, and which had struck him with the greater abhorrence, on account of the legal authority from which it came. The principle on which the learned gentleman wishes to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and to clothe Ministers with so dangerous a power, is not because there are persons against whom any offence can be proved, but because they are suspected. Men are, according to him, to be cruelly punished, not because they are guilty, but because there are no means of proving them guilty. A measure of greater tyranny than this, he believed, never was entertained by any assembly in the world. The learned gentleman, like all who aimed at the introduction of arbitrary measures into this country, had referred to the French revolution. With that the question had no connexion. What they had to consider was the British Constitution, for the full enjoyment of which the people asked. The impety of the French revolution formed a prominent topic in the learned gentleman's speech; but notwithstanding all that had been said on that subject, it did not appear to him, that there could be any greater piece of impiety than a prayer which had lately been read in all our churches. By that strange composition a prayer was offered, to guard the Regent against a pestilence. Now, he knew of no pestilence at present in this country, except the pestilence of the Government; which certainly never committed greater ravages than it did at this moment; which penetrates every man's dwelling, is found constantly at his fire-side, accompanies him wherever he moves, visits him at all his meals; in short, that pestilence which contaminates every thing—the great pestilence of taxation. Did the great sufferings of the nation demand nothing but a measure of the kind proposed by the noble lord? Was this the only remedy that could be found for the public distress? Was it possible that that House could resolve rather to coince complaints than seek to remove the evils from which they arose? That this would be the case was evident, if they believed the high law authority by which they had been told, that a reason for passing this measure was, that there could be found no offences capable of being punished: and this was asked, though the powers of Ministers were already enormous. Could the Attorney-General want to add any thing to the monstrous power he possessed over the press, in filing ex-officio informations for libel, and in having the selection of the jury which was to try the defendant? The example of that power had even been cited in foreign countries as a reason against establishing the liberty of the press. It was argued, that the freedom of printing in England could not exist, unless extraordinary powers like those possessed by the Attorney-General were given; and that the dreadful sentences, which were the consequence of a conviction for libel in England, proved, that the want of the liberty of the press was not to be regretted. The learned gentleman thinks the riots of 1780, when London was set on fire, and the streets ran with blood, nothing compared to the present danger. This danger was constantly in the mouths of the hon. and learned gentlemen on the other side; but they would never condescend to tell the House in what it consisted. There were societies and clubs in different parts of the country. He knew there were, and he hoped there always would be. It was from these societies the petitions before the House for Reform had come, and it was this petitioning that constituted the offence which the noble lord and the learned gentleman wished to punish: but having no law for that purpose, they now asked the House to allow them to punish it without law. This was the whole secret of the plot, and the Report before the House. The alarm was raised for the purpose of diverting the House from the due consideration of the claims of the people; and if Ministers succeeded in effecting this diversion, they would gain their object. The noble lord had some time ago boasted, on his return from a foreign country, of his success in guiding the political helm; of his having secured the vessel of the State safe through the greatest storms, and brought her prosperously into port. Few dangers and difficulties had, however, arisen, which the noble lord could not meet, but he hopes, that the vessel will, by some chance or other, right herself. In the mean time he seeks shelter under the greater danger of this suspension bill. If the noble lord thought that his measures would silence the complaints of the people, he would find himself grievously pointed. He might erect his gibbets in Palace-yard, that would not prevent the voice from being heard; and still his measures would be discussed, for it was not in the power of all the gagging bills he could invent, to prevent the people of this country from speaking their minds. Could the noble lord shut up all the population in prisons? To do so, he would have many to build; for those now existing had been long since filled by the distresses of the times. It was said of Buonaparte, that he built eight new bastilles; how many bastilles would the system of the noble lord require him to build? Though the Report stated that there were few, if any persons of consequence, liable to the charge of treasonable practices; it seemed to regard the whole population of the country as fit to be placed under restraint. But the only persons arrested in the metropolis for the treasonable practices of which they had heard so much, were poor Dr. Watson, Preston, and Hooper. This, to be sure, was rather derogatory to the dignity of the treason with which the noble lord wished to impress the House. What apprehension could Ministers entertain of such persons? In fact they had no apprehension but that of losing their places. Among the statements in the Report, there was one of a very singular nature: it was said that the conspirators entertained the design of destroying the bridges. What object they could have in view by this destruction it was not easy to divine; but he wondered that the Report had not gone farther, and charged them with wishing to set the Thames on fire. The learned gentleman, to whose observations he had already alluded, had talked as if a sort of reproach had been made against the Crown-lawyers, because they had instituted no prosecutions. It would have been a singular charge indeed to have accused any Attorney-General, not excepting the present, of disinclination to prosecute: and it was a proof of no little modesty in the learned gentleman to take such a reproach to themselves. The remark that there had been no prosecutions, was not made with the view of wishing the learned gentleman to resort to the exercise of their professional duties; it was made to shew, that as they had not prosecuted they had no proof of any offence. They allege, that the persons who write the publications so much complained of are so cunning that they cannot be caught in a libel. What was this but saying, that there was no libel to prosecute? A worthy alderman had lately shewn so much alarm, that with great good humour he would give up all his constituents to the mercy of Ministers. This reminded him of another worthy alderman of former times, who was so alarmed at the Popish plot, that he said he should not be surprised when he rose some morning to find that all the people of England had got their throats cut. He deprecated that alarm which, like the worthy aldermen's, led to an implicit confidence in Ministers. There was, in fact, little difference as to the hands in which arbitrary power was placed. Its tendency was to corrupt the good. There were many instances of the best natured men becoming inexorable tyrants. He well recollected what had been done by former Ministers who had been invested with the undue power proposed to be bestowed on the noble lord and his colleagues. Under their authority innocent men had been confined for years in dismal and unhealthy dungeons. A young man, a watchmaker, aged only 17, had been arrested when the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended in 1795, and he was confined during seven years. When the time came for indemnification—if such a case, which cut off seven years of youthful life, and was a destruction of every prospect, was capable of indemnification—the noble viscount (Sidmouth), who would have the enforcement of this bill, procured a law to be passed to protect his predecessors against all actions that might be brought against them; thus shutting out the unhappy victims of their tyranny from all means of redress. The power which the noble lord sought, was not a power to apprehend guilty persons in order to try them, but a power to commit the innocent, without being obliged to bring them to trial at all. It was a melancholy consideration, that the frequent introduction of such laws, familiarized the minds of men so much to the exercise of tyranny, that their abhorrence of it diminished daily. He well recollected, that the first suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was very strongly opposed in that House. The second time the resistance to the measure was much less: and at last the suspension of the law which protects the personal liberty of Englishmen, came to be considered as one of the common orders of the day. But why all this fear of the Spenceans? The Report was not brought out, and no alarm was given, until after the plot, as it was called, had exploded in Spafelds. The noble lord's measures reminded him of the story of the general, who, on joining the army the day after a battle, said he had been employed on a service of great danger. The spikes, it appeared, had been commissioned by a police office; and the alarming hand-bill he doubted not came from the same quarter. This hand-bill commences, "Britons to arms, the whole country waits the signal from London—Break open the gunsmiths'—Arm yourselves with all sorts of instruments—No rise in the price of bread—No Regent—No Castle-reagh—Off with his head!"—So much for Buckingham! (Hear.) This was a most absurd foundation to build a plot on. No man in England, he was certain, would thus class the Prince Regent and Lord Castlereagh. It was very natural indeed, that a Minister should wish to make his master believe in such an association, and it was difficult to assign any other object to so ridiculous a fabrication. It was of the same sort of manufacture as another bill which had been exhibited in the city, under the title of "Spafelds Row, Go it my Boys," and the origin of which was well known. In all this he saw no plot but a plot against the liberties of the people and the Constitution. There was no conspiracy but that of Ministers to keep their places and avoid Reform. Why the word "affiliated" had been introduced into the Report he was at a loss to understand, unless it was because it bore some resemblance to a term employed during the French revolution. He did not know whether he should be charged with the crime of affiliation, but he had no hesitation in declaring, that he was a member of a Hampden Club. This he was at all times ready to avow. A right hon. gentleman opposite to him (Mr. Canning) had last night lamented his being obliged to speak under the control of public opinion; he was sensible that he must now speak under the control of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act: but he hoped he would be permitted to state, that he paid just as little respect to the latter control as, he was convinced, the right hon. gentleman did to the former. If the bill passed the second reading and went into the committee, he should propose some clauses to moderate the tyranny of its operation. In particular it would be his object to guard against the infliction of torture. (Hear, hear.) Did gentlemen not consider severe imprisonment in damp and dismal dungeons torture? It should be his endeavour to take care that men against whom there was no charge sufficient to form the foundation of a trial should not fall victims to this cruel law. It would perhaps be said, that the confinement would be short; but let gentlemen try, themselves, a short imprisonment, before they spoke so lightly of its effects. It was proper, that persons apprehended under such a law, should suffer nothing more than that degree of confinement which might be necessary to their safe detention. Every other degree of suffering was cruel and unjust, if the term of their imprisonment should be but 24 hours. He, therefore, now gave notice, that if the bill, as he feared it would, went into a committee, he would move clauses for the purpose he had stated.

Lord Castlereagh, with great respect to the rank and talents of the hon. baronet, and to the urbanity of his manners, (which he was surprised had not been affected by the company he had fallen into,) could not help thinking that the hon. baronet's speeches were not addressed for the purpose of convincing Parliament, but persons in another place. (Loud cries of order.)

Lord Stanley rose to order. No person, whatever his situation, was privileged to impute to members the intention of addressing themselves in the House to any but Parliament. There was nothing in the hon. baronet's arguments that could justify the noble lord in imputing to him a covert intention of influencing the passions of persons out of the House; and so long as he (Lord S.) had a seat in that House, he would not hear such imputations on any member, without calling to order.

Lord Castlereagh was not conscious of having imputed to the hon. baronet a design of addressing himself to others; he only said, and still contended that the hon. baronet did not intend to produce conviction in that House, but elsewhere. (Louder cries of order, and chair.)

The Speaker said, that all speeches delivered in that House must be considered as addressed to the House only.

Lord Castlereagh replied, that the chair should always regulate his conduct: but certain he was, that if the country had listened to the theories of the hon. baronet, he (Lord C.) instead of being there to receive correction from the chair, should long since have stood prostrate (a laugh) with the rest of the Constitution. When there was scarcely a person who raised an objection against the bill to protect the person of the Prince Regent, against that to prevent the seduction of the soldiery, and against that which was aimed at seditious meetings (no, no), could it be said that these were ordinary times which rendered such measures necessary? He put it to the House, whether, if they should grant the other bills, and deny that which was now contended for, they were not admitting the danger, and denying the arm that Government required? He disclaimed any intention of calling for this bill as a measure of punishment; it was only asked as a measure of precaution. He wished to know whether there was a conspiracy in the country or not (loud laughter)? In truth, he argued with those who believed the danger; and the question was, whether the remedy proposed was the proper one. He proposed it, because he believed that a conspiracy existed, formidable in numbers, bound by oaths, even to the destruction of those who gave evidence against them, and still persevering in their designs. Ought Ministers to sit with their arms across on the eve of a fatal explosion, unless the Crown lawyers could find evidence sufficient to ensure success? which, in matters of treason, was to the last degree difficult. Should they suffer blood to flow, and the leaders to come into the field against his Majesty's peaceable subjects? If Ministers were not armed with the measure they required, they would never be able to protect the country against this disastrous and bloody catastrophe.

Mr. Ponsonby, though he had been accused of weakness, was never in more perfect possession of his faculties than when he attended on the Committee in question. He believed the material part of the Report to be true, but he was perfectly persuaded that the remedy proposed was improper; and if any additional fact were wanting to convince him of this, it was, that the magistrates of Glasgow had apprehended the Central Union Society. When Ministers were thus possessed of the thread of the conspiracy, it was their own fault if they did not follow it up themselves. Though he did not agree with the hon. baronet on the subject of Reform, yet he thought the speech with which the noble lord had found so much fault contained nothing unconstitutional, that it was moderate in its tone, and of great ability; and the noble lord would have been wise if he had not quarrelled with it. As to the bill proposed, he hoped it would not supersede a fair trial at law, which he thought should take its course, and punishment follow crime. He should not go through the parallels that had been drawn between this period and others; but he asserted, that the present conspiracy was not the result of natural wickedness, but of distress and want of employment; and that a conspiracy arising in such a source was no cause for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. If the principle urged that night were to prevail, the act must be suspended on every extensive robbery. All the members of the House were not, as the noble lord had assumed, in favour of the bill against seditious assemblies; even if they were, it did not follow that, because they had granted so much, they should grant more. His reverence for the law proposed to be thus trifled with amounted almost to superstition; it was the bulwark of English liberty, and rendered the poor man as secure in his cottage as the rich in his palace; a security that the proudest enjoyed no where else. He trusted that the reverence for this law would never be diminished; and it never should by his consent. There was now no foreign war, no disputed succession, no open rebellion in the country: in which emergencies alone the act had formerly been suspended. The present was the conspiracy of famine acted on by mischief; and the disorder being confined to the lower orders, was the very reason why the act should not be suspended. A poor man, as innocent as the Minister himself, might be imprisoned for years, and meet with no redress. This had happened on former occasions, and would again. He repeated, that the law should be allowed to take its course. As to the allusions that had been made respecting the danger of extenuating the disorders that had prevailed, he wished the people to understand, that every gentleman on his side of the House would as much discountenance, and be as active to repress any violence, as even the Ministers themselves: and he wished those misguided people to know, that if they loved liberty, they were adopting the most effectual means to destroy it. He therefore entreated them, if they valued their freedom and the hope of happiness, not to listen to those false and absurd doctrines of equality in rank and extinction of property, which were not only impossible in themselves, but which must lead, in the very attempt to establish them, to nothing but an increase of wretchedness. But he never would deliver that people to the mercy of Government, nor allow the meanest man in England to be incarcerated, during the pleasure of Ministers.

* Lord Lascelles agreed with the right hon. gentleman, that the present discontents arose out of the distress of the country; and when he mentioned reformers as taking advantage of that distress, he did not class them all under the same head: there were among them some high and respectable individuals: whether their measures were prudent, he would not now discuss, but he believed their intentions correct. There was, however, another class of reformers not so well disposed: these men did not find an opportunity for pressing the subject at all times; when things went well, one heard nothing of them: but when distress had already excited discontent, they were ever most clamorous. Some of the latter description had certainly taken advantage of the present calamities; they assembled parties under the pressure of want, and told them if they signed petitions for Reform, their wants would be relieved; having signed, they might be considered as enlisted under the banners of those reformers, and many of them, after a first enlistment, were led on by degrees to go farther. But he believed the people themselves, who suffered, were sound; and if they knew whither their leaders were going, would probably stop short. Most sincerely he wished the Legislature could relieve their distresses. It was true, great future advantages would be derived from the pursuit of economy; but as to any special and immediate relief, it was out of the compass of human power. We must, therefore, look on to further distress, and the continuance of it; the minds of the people would be worked up by those who had designs of their own, to involve all in deeper ruin. The object of the bill, therefore, which had his support, was not injuriously to affect the lower orders, but to preserve them from being led astray by those delusions that were set as a snare to entrap them into their own destruction.

Lord Stanley (amid loud cries of question) opposed the bill. Ministers had known of the machinations long enough before. They knew of the proceedings in October, November, and December. He would agree readily to the bill for protecting the Prince Regent, and for preventing the seduction of soldiers and sailors. The section bill opened too large a field for him then to enter upon. (Question, question.) To the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act he would not give his assent.

Lord Cochrane rose (amidst reiterated cries of question) to state, that he had quite made up his mind as to the course Ministers were running, which would bring the country to ruin. (Question.) He would give his humble opinion, that it was the duty of that House and of the country to petition for the removal of the present Ministers. (Hear, hear.) The question lay between military despotism and the dangers and distresses of the country. With respect to his opinions, he would own, that he had experienced a malicious satisfaction (loud cries of hear, hear) at seeing, for ten years past, that the hopes of the opposition were disappointed by their being kept out of power. (Hear, hear, and laughing.) He was now of opinion, decidedly, that their re-establishment in place and power was the only means of giving us a chance of escaping degradation and ruin. (Hear.) As to that part of the evidence brought forth that night, and at first, he supposed, intended to be secret, it did not appear how the document was come by. (Hear.) Was it from the arrested persons? The individual who produced it might himself in doing so have been guilty of perjury (laughing,) and might therefore deserve no credit by betraying an oath. (Hear.) Such an individual was capable of any thing. The Report as it stood was worthless. There should be a change in men to effect a change of measures, if we wished to avoid despotism, degradation, and ruin.

The question was then very generally called for, and the House divided—

Ayes 273
Noes 98

—175

It was then agreed, that the bill should be read a second time this day.—Adjourned at a quarter before three.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Anson, Sir George	Curwen, J. C.
Atherly, Arthur	Duncannon, Viscount
Aubrey, Sir John	Dundas, Hon. L.
Bennet, Hon. H. G.	Dundas, C.
Baring, Sir Thomas	Ebrington, Viscount
Baring, Alexander	Fazakerley, J. N.
Barnard, Viscount	Fergusson, Sir R. C.
Birch, Joseph	Fitzgerald, Rt. Hon. M.
Brand, Hon. Thos.	Fitzroy, Lord John
Brougham, Henry	Folkstone, Viscount
Browne, Dom.	Guise, Sir W.
Burdett, Sir F.	Gaskell, Ben.
Burrell, Hon. P. D.	Grosvenor Thomas
Calley, Thomas	Hamilton, Lord A.
Calcraft, John	Hanbury, William
Calvert, N.	Heathcote, Sir G.
Calvert, Charles	Heron, Sir Robert
Caraw, R. S.	Hughes, W. L.
Carter, John	Hurst, Robert
Cavendish, Lord G.	Jervoise, G. P.
Chaloner, Robert	Lambton, J. G.
Cochrane, Lord	Langton, W. G.
Coke, Thomas	Lemon, Sir W.

Lyttleton, Hon. W.
Marryat, Joseph
Methuen, Paul
Mackintosh, Sir J.
Maddocks, W. A.
Martin, Henry
Martin, John
Milton, Viscount
Molyneux, H. H.
Mopck, Sir Charles
Moore, Peter
Mosely, Sir C.
Newman, R. W.
Neville, Hon. R.
North, Dudley
Nugent, Lord
Ord, William
Ossulston, Lord
Peirse, Henry
Phillips, George
Piggot, Sir A.
Ponsonby, Rt. Hon. G.
Power, Richard
Prittie, Hon. F. A.
Portman, Edward
Pym, Francis

Ramsden, J. C.
Rancliffe, Lord
Ridley, Sir M. W.
Ronilly, Sir Samuel
Rowley, Sir W.
Russell, Lord William
Russell, Lord G. W.
Russell, R. G.
Scudamore, Robert
Sharp, Richard
Sefton, Earl of
Smith, John
Smith, William
Smith, Robert
Smyth, J. H.
Stanley, Viscount
Spiers, Arch.
Shaw, Sir James
Tavistock, Marquis
Taylor, M. A.
Taylor, Charles
Teed, John
Tierney, Rt. Hon. G.
Walpole, Hon. G.
Waldegrave, Hon. W.
Webb, Edward

TELLERS—Althorp, Viscount—Macdonald, James

PAIRED OFF.

Foley, Thomas
Gordon, Robert
Lloyd, J. M.
Pelham, Hon. C. A.
Ponsonby, Hon. F. C.

Powlett, Hon. W. V.
Russell, Lord John
Townshend, Lord John
Wharton, John

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, February 27.

In the Committee of Privileges evidence was heard on the claim to the Mountnorris peerage. Further proceeding on Tuesday.

Evidence was heard on Bayley's Divorce Bill. Further proceedings postponed sine die.

A person from the Milbank Penitentiary Committee presented a report of that Committee, which was laid on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, February 27.

PARISH SETTLEMENTS.] Sir E. Brydges brought in a Bill to allow a Parish Settlement to be gained by a cow pasturage of 20*l.* a year in value.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett presented a Petition from between 2 and 3,000 inhabitants of Perth, praying for Economy and Parliamentary Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Lambton presented a Petition from the Mayor, Aldermen, Magistrates, Traders, and others of Stockton upon Tees, in the county of Durham, praying generally for Parliamentary Reform; but leaving the nature of that Reform to the wisdom of the House. The hon. gentleman took the opportunity of observing, that if time were given for the due consideration of the Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus, there would be as many petitions presented to the House upon that subject, as there had been on the subject of Reform.

The Petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane presented a Petition from the parish of Beith, in the county of Ayr, praying for Retrenchment and Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord A. Hamilton presented a Petition from Langholm, in the county of Dumfries, praying for Economy and Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. John Smith presented Petitions from various parishes in the vicinity of Nottingham, praying for Economy and Reform: which were ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Rancliffe presented a petition from Stapleton, praying for Retrenchment and Parliamentary Reform.

WOOTTON BASSET ELECTION.—REPRIMAND.]

The Order of the Day having been read for bringing Thomas Jeffries to the Bar, for the purpose of discharging him from confinement, Lord W. Russell moved that he be then brought to the Bar.

On his appearance, the Speaker addressed him to the following effect:—

Thomas Jeffries.—The Select Committee of this House appointed to try and determine the validity of the last Election for the Borough of Wootton-Basset, having reported that you, being called as a witness before them, had been guilty of gross perjury, for that offence this House committed you to the common jail for lodging all such offenders. In the Committee of this House established by law to prosecute these trials, the utmost favour and protection are always shewn to the witnesses summoned to appear before them. Of that indulgence, you on your examination experienced abundant proof. Repeatedly admonished of the sacred obligation of your oath, and of your duty to God and your country, you nevertheless persisted in your criminal endeavours to defeat the ends of justice in the cause which was under trial. Such practices always were, and always will be unavailing. The example of your punishment, which followed without delay the commission of your crime, will, I hope, prove a warning to those who may hereafter be required to give their testimony before these tribunals: and the notoriety of your case, whatever you may present yourself for the remainder of your life, will teach all men to know that imprisonment and ignominy must be the consequence of an imitation of your conduct. At length, however, you have been brought to a just sense of your error; and, in consideration of your penitence, this House has ordered that you be discharged; and you are discharged accordingly; first paying your fees.—Speaker remove him from the Bar.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Speaker's Reprimand was ordered to be entered on the Journals.

HAMPDEN CLUBS.] Lord Cochrane presented a Petition for Reform from the town of Beith, in Ayrshire. Also a petition from George Edmonds, Chairman of the Birmingham Hampden Club. The petitioner denied the assertions contained in the Report of the Secret Committee, and offered to convince the House before the bar, that the assertions were made on ex-parte evidence, and not founded on fact. He (Lord C.) thought it would be desirable to the House, before passing the bill now in contemplation, to go into evidence on this matter; for if the evidence before the Committee was found to be false in this instance, it was reasonable to infer that it might not be true in others. He called on the Lord Advocate to say from whom he had received the oath he had mentioned, which could not be relied on unless acquired by a seizure of papers. No man was more anxious for public peace than himself, but he thought the measures pursued by His Majesty's Ministers not likely to secure it. The House was in total ignorance on the subject of the alleged conspiracy; and it was due to the character of the House, and to public justice, that the individuals from whom he presented petitions should either be refuted at the bar, or allowed to prove their allegations. He should therefore move, that the Chairman from the Birmingham Hampden Club should be brought up and examined. If he thought such clubs had been conducive in any degree to Reform, he should have attended them himself; but they were so utterly insignificant, that he was convinced they could be of no service. He had attended once, and once only, when no more than three members were present; and the reason was, that the extravagant propositions for Universal Suffrage had driven away the rest: besides no two members were agreed in one opinion, so that it was impossible they could conspire together. He declared this, that nothing proceeding from the Hampden Clubs might be thought to put the kingdom in danger.—The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] Lord Stanley presented a Petition from certain deputies of a society in Middleton. He had no objection to present it, though he thought the prayer of it not likely to be heard.

The petition was read. It complained of false imputations cast on the society in question by the Report of the Secret Committee, and prayed for a hearing at the bar of the House. Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir F. Burdett said, he held in his hand a Petition against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and he had no doubt, if longer time was given to the country to express their sentiments on the subject, they would receive many more. This petition was pretty numerously signed. It came from the city of Bath. It had been sent up in great haste, in the apprehension lest it should come too late. The Gentleman who transmitted the petition to him, had informed him that the petition lay only a few hours at his house, and that if they had had time, they could have had more than 10,000 signatures.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow said, the House would do him the justice to believe that he also had a superstitious veneration for the Habeas Corpus Act. He had in some degree shewn his attachment to that Charter of our liberties, by bringing in a Bill some time ago, to render the Bill more efficient in its operation. But he considered the laws in being as inadequate to the object of protecting the Government in the present circumstances of the country.

Mr. Brougham was not a little astonished at the course taken by the learned Serjeant to prove his superstitious reverence for the Habeas Corpus Act:—Having brought in a Bill to render its provisions more effectual, after making it more valuable, he shewed his superstitious veneration for it, by suspending it altogether for 4 months. He wished that instead of a superstitious veneration, he had substituted a reasonable veneration for it (a laugh), and then he was sure they would have had the assistance of his talents in its defence.

The petition was then read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Bennet held in his hand a Petition couched in respectful language, which he wished to present to the House. At the same time he thought it necessary to declare, that until within these few days he did not know that such a person existed in the world. It purported to be from Thomas Evans, of Newcastle-street, in the parish of St. Clement Danes, but now a prisoner in the House of Correction for the county of Middlesex. This person was librarian to a sect who called themselves Spenceans. He stated in his petition, that in 1798 he was arrested under a warrant of the Duke of Portland's, and confined for three years in different prisons, during the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. His friends were debarred from all access to him. He saw no one. He was denied all opportunities of reading and writing, which, as he was a literary man, was to him a severe grievance. He was shut up in a solitary cell. Under all these circumstances his health considerably suffered. The wonder indeed to him (Mr. Bennet) was, that he retained his reason. Those who conducted lunatic asylums were acquainted with many cases in which long solitary confinement had produced insanity. The Petitioner then proceeded to state, that he (with his son, who was under 20 years of age,) had lately been arrested. He was librarian to the Spencean Society, but he declared that that society had had no communication with any other society in any part of the country on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. The prayer of the Petitioner was, that the House would not pass the Bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus, without further inquiry: because the unfortunate man knew that he might otherwise be placed precisely in the same situation as that in which he found himself in 1798.

The Petition was then brought up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the order of the day, for the House going into a Committee on the Bill for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act,

Mr. Grenfell rose and observed, that after having given this question his best consideration, his present situation was not unmingled with pain and difficulty, as he found himself compelled to differ from many of those friends with whom he had long cordially acted, and with whom he hoped still to be connected. (Hear, hear, hear.) His conviction might be erroneous; but he would say, it was honest, sincere, and conscientious. He felt it his duty, therefore, to support the bill, as tending to secure the liberties, and promote the interests of the country.

Mr. Curwen said, that notwithstanding the strong opinion declared by the House last night, it was impossible for him to forget what were the strong feelings of those who opposed a similar measure above 20 years ago. Most of the great characters of that day were now removed for ever from the stage. However strong his own opposition to the measure then was, in every stage of it, that degree of political animosity could not be supposed to remain now in the same extent. But the impressions of that time remained in him unimpaired; and he felt it his duty, though his opposition was hopeless, to mark his opinion now to the House and the country. There was a very great difference between the state of the country at this time and on that occasion, when parties ran so high, when peculiar difficulties prevailed, and when pernicious opinions were said to be spreading so widely. He had been closely engaged in all the oppositions to the measure at that time, and he saw no reason to regret it. The results of the policy then pursued justified in his mind, those who were in the opposition. Could it be forgotten by any body, that an attempt was made in those days, which, if successful, would have left us neither liberty nor security?—he meant the attempt at constructive treason. He remembered well the virtue of the judge, and the manliness and integrity of the juries: all the circumstances justified the objections he had entertained to intrusting such a power as this into the hands of Ministers. There were circumstances attending the present case of peculiar delicacy. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Ponsonby), who had been on the committee, had delivered a speech last night which ought to endear him to the House and to the country, by its sense and mildness. But though he had said, that had he been in the Cabinet, he should have recommended a communication to Parliament, and some measure to be adopted; yet, in saying so, he by no means recommended this particular measure of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Never in any serious discussion in that House had he witnessed such a total deficiency of argument in the defence of any measure, as was evinced last night by the advocates of the suspension. He particularly alluded to the speech of the learned Lord-Advocate of Scotland, who, by his own statement, had clearly shewn, that by means of the laws as they stood, he had been enabled to arrest a number of conspirators or ringleaders of the disaffected. If this proceeding was so easily effected, what could Ministers want with this bill of suspension? This was conclusive, that it could not be wanted for any useful purpose, and that the existing laws rendered it needless. He thought that the law Officers of the Crown had shewn no grounds to entitle Government to the aid of additional laws, since in England they had not yet tried the efficiency of those which exist. He, for one, would not agree to the suspension. He pointedly referred to the year 1794, and the proceedings then adopted; the effects of which were to place every man who dared to oppose the plans of Ministers, in the dangerous situation of a person suspected of hostility to the Government and Constitution of the country. (Hear.) He particularly well remembered one instance of a hundred gentlemen of respectability, in the north of England, who met together on the 4th of November, to celebrate the revolution; a spy of Mr. Reeves's was sent down there, and every word that was uttered by the gentlemen present, from affection to the revolution which placed the present Royal Family upon the Throne, was noticed. What then happened? Why, that the spy reported to his employer that there was a great deal of disaffection and treason. (Hear.) Mr. Reeves wrote to an officer who had been present, and whose proper and manly reply to Mr. Reeves was, that if any thing disloyal or disaffected had occurred, he should not have required Mr. Reeves's inquiries or advice to know what he ought to do. Supposing a letter of this description put into the green-bag, totally contrary to truth; full of misrepresentations and calumnies, for expressions used in warm affection for that great event which alone gave to the reigning family their title to the throne of these realms!—a title of which he hoped and trusted they would always remember the true foundation; but of which, if they abandoned the principles, he could hope for them only the fate of those whom they succeeded! (Hear.) He remembered very well that for some time Mr. Pitt would not yield to the goadings of Mr. Burke: but was inclined to think the factions contemptible; but then came the great object of putting down all hopes of Reform in the representation; and this, more than any other object, governed the measures of the day. Now a similar measure was called for to answer a similar object, which, it was thought, would by this means be defeated; but he believed all honest men, from one end of the country to the other, wished for Reform; and they could not expect public security, or public peace, without a change in the representation in that House. (Hear.) He would say, in the words of Mr. Pitt himself, that without it they could neither have indemnity for the past, nor security for the future. Could not any man read the preamble of that bill, which declared that the sale of seats in that House was notorious, and as Mr. Speaker had justly and strongly expressed himself, as notorious as the sun at noon-day? He knew that many of his friends were displeased at such strong expressions in the preamble; but, for his own part, he thought they shewed what was wanted, and laid a foundation for further proceedings in better times. The bill enacted nothing to defeat the great object. Was not the country right, then, with the authorities they had in favour of their opinions, to say that there did exist an influence within those walls, which could not unite the House and the people together as they ought to be? It was impossible to have that union in such circumstances. He remembered, on a former occasion, having mentioned that 20,000*l.* had been laid out to purchase seats in that House; then he was told he was mistaken in that instance in the sum, for the amount was only 12,500*l.* He admitted the correction, if that was any gratification to the parties, and was only sorry that so much money had been laid out for such a purpose, for it was far too much. It must appear a mockery to say, that we could have gone on so many years, in such an enormous and wasteful expenditure of the public money, had there been a Reform in the representation in Parliament. (Hear.) What was to be expected from a Parliament under undue influence? What put an end to the expensive American war? Was it merely the wisdom, patriotism, and virtue of the House? No, it was the sense of the people. What was it that prevented a troublesome and ridiculous war with Russia? Was it the Parliament merely? No; it was the strong expression of the people's feelings. What was it then that could alone explode corruption, and do away places and pensions given, not even for services, but for worse than no services at all? Every grant made for a public service he considered as sacred to private property. But, while he readily admitted that, he did not conceive that the House was prevented from striking off those which were made to reward services directly injurious to the true interests of the country. As to the men of bad men in the country, those men were not the allies of Reform—they were the promoters of the system of those who opposed all Reform. The first suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was to get Mr. Pitt off of the difficulty in the question of Reform. ~~now the object was to make use of~~ ~~to avoid Reform, and sanction~~ ~~the establishment of an army too great for the~~ ~~country to hold or to pay; and to blind the na-~~ ~~tions as to its real state. These plots and alarms~~ were the only means by which to get our enormous expenses tolerated. If Ministers were really aware of the true situation of the country, and wished to relieve it, he thought they should have examined carefully into the state of our colonies, and, by making every possible retrenchment, have leopped off our expenses by millions. Whenever they came fairly to grapple with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would be seen, that we shall still have 20 millions of expenditure, in various ways, above our resources. Were not these things enough to draw the attention of the nation? This bill was said to be owing to the discontent of the people. No; the people had been exemplary, patient, and forbearing. The House might see how the legal officers in many places attempted to prevent them from holding legal meetings. He agreed in what fell from the hon. baronet, (Sir F. Burdett) that dangers arose in the country, from the country gentlemen sleeping on their posts, from not doing their duty sufficiently, and leaving matters of importance to inferior hands. (Hear, hear.) The influence of the Crown was to be met with wherever they turned, and in almost every instance; and under the burdens and difficulties of the country it had increased tenfold. (Hear.) It extinguished high spirit, and destroyed independence of character both within that House and out of it. (Hear.) That vast influence must be cut down, or we could scarcely hope to be relieved and revived. He had particularly listened to the Solicitor-General last night, of whose character, talents, and knowledge, no one had a higher opinion than himself. If any body could have made out a good argument for the suspension, he expected it from that learned gentleman; but he had failed in producing conviction on his mind. To say that there was difficulty in procuring convictions according to law, was no argument to prove the necessity of suspending the law. The only circumstance he (Mr. C.) ever regretted, respecting the opposition to the suspension in Mr. Pitt's time, was, that they gave way a little too much to their natural feelings in opposition to such a measure; this warmth gave opportunity to throw many imputations upon gentlemen, which all subsequent circumstances proved to be most unjust. He should vainly hope to stop this measure; but he would say, that if dangers did exist, it was well calculated to increase distrust and to banish confidence. (Hear.) It might, he admitted, be necessary, after all, to the Ministers, if they were to proceed upon their system, if they were to make their stand as it had been called, and to refuse to knock off another useless place, after dismissing so many brave men who had fought our battles all over the world. (Hear.) No doubt the dismissal of many of these brave men was painful to Ministers themselves; but what might these men say? They might say, why not keep 2 or 300 of them, rather than insist in keeping two useless Lords of the Admi-

rality, whose business could be transacted by automata? (Hear.) The people were not to be blamed for withdrawing their confidence from Parliament; he should have done the same himself. He felt it his duty to make these observations, though at first he did not intend to detain the House more than a few moments; but being reminded of the active part he took on a former occasion, he immediately said he had not forgotten it. (Hear.) He recollected, that when Lord Sidmouth came into power, he entertained hopes that the Constitution would be restored, and the previous system abandoned. On that account he certainly regretted, that gentlemen for whom he had the highest respect, on his side of the House, had joined with Mr. Pitt to displace the noble lord's administration. He had delayed the House longer than he ought, but he would always, uninfluenced by party, speak out his mind. No man was ever more sincerely attached to the Constitution than he; from this attachment he opposed both the suspension of it, proposed by Ministers, and the changes that certain reformers who supported the doctrines of Universal Suffrage and Annual Elections, were desirous of making in it. He opposed the latter, not because he suspected their honesty, but because he doubted their wisdom. He reprobated the demand of power advanced by Ministers to preserve the public tranquillity against their designs, because he was convinced that such measures were not necessary. He was convinced that the results would be, not to effect public security, but to produce general alarm: not to deter Jacobins, if they existed, from endeavouring to accomplish their designs, but to multiply their numbers and increase their force. He would divide the House, therefore, on the measure at every stage.

Mr. B. Bathurst rose to make an explanation in reference to what had fallen from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Curwen) regarding a noble relative (Lord Sidmouth) of his. That noble lord found it no longer necessary to continue the suspension act when he came into power, but experience taught him the propriety of its renewal. The same persons who had been secured and detained by Government, while it continued in force, shewed, after its expiration, by their subsequent conduct, that their detention was just and politic. As soon as the bills expired they met, endeavoured to propagate their old doctrines, celebrated their liberation as a triumph, drank the health of Buonaparte, and returned to their former methods of creating disaffection and sedition. One of them had proceeded to such criminal excesses as to sacrifice his life to the laws. Indulgence produced only evil, and increased audacity. One of the doctrines, now so popular and so dangerous, held by the Spenceans, was then endeavoured to be propagated, and was connected with the reformers. The House formerly had both passed the suspension act on a report of their committee, and, when the act expired, had justified all that was done under it, by granting a bill of indemnity.

Mr. Lockhart did not wish to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Curwen) into the details of his speech; but he declared that the atrocious projects disclosed in the Report of the secret committee induced him most cordially to give his support to the Suspension Bill now before the House, which was the only means of preventing the realization of these projects. The Report stated, that endeavours were made to undermine all the principles of morality and religion. Now, if the Suspension Bill would work a temporary change in the Constitution, surely this was trifling compared with the change that would be effected in the condition of society by erasing from the minds of the people all sentiments of honesty, and feelings of piety. If immorality and atheism should gain a footing here, they would not stop, but would extend to the other hemisphere, and overturn all our Indian and foreign establishments. Attempts were made by artful men to drive the people to desperation, by taking advantage of their sufferings; and to inspire them with an aversion to those who were disposed to alleviate their sufferings. The prayer, "lead us not into temptation," which should always be repeated, was forgotten or despised, and the lower classes were taught to look up to the plunder, and not the charity, of the rich, as the means of relief. The intention of the public agitators was to destroy all law, and to produce general spoliation. We had great examples before us: the corruption of the Court of France led to the expulsion and the misfortunes of its dynasty—the anarchy and ruin of the people were produced by the demoralizing doctrines which gained the ascendancy in their revolution. If the House were to neglect the warning of this example, the page of history might be read in vain. The hon. and learned gentleman supported the bill, and hoped he should gain that credit for sincerity and good intention which was claimed by those who opposed it.

Mr. Marryat was of opinion, that if the dangers set forth by the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Lockhart) really existed, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was not the means of arresting their progress. If he (Mr. Marryat) could see the danger in the same light and magnitude as the hon. gentleman, and conceived that the Executive could only overcome or destroy it by an increase of power over the liberty of the subject, he would not hesitate one moment to grant Ministers what they claimed, and to support the present measure. The danger, however, he thought was much overrated, and the remedy more alarming than the danger itself. Comparing the dangers of the country to a storm, and the State to a vessel tossed in it, the hon. gentleman declared, as his opinion, that we might ride out the tempest, and without throwing out our sheet-anchor. The people were more alarmed by the interferrence of Parliament than before. This measure would afford food for discontent, and thus aid the cause it was intended to extinguish. Government and Parliament had already sunk in the opinion of the people, and the passing of such an unnecessary and arbitrary act would increase their distrust, and alienate farther their affections. The time during which this act was intended to be in force, instead of rendering it less exceptionable, was, in his mind, a sufficient objection against its adoption. While Parliament was sitting, it might legislate on any cases of emergency. Had we been near the period of a prorogation, it might have been necessary to have armed Ministers with increased powers during the succeeding recess.

The Speaker then left the chair, and the House went into a committee. The bill was committed and reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The Seditious Meetings Prevention Bill was ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

The Army and Navy Seduction Bill went through a committee.—The Report to be received to-morrow.

The Treasonable Practices Prevention Bill went through a committee.—The Report to be received to-morrow.

The King's Bench Proceedings Bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, February 28.

The King's Bench Proceedings Bill was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

Earl Grosvenor presented a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, against the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. They regretted that the measure should have been hurried through the House, without affording an opportunity to the people of petitioning against it, if they thought proper. They also stated, that they considered themselves aggrieved by the Report of their lordships' Secret Committee, which seemed to confound those who were desirous only of a constitutional Reform in the representation, with those whose object it was to subvert the Constitution. With respect to this point he (Earl Grosvenor) was persuaded, that it never could have been the intention of their lordships' committee to confound these two very different descriptions of persons, such an attempt would produce a degree of repentment in the country against their lordships' proceedings, which could hardly fail of being attended with the most fatal consequences.

The petition was laid on the table.

The Earl of Derby presented a petition from one of the hundreds of the county of Lancaster, stating, that seditious meetings had been held in that neighbourhood, from which the most dangerous consequences were to be apprehended, and leaving it to the wisdom, promptitude and decision of the House, to adopt the proper measures. The noble Earl observed, that, in his opinion, the danger had been much exaggerated; but he never refused to present a petition when couched in proper language. It appeared to be signed by very respectable persons.—Laid on the table.

Lord Holland presented a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London, against the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. This petition came too late for its object, though, he trusted, not too late to be received. He could not help again expressing his regret, that the Bill should have been carried through the House with so much precipitation that the people had no opportunity of petitioning against it.

The petition was read, and laid on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Holland presented two petitions, praying for retrenchment and a Reform of Parliament: the one from Ayrshire; the other from the burgh of Montrose, in Forfarshire.—His lordship called the attention of the House to the number of petitions for Reform for Scotland. The proportion of representation in that country was very low indeed, in comparison with the population; and in no part of the empire was Reform so much required. The House must now be convinced, that the people of Scotland were fully sensible of the defect, and anxious that the proper remedy should be applied.

Lord Melville rose merely to state, that the petitions had probably been sent from London, and signed by many without any consideration of the subject.

Lord Holland, without pretending to have the local knowledge which the noble earl might have believed he might venture to say, that a Reform in the representation was anxiously desired by the great body of the people in Scotland.

The petitions were laid on the table.

MALT DUTY BILL.—OFFICE CONTRIBUTIONS.] The House having gone into a committee on this bill,

Lord Redesdale objected to that clause which proposed to allow persons holding situations in the service of the public, to give up a part of the salaries of their offices, under the name of a voluntary contribution. He thought this voluntary contribution would very much resemble one which formerly existed among the servants of their Lordships' House, who, on taking possession of their situation, was called on to give up a part of their profits, under the title of Beer Money; and if any one had the temerity to refuse his contribution, he was hooted out of his money. The present proposition was similar, and the persons who were to make this voluntary contribution were to be hooted into it: he, however, was determined not to be hooted out of his money. He had declared himself a friend to the continuance of the Property Tax; he was ready again to support that tax—a general Property Tax; but he would not support a partial one. He had himself been 18 years in the public service, but he was certain his public services had produced to him great private loss; and this, he was convinced, would apply to almost all public men. Under these circumstances, and considering this proposition of voluntary contribution as unjust, he should oppose it, and propose to omit the words—"Persons holding offices or receiving pensions of the public;" and if the clause was to stand at all, leave it as a general voluntary contribution.

The Earl of Liverpool was ready to acknowledge that this measure was liable to some objections; but the principle had been acted upon on various occasions when the country had been under difficulties. The Prince Regent had made a very large sacrifice, no less than one-fifth of his personal emoluments; this had not been done without being felt to a considerable degree by his Royal Highness!—(hear, hear)—and he did consider that others receiving money from the public were bound to follow, to a certain extent, his Royal Highness's illustrious example.

Lord Holland did not consider, though the country was distressed, that it desired its public servants should be taxed in this mode. What the country looked for was, that economy should be adopted with regard to those who were receiving large sums for doing nothing.

The amendment was negatived without a division.—The Bill passed through the Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Feb. 28.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Cochrane presented petitions on this subject from Barnsley and Saddleworth, which were laid on the table.

Sir F. Burdett presented similar petitions from Loughborough, Stirling, Boddington, and Keworth, all of which were ordered to lie on the table.

ARMY AND NAVY SEDUCTION BILL.] The House went into a Committee on the Army and Navy Seduction Bill.

Sir F. Burdett complained that these measures were running through the House in such a manner, that it was almost impossible to say any thing upon the subject; but he must here proclaim that he did not accede to any one of them.

Mr. Calcraft said, he could only agree to the bill for the prevention of seduction among the soldiery, and that which respected the person of the Prince Regent: the others he should oppose to the utmost of his power.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that the two measures specified were the only ones now before the Committee.

Sir F. Burdett only objected to those measures inasmuch as they went to alter the law of the country. He wished that the Treason Act of the 25th Edward III. could be revived.

Lord Folkestone agreed with the hon. baronet, and would not be held as giving his assent to the bills. It appeared that attempts had been made to seduce the soldiery, and had failed; it would therefore be a slur on them to pass such bills afterwards. He had no objection to the bill that went to protect the person of the Prince Regent. If the laws of treason applied to the Sovereign, they certainly ought to apply to the person who stood in his place. But he contended, that our ancestors thought very differently on this subject in 1695, and were extremely cautious in extending the penalties for treasonable offences.

Lord Ossulston assented to the bills respecting the soldiery and the Prince Regent, but objected strongly to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act: when

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that that measure was not before the Committee.

Sir Gilbert Heathcote condemned all the measures but that which regarded the person of the Prince Regent. Standing armies indeed were so unconstitutional, that he should be extremely jealous of any attempt to tamper with the military. But he wished that more confidence were reposed in the civil power of the country. All who had any thing to lose would stand by the Government of the country; though there might always be a few needy and profligate adventurers, who, with the hope of gaining something, would endeavour to excite disorder; but it was not necessary to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act for such men as these.

The bills were then read a third time, and the report ordered for Monday.

LONDON COMMON HALL PETITION.] Sir James Shaw said he had a petition to present to the House, which had just been put into his hands, from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of the city of London, assembled in Common Hall. He was not at the meeting to-day, on account of indisposition; but he understood that the meeting was very numerous and respectable, and that the business had been conducted with the greatest propriety; and he hoped the language of the petition would be found sufficiently respectful. The petitioners prayed against the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. He was himself of opinion, after giving the subject the best attention his humble abilities enabled him to do, that no case had yet been made out to justify such a measure. (Hear.)

Mr. Calvert said, he congratulated his brother freemen of London, that they had found a representative who agreed with them in their principles and opinions on an important constitutional question. He was convinced that the intended suspension was uncalled for and quite unnecessary. The suspension of the rights and liberties of the whole country was not warranted by the Report on the table, nor by any thing that had fallen from his Majesty's Ministers.

Mr. Calcraft thought that the vote and speech of the member for the city of London, were peculiarly valuable, as the hon. member was a person active in dispersing the mob in the city and who saw the riotous proceedings. The Committee might have gone a little further in examination, and have taken the evidence of the hon. member. However, the House had not the benefit of his testimony; and he would take the occasion to congratulate the city of London on having a representative who came forward so manfully, who having seen all this great and portentous insurrection in its most violent features which was to seize upon the Tower and the Bank, testified its utter incompetence for its traitorous undertakings. This respectable witness of these proceedings also thought it was not fit, on the pretence of these disturbances, or other causes alleged, that a great bulwark and shield of the liberties and constitution of the country should be taken away or suspended. (Hear.)

Mr. Peter Moore congratulated the House also, on an acquisition to that description of evidence which went to invalidate the statements and reasoning of Ministers. The Report was libel upon the country. He wished every member to state what was the condition of his own part of the kingdom. Every petition brought up was a testimony arraigning the allegations of the Report. The petitioners, to be sure, complained of rights taken from them. Whether they were altogether right or wrong, the House, instead of examining their complaints, proceeded by taking more of their rights away. (Hear.) The two great objects of the constitution were property and liberty: but the public property was gone in war expenses, and in systems to prevent any reform. It was not the people, but it was the Ministers who had stopped the supplies; and our liberties were abridged or taken away to establish a species of despotism which our ancestors shed their blood to resist. (Hear.)

The question was, whether we were to be freemen or not. Let any member lay his hand on his heart and say, whether this measure was called for, and whether he could reconcile himself to it on such evidence as had been produced.

Sir Samuel Romilly took the opportunity of the presenting of this petition from London, so near the Houses of Parliament, to ask the House to consider what a large number of their fellow-subjects could have no opportunity whatever of expressing their opinions, on account of their distance, in the haste with which the measure was passed. (Hear.) It was worthy of remark that those who could not petition the House, under such circumstances, were the people liable to be the most affected by the measure. The people of England might feel unhappy under its operations, but the people of Scotland would be in a much worse situation. At first he had no notion of the effects of this bill. In the bill of 1796, he believed there was no distinction between the two countries, even though at that time the greatest causes of alarm arose from Scotland, in consequence of a convention at Edinburgh, and which occasioned the trials of Messrs. Muir, Palmer, Margarot, &c. The situation of England under the act would be this—that the warrant of the Secretary of State, or of six privy councillors, would be sufficient. There the case of an arrested and confined individual could not be tried, except by the consent of those who signed the warrant; but here it was never thought of, that magistrates should commit without bail or mainprize on this law. Yet it would so operate in Scotland, where subordinate magistrates, or sheriffs depute, might so commit under the act, for disaffection or treason; with a prohibition against the persons being brought to trial, unless six privy councillors ordered it. So that the Lord Advocate could seize any person on suspicion, and give him no chance of trial. This part of the act alluded to the act of the Scotch Parliament of 1701 against “wrongous imprisonment,” which was the Habeas Corpus of Scotland. By the bill, that act was suspended as far as it applied to treasonable practices, or suspicion of them; and forbids all trial or bail of those persons imprisoned for suspicion of treason, or for actual treason, unless by consent of six privy councillors. So that inferior magistrates might commit an individual, who might remain in gaol, but could not gain a trial. He should think that the Scotch members did not know how they were disposing of the liberties of their countrymen. (Hear.) The noble lord (Castlereagh) had spoken favourably of the hands into which this power would be committed, and had praised the character, very justly perhaps, of the Secretary of State; but they were called to place the liberties of all Scotland in the hands of the magistracy and of the Lord Advocate. There the public eye was not so steadily and easily fixed on the conduct of those who had this power; some of them might be obscure magistrates. The situation of Scotland would therefore be greatly different from that of England, and much more miserable. All this should have been stated for the information of the Scotch members. (Hear.) If he was mistaken in his ideas, he should be glad to be corrected; and happy to find that the contrary of his opinion was the fact; but he was very much inclined to believe he was not in error.

On the question for bringing up the petition, Mr. M. A. Taylor wished to say a few words. There were many gentlemen on the opposite side for whom he entertained a great respect: but after the statement of his hon. and learned friend, he was rather surprised to hear no argument to the contrary. He did not wish to debate the general question then; but he must remark, that the Lord Advocate had not answered what had been said. Was not this of itself reason for delay in taking away the liberty of the subject? Let the House know the grounds of the law on which the Scotch subject was to have or to lose protection. He wished the explanation from the learned lord or others; and he put it to them ad verendum.

Sir S. Romilly said, that he believed there was a difference in the acts of 1794 and 1798.

The Lord Advocate said, that observations on a general question might be made on the question of receiving a petition: but yet he was not aware that it was necessary to do so, or to answer questions until the proper time of discussion arrived; at that time he should be ready to give his opinions.

Mr. Brougham said, the House did not stand in need of the high authority of the Lord Advocate on such a point. The first law authority of Scotland, newly imported, had just come up with the important news that it was competent to any member of that House to avail himself of the bringing up of a petition to make general observations on the matter of its contents. (Hear.) This practice had lasted a little time in the House, and was tolerably well understood. (Hear.) They had had some experience on this subject very lately; and not long back such discussions had contributed greatly to wring measures from the hands of a reluctant Government: and he hoped, by the blessing of God, they would still contribute greater advantages in improving the condition, and preserving the constitution of the country. (Hear.) There seemed, indeed, to be a sufficient reason why no explanation was made in this stage of the business.

The Attorney-General could not help thinking that the hon. and learned member had not distinctly heard what the learned lord had said. The Lord Advocate had not given his opinion as a new doctrine: he had merely admitted the practice of the House; but had thought that a more convenient season would occur for discussing the merits of a particular clause, than the moment of presenting a petition. This very instance illustrated the propriety of that opinion. The Lord Advocate might not have been in his place, and, in truth, he was not so, for some time after this matter commenced. He would not himself be drawn into a consideration of this clause at present, for the reasons so discreetly given already: the rules and orders of the House afforded fitter opportunities; but he would venture to hope, that an entirely satisfactory answer would be given.

Mr. Brougham remarked, that the bill was now near the third reading, and—(Cries of spoke, spoke.)

Mr. Madocks hoped as a petition was now presented from the city of London against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and one had yesterday been presented from Nottingham, that time would be given for his constituents to send a petition from Boston. He hoped time would be given for the whole country to petition. The House should interpose to compel Ministers to postpone the third reading for a week or ten days (hear, hear, hear), to allow members, now absent, most of them probably in the country, to attend in their places in the House, and to report on the state of the several districts in which they reside, or which they represent, as to the sentiments of the people, the degree of distress or discontent that prevailed, and the dangers that were said to threaten the public tranquillity. (Hear, hear.) He would wish also the people themselves to state in their petitions their sentiments at this momentous period, and offer evidence in their own favour, to meet the heavy charges against them in the Report. Did Ministers intend, and would the House suffer, the measure to be precipitated in this manner, to prevent the people from opposing it? Would the House allow the people to petition on a turnpike-road that leads to the county town, and prohibit them from petitioning on a measure that leads to the county jail? Would they be allowed to be dragged there on suspicion, and without seeing the road by which they were to return? How were they to return? Not through the avenues of justice, for they were closed, and the trial by jury denied them. And when? Who could predict the duration of their imprisonment? Who could foresee the numberless pretences which the ingenuity of tottering power might invent for its continuance? The descent to the dungeons in the Tower was easy and certain—the return difficult and uncertain—

Facilis descensus Avern!

Sed revocare eradam superisque evadere ad auras, Hic labor, hoc opus est.

The hon. member hoped his constituents, at Boston, would have time to petition to preserve this sacred bulwark of the people's right, for which most gentlemen expressed a superstitious veneration. The suspension of it would be the terror of the innocent, without being an adequate defence against the guilty. (Hear, hear.)

General Fergusson desired more time to receive the petitions, which would be numerous. This demand was more urgent as it related to Scotland, which would be placed under greater oppression than England.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer read a clause of the act as it related to the Scottish act of 1701, and seemed to think Sir S. Romilly a little mistaken with respect to the act of 1794, on which he appeared to use a little subtlety.

Sir S. Romilly said, he possessed no subtlety, and never pretended to any. Surely the gentlemen opposite could not have been present when he said that he would willingly correct any error if he had fallen into one. They seemed now to think there was some triumph. Perhaps he had looked too hastily at the act of 1794; but that was of comparatively little importance, for the question was, whether the liberties of the people of Scotland were, to use a noble lord's expression, to lie prostrate—(cry from the Opposition side of No, no—stand prostrate)—Sir S.

Romilly allowed himself mistaken; he should therefore say, "stand prostrate" at the feet of the Lord Advocate! (Hear.) Would not this be the case? And yet the Lord Advocate would give no explanation! (Hear, and no.)

Mr. Ponsonby thought that some explanation should be given as to what the clause really meant. What did it signify to the question, whether it referred to the act of 1794, or to the act of 1798. But if the Lord Advocate would not answer, he would ask those by whom he was surrounded, whether they understood the import of this clause, and whether they would undertake to explain it? Without understanding it properly, would they consent to give up the people of Scotland to the mercy of Ministers? Would the Ministers themselves, in such a measure as this, desire to be supported in such a manner? (Hear.)

Mr. B. Bathurst said, that whatever might be the merits or demerits of the clause, nobody who framed this bill had to answer for them. (Hear, hear.) It had stood in all former bills. (Cry of no.) Here the Speaker observed "during this reign;" on which Mr. Biagge Bathurst corrected himself, and said it stood in the bills in this reign, in 1794 and in 1798; and that was enough to say, prima facie, that it had passed through as able and close a scrutiny by persons of as great talents as any at this day. (Hear.) He thought it right to say, after the irregular introduction of this topic, and after gentlemen were said to be about to vote for what they did not understand, that gentlemen would only be voting for what had been voted by other Parliaments. (Hear.) It was not a proper time to discuss the merits of a clause, till the bill itself came regularly before the House. Then was the time to argue such objections.

The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Brougham observed, that he held in his hand another proof of the advantage to the country of further delay in this measure. He had a petition from Liverpool to present, where, though only half a day had been allowed for signatures, through the apprehensions of the indecent hurry with which it was proposed to pass the bill, the petition had been most respectably signed. It earnestly implored the House to reject the bill. When he looked at the names to the petition, he found a very great proportion of the wealthy and independent inhabitants of Liverpool; and he believed that would be the opinion of his friends who knew Liverpool, and even of the right hon. gentleman himself opposite (Mr. Canning,) who was a member for that great town. There was too much reason to apprehend, that busy and designing men would, as they did before, convey insinuations against their neighbours; who, without being confronted with their accusers, might become victims. He moved that the petition be brought up.

Mr. Coke entered into some statements concerning that part of the country with which he was better acquainted. A very respectable person connected with a Union Society at Norwich, had written him a letter, complaining of the imputations cast on these societies by the Report of the Committee. There was not the least ground for these imputations of disaffection or sedition that the Report attached to those who supported Parliamentary Reform. The influence of the alarm that was propagated would, he was convinced, diminish every day. The ordinary operation of the laws would be found sufficient to repress efforts that required no extraordinary remedy. The learned lord (Advocate of Scotland) had mentioned, that 20 people were taken up in the part of the country to which he belonged, who would be brought to trial if they had been engaged in illegal practices. The law in this part of the empire was likewise fully sufficient for arresting the progress of sedition, if it existed. The hon. gentleman, as a proof of the fallacious nature of the evidence on which the Report proceeded, read a letter from the individual to whom he alluded (Mr. Taylor, of Norwich), which stated, that the part of the Report that referred to Union Societies was a gross misrepresentation: that it was with pain he saw the society of this kind at Norwich traduced; that there were no improper persons composing it; that he himself was a member of the society, and could, from the most intimate acquaintance with its proceedings, objects, and character, give the most decided denial to all the allegations against it; that the sole object, as well as the professed intention of the society, was to procure Parliamentary Reform; that it had no secret correspondence; that it shewed no desire to count concealment; that it administered no illegal oaths; spoke of no appeal to force, and collected or fabricated no arms. Farther it stated, that religion and morality were not disregarded, despised or abused; and that the society never countenanced blasphemous publications. The writer was not disposed to deny the allegations of the Report as applied to other places, or to say that there was no evidence to support it; but, so far as Norwich was concerned, he was convinced that the Committee had been deceived. The writer appealed to the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. C.) for the truth of what he stated, and was prepared to give either his testimony to him, or to any member of administration. The hon. member, after reading the letter, mentioned, that he knew the gentleman and his family—that there was not a more respectable family in the country, or a gentleman more incapable of treasonable practices. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Smith rose to speak to the same point, and he could call upon his hon. colleague (Mr. Harvey) to confirm every thing he should state. He (Mr. S.) had received a letter of the same import with that from which extracts had been read. He confessed, that when he read the Report he was surprised at its allegations. The Union Society of Norwich was well known; and he never heard of any imputation against its motives or character. The family of the Taylors were most respectable. The writer of the letter stated, that he had thoughts of sending a copy of the declaration of the society to him (Mr. S.) or to any of his Majesty's Ministers. There seemed to him (Mr. S.) to be no disaffection or dangerous principles among the reformers of Norwich. He had attended a meeting for Reform himself: he told the electors at that time, in the town-hall, that any plan of Parliamentary Reform would be useless, unless the electors reformed themselves. Now he would ask, if men would receive such language with approbation, were they not fit judges of measures that would tend to the security of the Constitution? and was there any danger from their endeavours to bring about Reform? The meeting was numerously attended; their object was what it professed to be, and what he, to a certain extent, would support. He told them that he was a friend of Reform, but an enemy to Annual Elections and Universal Suffrage. He could declare this at Norwich, without forfeiting the respect of his constituents, as well as in the House, where he concurred with the general opinion. He had no more fear in doing so in the one case than in the other. He did not mean to discuss the general question to which the petition referred, as an opportunity for that would afterwards occur. He merely rose to confirm the statement of his hon. friend, who had just spoken to the character of a person in whose behalf he was anxious to bear testimony.

Mr. B. Bathurst said, that there was no necessity for defending the societies of Norwich, as Norwich was not mentioned in the Report. Every society that bore the name of Union Societies, and every member of such societies, were not involved in the charge that attached to some.

Mr. W. Smith and Mr. B. Bathurst mutually explained.

Mr. Harvey said, that since he entered the House the letter had been put into his hands to which his hon. colleague had adverted. He (Mr. H.) knew nothing of the society of which so much had been said: but as to Mr. E. Taylor he could say, that he entertained the greatest respect for him; and did not believe that he could belong to any club or society that could have for its object the subversion of the Constitution. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Tierney regretted that a copy of the Lords' Report had not been obtained. It should be applied for without delay. The Reports of the two Houses were of course founded on the same evidence, and in some cases the Committees had arrived at different conclusions. It now appeared, that there were material mistakes in the Report of the Lords, and these mistakes should be ascertained and investigated. If the two mistakes which had already been pointed out, were really such, what certainty had we that there were not more? No evidence could be laid before the Lords that was not before the Commons' Committee. If Parliament proceeded to make laws upon the allegation of facts, and if these allegations turned out to be unfounded, what security had we for the liberties of the country?

Sir J. Mackintosh bore testimony to the high character of the family of the Taylors at Norwich.

Mr. J. Smith thought it extremely unjust that imputations should be thrown out against the characters of individuals or societies, and severe laws should be passed upon the supposition of their truth, without affording an opportunity to the parties of disproving the charge, or defending themselves against it. He yesterday presented petitions, numerously signed; and had time been allowed for collecting signatures, many more could have been procured. He would now take an opportunity of stating his opinion on the bill before the House to which these petitions referred. He held in his hand a copy of the Committee's Report, on which he would offer a few observations. He would bring no charges against the members of the Committee, some of whom he highly respected, and against none of whom he was disposed to say any thing severe. To their Report, however, he could pay no deference, and would pay none. When he was called upon to vote away the Constitution of his country on the ground of its truth, he was compelled to enter into an investigation of its contents, and to criticise it with as much freedom as if it had proceeded from any other set of gentlemen. The Report began with an account of the Spenceans, their dangerous doctrines, and their extensive ramifications. Now, he had inquired into the fact whether the Spenceans were numerous in the part of the town to which he belonged; and he was answered, that nothing was heard or known of such a society or its principles. (Hear.) He was connected with an association for the relief of the Spitalfields manufacturers. Every one knew that in that quarter the greatest distress prevailed: distress might naturally have been expected to lead to discontent, and discontent to dangerous doctrines or projects. Here, however, he heard nothing of the principles of plunder or rebellion attributed to the Spenceans. The sect was totally unknown. (Hear.) There were individuals whose benevolence prompted them to visit every house, every room over that district, for the relief of distress—who went from one abode to another—from one scene of wretchedness to another; who had, of course, the most minute and intimate knowledge of the state and principles of people: to them he would refer Ministers for information, and he was convinced they would give the same answer. The hon. gentleman read an extract of a letter, in answer to some inquiries on this subject which stated, that nobody ever heard of such:

thing as the Spencean principles or clubs in that district. He could not help reprobating the easy credence given to the existence and extent of these societies. When he considered the evidence on which the existence of these societies rested, and the absurdities they were said to profess, he was free to confess, that he regarded the Spencean system as what was commonly called a humbug: (a laugh, and hear.) He believed that the monstrous character of the doctrine limited its spread. He would have had no objection that it should have been mentioned in the Report of the Committee, as professed by a few enthusiasts or visionaries; but what he objected to, and what was credited by no one, was the insinuation or the assertion that it was generally diffused. He was sorry to detain the House (hears) but he wished to make a few observations on another of the grounds of the present measure, as mentioned in the Report—the riot of the 2d of December. He was free to confess, that he was at first alarmed at this event; it amounted, in his opinion, to insurrection, and the conduct of the persons implicated to treason; but never for a moment did it threaten the existence of the Government or the safety of the Constitution. The time chosen was extraordinary. At night a conspiracy would be most dangerous; but here the insurgents chose, not twelve o'clock at night, but twelve o'clock at noon. Even allowing, however, the existence of all the danger that could be apprehended, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was not the proper remedy. If Ministers, under the suspension of the laws, should think it necessary to proceed to arbitrary imprisonments, they would find 50 or 60,000 persons in some parts of the city ready to surrender their liberties, in the present state of distress, for food and clothing. (Hear.) Could a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act give us any security against the violence or mischief of such men, if it was found necessary to coerce them? For a temporary disorder, of no great extent, in the metropolis, the Report libelled the whole people of England. He particularly reprobated the generality of that part of it which adverted to the religious state of the people; he had inquired into this subject, and had come to the conclusion, that there was no foundation for the sweeping charge of irreligion, infidelity, and blasphemy, brought against the people. Some individuals, he allowed, had been tainted with demoralizing and irreligious principles, but the remark could not apply to any great body of the country. (Hear, hear.) The Committee had dwelt on the extensive conspiracies in the manufacturing districts; but he was surprised to see that they omitted one great, extensive, and dangerous conspiracy, that of the Luddites; 12 or 14 of whom, he believed, were now waiting their trial. This was a point which naturally came under the consideration of the Committee, and he was surprised their attention was not turned to it. This neglect threw a certain distrust over the whole Report. He would not trouble the House with any further remarks; but believing that Ministers were laying a precedent dangerous to future times, as being uncalled for by any necessity that had been attempted to be established, and injurious to our character among foreign nations, he could not refrain from protesting against the measure. Being lately abroad for a few months, and happening to enter into a conversation with a Frenchman concerning the degree of liberty and security enjoyed in England, as compared with the arbitrary governments of the Continent, he found his praises of the British constitution were received with some distrust by his companion; who observed, that the rights of the subject could not be very well secured by the Habeas Corpus Act, when Ministers could at any time come down to the House, and obtain the passing of a bill for its suspension. No, he (Mr. S.) replied, that could not take place except in cases of extraordinary danger to the state. Ministers would not dare to propose such a measure, unless in such circumstances as would enable them to convince the great majority of Parliament, and of the country, that it was indispensably requisite for the safety general. It was now a deep mortification to him (Mr. S.) to see his declaration disproved, and the constitution about to be suspended without the least pretence of danger, and contrary to the remonstrances and prayers of the nation. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. L. Wellesley allowed that there were few that belonged to the sect of Spenceans. This was the whole case. Had the doctrine many supporters, its absurdity and impracticability would be seen. The comparison between the government of France and that of this country was not just. Our Habeas Corpus was never suspended, except in cases which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith) had mentioned. The great majority both of the house and of the nation was now in favour of the suspension. The state of the vote had shewn how cordially it was received by Parliament, and he was convinced the voice of the people would concur with it. Public opinion was in its favour.

Lord Cochrane said, that he held in his hand a letter from the chairman of one of the societies for Parliamentary Reform alluded to in the Report. The person's name was John Chapman, of Loughborough. He denied the allegations of the Report; he denied the charge of irreligion brought against those societies. A great proportion of the members composing the one to which he belonged were of a religious character; and repelled the calumny with the greatest indignation. He disclaimed all approaches to violence, all plans of depredation, all intention of resorting to physical force. Having heard from a learned lord that persons were apprehended in Glasgow on suspicion of being engaged in treasonable practices, he (Lord C.) had since seen in the newspapers, that they were found in indigent circumstances, that they were discovered in an ale-house, with a schoolmaster and a lawyer's clerk, discussing the subject of the poor laws. In the absence of better information, he was led to suspect that this was the only treason of which they were guilty; and he was the more confirmed in this suspicion from a letter that he had received from that quarter, dated so far back as Feb. 8. That letter stated, that the poor were in the greatest distress: that some had applied for parish relief; and that a dignitary of the law gave it as his opinion, that they had no legal claim. Application was made to the sheriff, who granted relief. The cause had since been carried by appeal to the Court of Session, that the poor might be taught patience by delay. This fact gave great probability to the story, that these 20 individuals apprehended were really consulting, as they were said to be, on the means of procuring parish relief, instead of plotting against the state.

Mr. Brougham, in allusion to what had fallen from the last speaker but one, expressed his happiness to find that the hon. gent. was so satisfied of the popularity of the measure for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act.

Mr. Long Wellesley explained.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

Sir Francis Burdett said, that he held in his hand a petition from the chairman of the Leicestershire Hampden Club, complaining, in the name of that society, of having been aggrieved by the Report of a Committee of that House. He himself held, that these clubs were established for the most constitutional purposes; and with respect to the opinion intimated by one hon. gentleman, that the public sentiment was in favour of the proposed measure, he sincerely hoped that an opportunity would be afforded for the expression of that sentiment. If the declaration of public opinion were in support of it, it must tend very much to aid the uninterrupted progress of the Bill. In his view, however, it would have no other effect than that of provoking additional irritation. The petition described the principles and objects of the club in question, which were, representation co-extensive with taxation, annual parliaments, and unbiassed freedom of election. If these were objects subversive of the constitution, it was an offence to associate for the purpose of attaining them, and was a species of guilt in which he willingly acknowledged himself to participate. His motion now was, that the petition be read.

The petition was accordingly read, and ordered to lie on the table.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the third reading of this Bill.

Mr. M. A. Taylor declared, that he rose with a strong desire to record his sentiments on the present question, which he trusted would die with him. Little alarm, he thought, would be inspired by what were called the Spencean principles; principles which, after sleeping for twenty years, he did not believe were calculated to make many converts. Even had they all the advantage of novelty, he could not think that the success or prevalence of such doctrines could be very great. Their absurdity was too great to admit their reception in any minds but those of a starving population. What progress, therefore, they had hitherto made, might, in his opinion, be effectually checked by a due execution of the laws already in force. The Lord Advocate of Scotland had already stated, that by the exercise of his powers, he had suppressed improper and criminal combinations, in that part of the island. How could they be justified then, after this proof of the efficacy of the existing laws in Scotland, to pass a measure extending to it, before the inhabitants of that country should hear that such a measure was in agitation? To come to the real merits of this question, he might describe it as an act to enable certain persons to detain others in custody, not upon a complete knowledge of facts, but because there was some reason to entertain suspicion. He had always felt too much attachment to the principles of liberty, to consent to a law, the effect of which might be to send a man to prison without a conviction. He would trust no set of Ministers with such authority; he would trust no man with it; he should be sorry even to trust himself. The evidence in such cases was not only unknown, but must generally be of the worst description, often nothing better than the malignant whispers of the basest of human beings. In illustration of this, he must be allowed to allude to a circumstance which happened to himself some years ago: Mr. Arthur O'Connor, who was a member of the Society of United Irishmen, came to this country with recommendations from the first families in Ireland, and did what was natural to a man of his cleverness in such circumstances—introduced himself to general society here. He visited his family among many others; and, on one occasion, was traced from his house to a meeting of the United Irishmen. Had not he (Mr. Taylor) been pretty well known, and his loyalty undisputed, he might have been upon this evidence considered as a disaffected person, and consigned to imprisonment without any inquiry before a jury of his country. But, as he understood the constitution, the poor man was as much entitled to its protection as the rich, and ought not, any more than the latter, to be exposed to become the victim of secret charges or dark insinuations. He had a right, a birth-right, to demand the advantage of a law which formed the corner-stone of the constitution, and which could not be abrogated without almost dissolving the compact between the Government and the people. He was aware that difficulties sometimes occurred in bringing men accused of crimes against the state to trial: but it was always in the power of the Crown to appoint a special commission, and the law officers might always procure the trial to be postponed.

upon shewing sufficient cause. He doubted not that the Committee whose Report was the foundation of this measure, had acted to the best of their judgment: but he was himself at a loss to discover any case made out by the Attorney or Solicitor-General, that could shew that the existing laws against improper meetings, or seditious writings, were not sufficiently severe in their application. His opinion was, that the individuals entertaining evil designs were few, and that those whom they had deluded were influenced more by distress than by the doctrines to which they listened. The meeting held in Spafields on the 2d December, adjourned to the second day after the meeting of Parliament, yet by a due interposition of the civil power, tranquillity was preserved, and none of the tumult which was apprehended took place. It was impossible to make out the necessity for such a measure, without making it appear that a conspiracy existed in which men of rank and fortune were engaged. The Report however stated, that "few or none" of this description appeared to have been concerned in the criminal practices to which it referred; and with all his respect for the members of that Committee, he could not help feeling much surprise that they should fling out these loose and indefinite insinuations. The petitions for Parliamentary Reform were a cause of alarm to many; some of whom were interested in opposing it, whilst others were apprehensive that it must lead necessarily to plunder and confusion. He was a member of that House when Mr. Pitt brought in the Suspension Bill of 1794; and though he was left in a small minority when he opposed it, he believed it would have been a much larger minority if the events which have subsequently happened could have been foreseen. But the minds of gentlemen were then filled with the horrors of the French revolution, and they rushed into measures from which they would have abstained if one fiftieth part of the consequences could have been laid before them. He congratulated himself at this moment, that he had been one of that minority; and although many honourable members had deserted it, he had the consolation to think, that many of their names were to be found in the list of pensioners. (Hear, hear.) He was happy to reflect, also, that he had not joined in the secession which was agreed on by some gentlemen at that time, from a despair of resisting the talents of Mr. Pitt, and the alarm which was then prevalent. One of the chief dangers attendant on this sort of legislation was, that it habituated the mind of the nation to the sacrifice of its liberties, and prepared them to adopt, at last, that as permanent which was at first but temporary. Although he was no friend to any wide system of Parliamentary Reform, he was disposed to pay attention to any specific proposition on that subject, and would support the principle of a plan for the improvement of the representation in Scotland, as well as that of some measure for throwing open those boroughs which enabled their proprietors to dictate to Ministers; and without whose support no government could now maintain itself. He would put it to the House, whether these proprietors might not extort from Ministers any appointment abroad for any relative or friend, however unfit or incapable he might be. Every one admitted that some reform was necessary, if it were only with regard to the expenses of elections. Some reform, he was persuaded, must take place, and it was vain to join together the names of reform and revolution. Giving all possible credit to the framers of the Report, he did not in his conscience believe that a sufficient case had been laid before them to justify the proceeding now before them; and, indeed, his belief was, that no circumstances could justify it, except those of a domestic war or a foreign invasion. He recollected the debates which took place in 1794, and the opposition which was then made to a similar measure, at the commencement of a war which he had always opposed, and from which he sincerely believed all our present miseries had arisen; and yet, such was the alarm in the country, that scarcely one of the minority of that day could gain a hearing in the House. Every man was supposed to be contaminated who doubted of the measures of Government; but he had, notwithstanding, refused then, as he trusted he ever should refuse, to lend his sanction to the repeal of an Act which was the best bulwark of the Constitution; by overthrowing which, any family might be deprived of its principal, upon whom they depended for support, without any knowledge of his offence, and without any possibility of redress.

Mr. Wyndham Quin did not think the active participation of men of note in a general conspiracy was essential to the existence of great danger. The lower classes were the instruments necessarily employed in all insurrectionary movements; and if they were divided into clubs and societies, the work of insurrection might easily be commenced. It was not conclusive to say, that because the Lord Advocate of Scotland had arrested some individuals, he had therefore sufficient legal powers to put down the mischief, and take into custody all who might be proper objects of suspicion. He had understood the learned lord to state, that there were persons against whom it was desirable to proceed, if the law would enable him to do so. It was useless to talk of precautionary measures after the danger had actually arrived; the object of the present Bill was to guard against contingencies, and the recurrence of the evils which had already taken place. In committing these additional powers to Ministers, it was not to be forgotten, that they were at all times responsible to Parliament for their exercise of them.

Mr. Protheroe lamented the necessity he was under of giving his support to the Bill in question; a necessity from which he should have been exempted, had every part of the country been as tranquil as that with which he was connected. In many of the manufacturing districts, however, he knew that the most formidable combinations existed for the purpose of subverting property, and destroying the whole frame of the Constitution.

Mr. Lyttleton said, that if the question now at issue were not of the greatest importance, and that the voice of the humblest individual ought to be raised against it, he should not have ventured to present himself to the notice of the House. He was the more anxious, however, to clear himself from the imputation that had been cast upon those who sat on his side, that if they did not encourage the violent proceedings which had taken place, they at least supported them by the arguments they had held, and the vote which they had given on this occasion. (Cries of no, no, from the Ministerial benches.) He was glad to hear that such imputation was to be removed. This was a measure which could be justified only by the most imperious necessity. The Secretary of State, in one of those insidious panegyrics on the Constitution, which always preceded or accompanied some attack on it, had endeavoured to convince the House that the country was in the utmost danger; but the evidence which had been this day produced must have considerably shaken the Report of the Committee. It had been said, that great disturbances existed in the manufacturing districts; and certainly we wanted no Report to satisfy ourselves of that fact: but the peace of the metropolis had not been disturbed to the extent that was stated. It was necessary, perhaps, to go through the form of a Secret Committee; but the Government must have had means enough before of controlling any violent proceedings. He must now inquire what the officers of the Crown had done to punish or prevent such persons as had been suspected. They ought immediately to have had recourse to constitutional measures. Ministers, however, should have assembled Parliament at an earlier period; whereas they had put it off till a period unusually long, and had suffered the laws to lie dormant. Thus had they brought Parliament into contempt, and the laws into disrepute; they wished the nation to look to Government rather than to Parliament; and to despotic law rather than the common law. How had Ministers met the wishes of the nation by adopting a system of economy and retrenchment? They had done nothing that had not been extorted from them; they had done nothing to alleviate the distresses of the people; and what they were now about to do was as despotic as it was cowardly. (Hear.) Not a single word had been advanced in that House to overcome the force of precedent: unless they could make good the precedent of 1794 as applicable to the present times, their argument must fall to the ground. At that time there was this essential difference, that we were at war with France, who might threaten us with invasion, which, if successful, might have induced many persons here to join her. The only precedent, therefore, which they had adduced was a mere phantom. He asserted, that the greatest abuses had been committed respecting the Alien Act; and that the noble Secretary of State had been induced, by false evidence, to injure several miserable foreigners in this country. If, then, we had now a person at the head of the home department who had abused that power to his own disgrace, to the disgrace of the office which he held, and of the nation, was not this an additional argument against the passing of this Act, under which men's passions were more likely to operate than their judgment. In examining precedents, he would merely look to the conduct of our ancestors; and would then ask, whether there was any difference between the law relative to suspected persons in France passed last year, and that which we were about to adopt. Circumstances might justify it in that miserable country, which would not justify it here. He should have been ashamed of himself, if he had not expressed his sentiments on this most important occasion: he should not have discharged his duty to the House, or to the country, without saying a few words against an Act which he considered to be as unconstitutional and unnecessary as was ever proposed by any set of Ministers.

The Hon. Mr. Lamb, as a member of the Committee, agreed, that Ministers would have done better to have followed the precedent of him whom they so much admired, and pretended to follow—that of Mr. Pitt, in 1800—who called Parliament together, and put these words into his Majesty's mouth: "My tender concern for the welfare of my subjects, and a sense of the difficulties with which the poorer classes particularly have to struggle, from the present high price of provisions, have induced me to call you together at an earlier period than I had otherwise intended. No object can be nearer my heart than that, by your care and wisdom, all such measures may be adopted as may, upon full consideration, appear best calculated to alleviate this severe pressure, and to prevent the danger of its recurrence." Now, with as strong an impression that we were tampering and meddling with the most sacred part of the Constitution, he would venture to address the House on this subject. His Majesty's late Attorney-General (Sir S. Romilly,) who on a former night had addressed them with that gravity, weight, dignity, and authority, which must always belong to him, adverted to many circumstances of the greatest possible difficulty, to the situation of Parliament, the necessity of retrenchment, and the great standing army in this country, and the effect they must have on the opinions of the people. He had lived long enough, however, to see war follow war, revolution on revolution, invasion on invasion, and all the dangers and difficulties which could attend a State. An hon. baronet (Sir F. Burdett) had alluded to the plan of Sir W. Jones, for protecting the peace of the metropolis: but he must observe, that the Government of the country must be in a very unhappy state to call such a plan into execution. What hopes could we give, what benefits could we confer, what privileges could we grant, to induce the people to think that we attended as much to their interest as a reformed Parliament, or what could Parliamentary Reform now do for public relief? Could a Reform of Parliament carry into execution all those measures of which the country stood in need? Shew him such measure, and he would consent to it. An hon. friend of his had said, that retrenchment and economy were necessary; but he had always held it to be a gross and idle delusion, that any retrenchment would relieve the present distresses of the country. It was from the resources and energies of the country alone that we could expect to derive any relief; and we must be careful to preserve the birth-right and property of every man, which was now assailed by the dangerous practices referred to in the Report of the Committee. It had been alleged, that the meetings which had taken place were intended for nothing else but Parliamentary Reform. He dared say it might be so: but he did believe, that in a great number of the clubs, in the Spencean clubs especially, there was a disposition to carry their plans into execution by force and violence. Very serious riots, insurrections, and tumults, must be suppressed. It was impossible to look at the seditious meetings and publications, the delegates and the subscriptions, and not to say that these had operated very considerably on the mind of the country. It was of the highest possible consequence to prevent these persons from coming forward and putting those plans into execution which they had intended. The ordinary laws might be sufficient, if they had their course, but he believed it to be one part of the plan, by threats and menaces to prevent the complete execution of justice. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) He did not conceive that the laws now in force were adequate to the dangers of the country; and where were they to look for security but to the measure which was now proposed? He sincerely believed that, if the House should adopt it, they would hear very little more of any treasonable practices; and anxious as he was for the peace and prosperity of the country, he should be happy to bear his share of the odium in consenting to the Bill now before them.

Lord Folkestone could not but express his astonishment at the observation of the hon. member who had just sat down, that the existing laws were not at this moment in full operation. He had been in the habit of conversing with gentlemen in every part of the country; he had seen many of them even that day; and he had never yet heard of that dreadful and portentous state of the country which the hon. member had described. If the hon. member meant to rely on this as a reason for supporting the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, why had he not told them that in the Report of the Committee? But how was the suspension of that great bulwark of English liberties to remove this dreadful difficulty? He protested against what the hon. member had stated to be so necessary: the intimidation of the people. If Ministers intended nothing more than this, they dealt most unfairly with the country. Why were the whole people of England to be deprived of the benefits of the Constitution? He believed, however, that this was the secret reason for bringing in the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. From all that he had been able to learn on this subject, the prisoners themselves could not force on their trial for two months to come, and therefore it was only for the purpose of intimidation that Ministers had ventured to propose this measure. He hoped that the House would interfere and prevent the passing of this bill for this very reason. He begged them to pause and not to hurry it in this indecent way, in order that the Lord Advocate might come forward with some explanation, which he had not yet done. It was no reason because we had consented to the suspension in 1794, that we were to do so in 1817. As to the renewals of the bill, it was pretty well explained by his hon. friend near him (Mr. M. A. Taylor) that people got so callous, and the House became so indifferent, that the subject was discussed in empty benches. (Hear.) He did hope that the House would stop the progress of the bill on that ground; and on the ground of the hon. gentleman who spoke last, that the bill could not be useful for two months to come. He had not heard of any meeting for discussing the subject of Parliamentary Reform in which any disturbance had taken place. The riot at Spa-fields was not occasioned by the meeting itself, though it arose out of it. The people had not set themselves in defiance of that House. The hon. member had told them, that he had put every thing in the Report on that subject: how then could it be said that any popular tumult had arisen respecting Parliamentary Reform? He had seen the people going up with petitions to the Prince Regent to call the Parliament together; but Ministers had put off the Parliament; and why? All they wanted was money. They gave the people no relief for their distresses; they scouted them; and then they brought forward their bill for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. What was the Report of the Committee? It was a history of what passed under the eyes of his Majesty's Ministers two or three months ago. Where was their vigilance to prevent the blowing up of the bridges, the taking of the Bank and of the Tower? Why did they not call Parliament together at that time, when they knew of that danger? If he mistook not, the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Canning) was taking his pleasure in France; and the noble lord also (Castlereagh) was making his speeches in Ireland. Another noble lord (Sidmouth), it was true, was very vigilant; but how had the right hon. gentleman been induced to rely on him? He remembered the time when he did not treat his worthy colleagues, now his friends, with so much confidence; and thought that the whole conduct of the Cabinet was not adequate to the management of the public business. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman, however, had since taken his place amongst them, and was now perfectly satisfied with those whom he formerly despised. (Hear.) The Solicitor-General had misstated the periods of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, and the continuation of that act. The hon. and learned gentleman had made a great mistake; for he said, there was no law now in force which was not in force before. If he (Lord Folkestone) had not read the statute-book incorrectly, five years ago a strong act was passed for the punishment of unlawful societies, and unlawful oaths. That statute made an oath for murder, treason, &c. punishable by death; and compulsion was no excuse unless declared within fourteen days. Why, then, had not this law been put in execution before they called upon the House to deprive the people of one of their most valuable liberties? It appeared to him that this measure was most unwarrantable and most uncalled for, more especially as a matter of intimidation. As such, it was impossible that it could have a good effect: on the contrary, for the last 25 years, we know by experience that we had tried by compulsion to get rid of those feelings which were now said to agitate the minds of the people. He besought the House to tread in that path no longer, but to retace their steps; to endeavour to conciliate the minds of the people; to listen to their petitions; to alleviate their distresses, to adopt every possible economy and retrenchment; and not to put the whole population of the country out of the pale of the law. This, and this only, could secure the affections of the people, and induce them to bear their burdens with fortitude and patience. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lamb and Lord Folkestone mutually explained.

The Lord Advocate said, that in all the preceding acts for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, from the time of the union of England with Scotland, a clause was introduced in the very same terms as in the present bill. In 1715, 1722, and 1745, the law officers who then sat in that House meant to put the people of Scotland out of the pale of the law as much as the people of England. A petition had been presented to the House by a person of the name of Mr. Arthur, stating, that one of the officers of justice in Scotland had been guilty of some oppressive acts, and had afterwards received a pension from the Crown; but he wished the House to remember, that an hon. member, who was now no more, (Mr. Horner,) had expressed a very favourable opinion of that judge; and, surely, all who considered the conduct of that hon. member—all who reflected on his strict integrity and many virtues, both in public and private life—all who dwelt on the great benefits which Scotland had derived from his abilities and attachment to the public interests—all who flattered themselves, and most justly so, with the expectation that England would derive the most essential benefits from his patriotism and talents, (Here Sir Samuel Romilly appeared to be deeply affected.) would concur in the opinion, that nothing criminal or injurious to the reputation of that judge could have been committed, or the hon. member to whom he had alluded would not have suffered it to escape his censure.

Sir Samuel Romilly rose merely to make one or two observations on what had fallen from the learned lord, from whom he had the misfortune to differ with respect to the acts which included Scotland. He had said, on a former night, that the clause in question was not to be found in the act of 1794: he had never said that it was not to be found in any of the preceding acts. It was certainly not to be found in the act of 1744. This, however, was a matter of very slight importance: the question was not what was done in former times, but what was to be done now. He entreated the House to pause, and not to suffer any judge or magistrate to take any man into custody without the order of his Majesty's privy council, signed by six privy councillors. This clause only referred to such as had been committed under a warrant from the Secretary of State.

Mr. Ponsonby observed, that the learned lord could have no objection to clearing up the difficulty, which did not prevail with regard to the Scotch acts of 1701 and 1744, against wrongous imprisonment. As the clause was at present worded, it would bear many constructions directly opposed to each other, which could not be decided upon after the passing of the bill but by a court of justice.

Sir A. Pigott also reprobated the obscurity and ambiguity with which the clause was framed. If this law were to be inflicted upon the people, they had at least a right to expect that it should be clear and precise. In order that the difficulty might be removed, he recommended that the bill should be recommitted.

The Speaker remarked, that in the present stage the bill could not be recommitted. Any amendment might be introduced after the third reading.

Sir A. Pigott then proceeded to state his opinions generally upon the measure before the House. He would not go so far as to say, that he approved of every phrase in the Report of the Secret Committee; but after mature consideration, as a whole it met with his entire and heartily concurrence. He had listened to the arguments of some, and to the taunts and sneers of others; but his opinion was the more confirmed the more he reflected upon the nature of the evidence upon which that Report was grounded. He did not shrink from this declaration, because he held it to be a public duty; and, in his judgment, Ministers would have been liable to the severest censures, had they not made the communication to the House that led to the appointment of the Committee. (Hear.) So far from the Report being an exaggerated statement, he was rather inclined to think that it scarcely went as far as the evidence would warrant. As to the disclosure of that testimony, the Committee had wisely determined not to publish it: and although much of it was liable to contradiction, yet it was not to be expected that a Committee, not administering an oath, should obtain information with all the guards of judicial proceedings. The objection that the evidence was not annexed to the Report, was rather an objection to the nomination of a Committee at all; since the witnesses, if it had been deemed prudent, might have been examined at the bar of the House. The evils were certainly neither light nor trivial, and on account of their importance he readily gave his support to the bills upon the table for the suppression of secret associations, for the prevention of the seduction of the army and navy, and for the protection of the person of the Prince Regent: but these securities were all he considered necessary: and therefore he most strongly protested against the proposed suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act: that measure, the House would recollect, was not directed against any particular individuals, or against any particular place: but it deprived equally all classes of the King's subjects of their just rights, and confounded the innocent with the guilty. Was it pretended, that a single individual of property or consequence had been concerned with these miserable wretches? Or could it be argued, that dread of communications between insurgents and foreign hostile powers justified the suspension, which was not only disproportioned to, but not at all calculated to meet the evil? One hon. gentleman (Mr. Lamb) had indeed supported it for a reason never before urged; that reason was not only extraordinary in itself, but still more extraordinary from its want of the slightest foundation in truth. He had said that the suspension—this law above the law—was required, because the progress of the ordinary law was arrested by the present disturbed condition of the country. This was a pure imagination. Where in the Report would any statement be found to justify such an assertion? And upon what peculiar evidence, in his exclusive possession, did the hon. gentleman found his bold assertion? (Hear, hear.) We were now upon the very eve of the Spring Assizes; the judges were about to open their commissions; and yet they were to be told that all was in vain, for the progress of the law was arrested, and there was an end of all justice and its administration. The Report confined the disturbances to certain districts, and the evidence warranted that conclusion, but the remedy was to apply to the whole nation; and because a few active demagogues had misled some manufacturers and artisans, the agricultural labourers, and all other peaceful classes, were to be put out of the pale of the law. It was enough for him that this extraordinary power was capable of abuse: he did not ask who were the Ministers, but he would fearlessly state, that under circumstances like the present he would not intrust such unlimited and uncontrollable authority to any Ministers. True it was, that unlawful associations existed; but was it to be now said, and to be established as a precedent, that whenever it could be proved that a secret club, however contemptible, had been formed, the tottering weakness of an administration was to be bolstered up by a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. (Hear, hear.) Convinced as he was, that ninety-nine hundredths of the population were well-disposed to quell the one hundredth who might be ill-disposed, he would not, by voting for this bill, subject himself to the reproach of having aided in this new and unwarrantable attack upon the Constitution.

The Attorney-General addressed the House from a strong sense of duty; not because he felt peculiarly competent to the task, having, for not less than sixteen hours, been engaged in procuring the first conviction in this country for an offence against the law for the abolition of the slave trade. Although some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were so strenuous in refusing this necessary power to any Minister; yet, if his memory did not fail him, our ancestors had not less than nine times consented to a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The question was, whether the state of affairs at present justified a repetition: and in his judgment there never had been a period of our history when such an awful combination of circumstances demanded that the Executive Government should be armed with additional authority. The hon. and learned gentleman who spoke last, and other members of the Committee who usually sat on the other side of the House, had vindicated Ministers from the absurd charge that they were the contrivers of these plots, and the promoters of these clubs, for their own private purposes: at least, those gentlemen, with their high talents and excellent discernment, had been made the dupes of this humbug, if it had even been attempted; for, after the fullest inquiry, they were convinced of the real dangers to which the country was exposed. Surely the infamous and blasphemous oath which a learned lord (the Lord Advocate) had produced on a former night, and which the Committee had excluded from their Report on account of the danger to which the witnesses would be exposed, was a sufficient proof of the extent to which disaffection had been carried.

In ordinary times the old law against high treason might be sufficient; but these were not ordinary times; and the bills in progress for the suppression of associations, and to prevent the seduction of the defenders of their country, of themselves established the fact. If they were insufficient, he appealed to the other measure for the protection of the person of the Regent, not from secret plots, not from constructive treasons, but from direct assassination. (Hear, hear, and no, no.) The bill was upon the table, and its title would best explain its object. It was complained by some, that this suspension placed all the subjects of the Crown at the mercy of the Minister; but the provisions disproved the statement; and although the trial of an offender might by its means be delayed, it was nothing more than was frequently done on the absence of a material witness. One right hon. gent. had avowed, that under no circumstances would he place such an instrument in the hands of any Ministers. (No, no.) He was glad to hear that he was mistaken, for it was time such an argument should be abandoned and exploded. Those who were at all acquainted with the practice of the criminal law must be aware, that the ordinary law against treason was much in favour of the criminal; that certain forms must be observed by the prosecutor; and that two witnesses were required to the overt act: this rendered convictions always difficult; and in the case of the traitors recently arrested at Glasgow, certain delays allowed by this bill might be extremely beneficial to the cause of justice in more ways than one: although many were apprehended, did it follow that all were secured! or might there not still be some arch-traitor concealed, who would be able to take advantage of the information, if a speedy trial were to be had? With regard to those who were in confinement in London, he was happy to say, that probably no procrastination would be necessary in their cases: at least to this he would pledge himself, that not one half hour should be wasted between their arrest and their deliverance. (Hear, hear, hear.) It had been said, that the law officers of the Crown had been afraid to do their duty. The Solicitor-General had repelled the imputation with the scorn it merited; and, for himself, he (the Attorney-General) would say, that the only fear he had ever entertained was, lest he should be guilty of a dereliction of his duty, and not execute it as became the important trust reposed in him. It was impossible for him to file an information without having satisfactory evidence of treason: but though such evidence could not be produced, it did not follow that, when so much acknowledged danger existed, a new law should not be passed to meet a new emergency. He could assure the House, that he had not slumbered in his duty: and that, as far as his power extended, he had exercised it. He had not been inattentive to those libellous publications which for some weeks past had deluged all parts of the country. He had now in his pocket a most shocking and blasphemous libel, which he had received that very day from Norwich. It was a most horribly profane parody of the creed. (Cries of read, read.) No: he owed it to the dignity of that House not to insult it with the reading of so abominable a libel: he should feel it his duty to conceal it till the matter came regularly before a Court of Justice; and he would then take care that it should be read only once, and that for the technical purpose of comparing it with the record. (Hear, hear.) If, however, any gentleman had a curiosity to read it, he would seal its contents in a paper, and leave it on the table of the House. (Hear, hear, hear.) He could assure the House, that he had not been inattentive to his duty: there was no one case, which came in that shape that he could have brought any person to judgment on it, before the present time; and it would be too much to say, that he could have prevented the Spafeldts meeting, or the riot that ensued from it. Some gentlemen had thought proper to throw ridicule on the Spafeldts plot: they had laughed at the ammunition-stocking; and asked how a bridge, a Waterloo-bridge, could be blown up without sappers or miners. He did not believe that much mischief could have been done; but he did believe there were persons who endeavoured to persuade others that they could do all the mischief which they undertook to do. Nor were those leaders themselves despicably armed; and they had taken care to provide arms for others, by their intimation that the gunsmiths' and pawnbrokers' shops were to be broken open. He certainly was not one of those who imagined that they could have effected their evil purpose. He should be an unfit adviser of the Crown if he could have been frightened into so unreasonable a supposition; but he would ask, was it nothing to have alarmed the whole metropolis? Was it nothing that might have been done, if they had sallied forth at night, when the citizens were peaceably in their beds? And was it not confessed by one of the rioters themselves, that a premature rashness had defeated their purpose? It was said, that the present measure would excite alarm. He really believed that no honest man throughout the kingdom would sleep in less consciousness of security, though many a villain would be induced to desist from his evil designs. (Hear.)

Lord George Cavendish began by saying, that though he felt the utmost abhorrence at the attack made upon the Prince Regent, yet he did not believe that the outrage, audacious as it was, had murder for its object. The learned gentleman had adverted to what had fallen from some gentleman of the Committee: he himself had not been on that Committee; but he knew that much misrepresentation had been transmitted to it. (Hear, hear.) The intentions of the persons who sent it were, doubtless, good; but their intelligence was not correct. From what he knew of one district, he thought he might say generally, that the Committee had not had before it a true picture and character of the country. For his own part, he must complain of that Committee,

He knew of no reason why the county of Derby had been singled out for reprobation; he knew that what was said of that county was not the fact. (Hear, hear, hear.) There had, indeed, been a Hampden Club in Derby; but he believed it was not now in existence. It was true, also, that a great many persons in Derby and its vicinity had petitioned for Reform in Parliament: but they were most of them men of respectability: he must say, therefore, that he thought Derby wrongly accused; and he thought the same was probably the case with Staffordshire and Cheshire. Indeed, he was somewhat surprised to find the county of York omitted in the list of accused counties. He thought the magistrates of Derby, from the specimens he had seen of their decision and vigour, were quite competent to maintain the peace of the county. He had himself seen an instance, where a gang of Luddites, who had committed all sorts of depredations, had been speedily brought to justice; and the county had been tranquil ever since. What these magistrates had done before, they would do again; and certain he was, as far as related to that county, there was no reason for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. (Hear.)

Mr. Banks and Mr. Tierney rose at the same moment: there was a loud cry for Mr. Tierney to speak; but Mr. Banks having first caught the Speaker's eye, had, of course, the precedence. Mr. Banks then proceeded; but shouts of question, and loud and incessant coughing followed. He said, that if the situation of the country was such, that the country could not be tranquillized without this measure, it ought to be passed. (A loud and long yawn from the back benches here interrupted the speaker, and was the signal for more coughing, so that only one more sentence was heard, which was as follows:—) Prevention being better than punishment, it would be wise and humane to check the disaffected in their career, before they reached those excesses which would endanger others' lives and their own.

When the hon. member sat down, there was a pause of some minutes, but nobody rising, the cry of question became very vehement, and the House divided on the 3d reading; when the numbers were—

Ayes 265

Noes 103

Majority —162

After this, upon the motion of Sir S. Romilly, a very important amendment was made in the Bill. The effect of it was, to limit the operation of the Bill in Scotland as well as in England to persons committed to prison for treason, or suspicion of treason, upon a warrant signed by six Privy Councillors, or one of the principal Secretaries of State. As the bill stood originally, it extended to persons committed by any subordinate Magistrate. The bill, as altered, is in these words:—"That the Act made in Scotland, intituled, 'An Act for preventing wrongous imprisonment, and against undue delays in trials, in so far as the same may be construed to relate to the cases of treason, and suspicion of treason, with respect to persons so committed as aforesaid,' be suspended until the first day of July, 1817, and that until the 1st day of July, 1817, no Judge, Justice of the Peace, or other Officer of the Law in Scotland, shall liberate, try, or admit to bail, any person or persons that is or shall be in prison within Scotland, 'under a warrant or warrants so signed as aforesaid,' for such cause as aforesaid, without orders from his Majesty's Privy Council, signed by six of the said Privy Council."—The words printed in Italics were added by Amendment.

Three clauses were then moved, and negatived in succession: one, by Sir F. Burdett, that prisoners should be allowed to see their wives or children, on application to the home department, and that care should be taken not to confine them in damp or unwholesome dungeons; the second, by Mr. W. Smith, was to enable persons who had been wrongfully imprisoned to bring their action within a month after their discharge; the third, by Mr. Ponsonby, which was negatived after a division, was, that the act should expire on the 20th of May, instead of the 1st of July. The numbers on this division were—

Against the motion 239

For it 97

Majority —142

The House then went into debate on the clause of the bill which authorized the removal of prisoners from one gaol to another.

The Solicitor-General defended the clause. He contended, that it was necessary that the power of removal should be given, as cases might occur in which, from the number of the prisoners, or from their combining together, it would be very inconvenient to retain them together in one gaol. In such cases it might be proper to remove prisoners from Gloucester to Hereford, or vice versa; but care was taken that they should suffer no disadvantage by these removals; for, if brought to trial, it was provided that the proceedings should take place in the county in which they were originally committed.

Mr. Ponsonby could not understand why a man taken up for treasonable practices in the county of Hereford should be imprisoned in Gloucester. Were not the gaols in the county sufficient, or were they destitute of keepers? If there were no gaols in a particular county, or no persons to guard them, he could comprehend why a prisoner should be sent to another county; but unless some such reason as that he had stated existed, the removal was a measure of unnecessary cruelty.

Mr. Bennet stated, that cases of great hardship had occurred under the former suspensions of the Habeas Corpus Act, in consequence of imprisoning persons in distant gaols.

Mr. B. Bathurst supported the clause, which was ordered to stand part of the bill.

On the question that the bill do pass,

Mr. Brougham rose, and stated, that from what a right hon. gent. opposite had said, he supposed it was to be understood, that unless the notice of a motion for the renewal of the bill were given in the month of May, it would be allowed to expire on the 1st of July. If one week more had been given, the petitions against the bill would have been most numerous.

Mr. Canning observed, that the period of the bill was limited, but that circumstances might occur which would render its renewal necessary.

Mr. B. Bathurst had not said any thing in the course of the debate about the month of May. He had given no such pledge. All that he had said was, that as the bill was to expire in July, the question of its renewal would require some consideration; and, of course, that notice of the intention of Ministers in that respect would probably be given some time before the date to which the duration of the bill was limited.

Lord Stanley said, he had paid particular attention to what fell from the hon. gentleman, and he was confident he had used the words "many weeks."

Mr. B. Bathurst was not conscious that he had said many weeks; he could not answer for what his right hon. friends might, under future circumstances, determine; but such a question would, doubtless, require a notice of a few weeks.

Mr. Brougham wished the hon. gent. to recollect, that the House had gone to a division on his declaration.

Mr. Calvert stated, that the hurry in passing the bill afforded no time for presenting petitions against it. If it had stood over until Monday, there would have been a meeting of his constituents, and he doubted not that 20,000 persons would have signed a petition praying that the bill might not pass.

Sir C. Monck said, that the petitions would be more numerous against this than any other measure, were time afforded to the country to transmit them.

On the question that the bill do pass, being finally put, the cry of "No," from the Opposition side, was very loudly pronounced; it literally shook the House: but there was no division. The bill was then passed, and ordered to the Lords.—Adjourned at half-past 2.

A LIST OF THE MINORITY

THAT VOTED AGAINST THE THIRD READING OF THE BILL.

Abercromby, Hon. J.	Calcraft, John
Anson, Sir George	Calley, Thomas
Atherley, Arthur	Calvert, Charles
Aubrey, Sir John	Calvert, Nic.
Baillie, James E.	Carew, R. S.
Baring, Alexander	Carter, John
Brand, Hon. Thos.	Cavendish, Lord G.
Brougham, Henry	Chaloner, Robert
Burdett, Sir Francis	Cochrane, Lord
Burrell, Hon. P. D.	Coke, Thos. W.
Browne, Dom.	Duncannon, Viscount

Dundas, Hon. L.	Nugent, Lord
Dundas, Charles	Ord, William
Dringington, Viscount	Ossulston, Lord
Edzakerley, J. N.	Osborne, Lord F.
Fergusson, Sir R. C.	Peirse, Henry
Fitzgerald, Lord W.	Pelham, Hon. C. A.
Fitzgerald, Rt. Hon. M.	Pelham, Hon. G. A.
Fitzroy, Lord John	Phillips, George
Folkstone, Viscount	Piggot, Sir A.
Fellowes, Hon. N.	Ponsonby, Rt. Hon. G.
Gaskell, Ben.	Power, Richard
Grosvenor, Gen. T.	Prittie, Hon. F. A.
Gordon, Robert	Portman, E. B.
Haise, Sir W.	Preston, R.
Hamilton, Lord A.	Pym, Francis
Heathcote, Sir G.	Ramsden, J. C.
Heron, Sir Robert	Rancliffe, Lord
Hughes, W. L.	Ridley, Sir M. W.
Hornby, Ed.	Romilly, Sir Samuel
Hurst, Robert	Rowley, Sir W.
Jervois, G. P.	Russell, Lord William
Lambton, J. G.	Russell, Lord G. W.
Langton, W. G.	Russell, Lord John
Latouche, Rob. jun.	Russell, R. G.
Lemon, Sir W.	Scudamore, Robert
Lloyd, J. M.	Sefton, Earl of
Lyttleton, Hon. W.	Smith, John
Marryat, Jos.	Smith, Robert
Methuen, Paul	Smyth, J. H.
Macdonald, James	Stanley, Lord
Mackintosh, Sir J.	Spiers, Arch.
Madocks, W. A.	Shaw, Sir James
Maitland, Hon. A.	Tavistock, Marquis
Martin, John	Taylor, C. W.
Molyneux, H. H.	Taylor, C. V.
Monck, Sir Charles	Tierney, Right Hon. G.
Moore, Peter	Vaughan, Hon. J.
Mosely, Sir O.	Walpole, Hon. G.
Newman, R. W.	Waldegrave, Hon. W.
Neville, Hon. R.	Wilkins, Walter
North, Dudley

TELLERS—Bennet, Hon. H. G.—Smith, Wm.

PAIRED OFF.

Althorp, Viscount	Newport, Sir J.
Birch, Jos.	Ponsonby, Hon. F. C.
Cavendish, Hon. H.	Powlett, Hon. W. V.
Cavendish, Hon. C.	Sharp, Richard
Curzon, J. C.	Townshend, Lord J.
Foley, Thomas	Western, C. C.
Markham, Admiral	Webb, E.
Martin, Henry	Wharton, John

On Mr. Ponsonby's Amendment for limiting the Bill to the 20th day of May, in addition to the foregoing List.

Babington, Tho. W.	Warre, J. A.
Barclay, C.	Wellesley, W. L.
Bastard, E. P.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, March 1.

The Lord Chancellor took the Woolsack at one o'clock.—Soon afterwards the Bill for the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus was returned from the Commons, with Amendments, to which their lordships' concurrence was required. The Amendments were ordered to be taken into consideration on Monday, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 8.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION BILL.] Lord Holland rose to put a question to the noble lord on the woollack, relative to the effect of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and he trusted that any irregularity or delay arising from the proceeding would be excused, when it was considered that the House of Commons had not found it necessary to press forward the bill for the suspension, with the same precipitation as had been used in the House of Lords. The question he wished to ask was—whether, if any person detained under this act should be desirous to petition Parliament—or, if there should be any objection to the petitioning of Parliament, from the publicity which this would give to his case—whether, if he should be desirous to petition the Sovereign, a person in such circumstances had a right so to do—and whether he was to be debarred the means of so petitioning? This was a question of the utmost importance, with reference to the proceeding in which the House was at this time engaged; and as it must be the wish, even of those who were most favourably disposed towards this measure of suspension, that its consequences should be understood, he had no doubt but that the question would receive a distinct and explicit answer.

The Lord Chancellor replied, that if the noble lord put the question generally, he had no objection to say, that, unless under very particular circumstances, he did not know any situation in which a subject could be, in which he had not the right to petition the Sovereign or the Parliament. To a general question he could only give a general answer.

Lord Holland trusted that the noble lord would not take advantage of any want of formality in his mode of putting the question: but it had happened to him in the course of his official duties, to have occasion to discover, that there were prisons in which it was a rule to debar the prisoners from the use of pen, ink, and paper. What he wished therefore to know was, whether, if a person detained in prison, should be desirous to petition the Sovereign, the gaoler would be justified, or would not be guilty of a serious offence, if he were to prevent the prisoners having the use of pen, ink, and paper, for that purpose?

The Lord Chancellor did not wish to throw any difficulty in the way of attaining the clearest possible understanding of a subject so important as this. His opinion was, that, generally speaking, every person in confinement ought to have the benefit of the presumption of innocence till found guilty, so as to continue to him every right and privilege of any other person, so far as was consistent with his safe custody. (Hear, hear.) He should be ashamed of himself if he were to refuse to answer a question so intimately connected with the liberty of the subject as precisely as he could; but it was impossible for him to give any other than a general answer to a general question of that description.

Earl Grey.—If he understood the noble lord's answer, it was this—that a person confined under the suspension, would be entitled to state his grievances by petition to the Sovereign or Parliament; and, generally, that he would have a right to all such privileges as belonged to any other subject, so far as was consistent with his safe custody. To that extent the answer was distinct and satisfactory; but then the existence of the right would be of very little avail, if the prisoner were to be deprived of the means of acting upon that right: and therefore he hoped that it was to be understood as a consequence of the answer, and the existence of the right, that the prisoner ought to have the means of acting upon it; and that it would be a breach of duty in a gaoler or any other person, to deny the prisoner the means of making applications by petition, to the Parliament or the Sovereign. With this understanding of its meaning and consequences, he professed himself satisfied with the answer.

The Lord Chancellor admitted the consequences to be as the noble earl had stated them, provided the means of petitioning were desired bonâ fide for that purpose, and pretence of petitioning were not made use of as a colour for some other object.

Earl Grey.—Certainly; it must be bonâ fide for the purpose of petitioning.

The order of the day being then read for taking into consideration the amendment made by the Commons in this bill,

Earl Darnley rose and observed, that the precipitation with which their lordships had hurried through this measure, was a disgrace to their proceedings. The Commons had proceeded in a much more deliberate manner, and had by that means been enabled to rectify an error which had escaped their lordships' attention. He, in common with others of their lordships, had voted on a question for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act on a former occasion; under circumstances, however, totally different from those of the present times. The country was then at war, and there was a committee in his country actually corresponding with the enemy. This was a time unquestionably of great distress, arising from the badness of the last harvest, as well as other causes. In such circumstances, it was impossible but that there should be a spirit of discontent in the country, of which ill-disposed persons would be ready to take advantage; but the fortitude and patience with which the people in general had borne their distresses, had been the subject of commendation in the speech from the throne; and the only exception, as far as the public knew, was that of the riotous conduct of certain of those who attended the meetings at Spafields; but if, in consequence of these meetings, or from any other causes, serious danger was apprehended, and a measure of this sort deemed advisable, why had not Ministers sooner assembled Parliament, instead of suffering these dangers to grow to maturity? Ministers themselves might be considered as the cause of the outrage against the Prince Regent, by their neglect to assemble Parliament at an earlier period. Having mentioned the outrage against his Royal Highness, he must take the liberty to state, that he did not believe there had been any conspiracy for the purpose of assassination. But, for such evils as these, other remedies would be more proper than this suspension, which, without any necessity for it, had been passed with so much precipitation. He should move that the amendment be read a 2d time this day three months, not with a view to object to the amendment, but to give him an opportunity of recording his protest against the bill.

The Earl of Liverpool did not mean to go into the general subject: the only question now being, whether the amendment was proper.—The noble earl had said, that the bill was passed through that House with precipitation; but he, as well as the noble earl, had on former occasions voted for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and on those occasions the bill had been read three times in one day. This, therefore, was not unprecedented; and in fact more time had been allowed for consideration on this than on former occasions. With respect to the necessity for resorting to the measure, he would only say, that those who had proposed it would not have done so if they had not been conscientiously convinced of its necessity; and on no occasion had he ever voted for the suspension with a stronger conviction of its necessity than he did at the present moment.

Earl Grosvenor.—His noble friend had objected to the precipitation with which the measure had been hurried through that House, not because it was unprecedented, but because it was on this occasion unnecessary. He agreed with his noble friend; and believed that if the measure had not passed with so much haste multitudes of petitions would have come up against it. In the ancient and loyal town of Chester, as soon as the people heard that such a measure was in contemplation, a requisition was signed by 100 most respectable inhabitants: in consequence of which a meeting took place at the townhall, and at that meeting a petition against this measure was agreed to, which petition was very soon after signed by upwards of 2,000 most respectable inhabitants. If time had been allowed, petitions would have come up from all quarters of the country. He had no particular objection to the amendment; his objection went to the whole of the bill.

The Bishop of Chester said, that the noble earl, without any intention to misrepresent, had gone too far when he had stated that the 100 persons who had signed the requisition were the most respectable inhabitants of Chester. That they were respectable persons he did not deny; but not the most respectable. He rather believed that the great majority of the most considerable people in the place had not promised the petition.

Earl Grosvenor, in explanation, stated, that he had not taken upon him to say, that those who signed the requisition and the petition were the most respectable inhabitants; but only, that they were most respectable, and as respectable, he believed, as any in the place.

The Earl of Rosslyn.—He must be permitted to say, that the bill had passed their lordships' House, without the deliberation which was due to a measure of this nature. The bill, as it before stood, had placed the northern part of the island in a very different situation from that in which it placed the people of England. The Commons, however, had bestowed more attention on the measure, and it was owing to their more deliberate proceeding that the bill had not passed in such a state as to leave Scotland in a worse situation than this part of the united kingdom. In the latter country the persons to be detained could be kept in custody only by warrant of the Secretary of State, or by warrant signed by six Privy Councillors. But under the suspension of the act of wrongous imprisonment in Scotland, any person might be committed and detained by any magistrate or inferior officer, without the power on the part of the magistrate to bring such persons to trial or liberate them, however favourable the case might turn out to be, without the warrant of the Secretary of State or a Privy Councillor. So that the people of Scotland would have been exposed to a double hardship. The magistrate had no means of giving relief; and however favourable the case, the release of the prisoner must have been a matter of personal favour.

The Lord Chancellor desired it to be understood, that though he had not expressed his sentiments as to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, he considered himself as being fully responsible for the measure. He was one who had a very great deal to do, and would not probably even now have said any thing on the subject, were it not for the observations of the noble earl who had spoke last. He admitted that no man was more liable to mistake than he was; but he had given this measure his most anxious attention. The individual who now addressed them had, in the course of his life, much occasion to look narrowly into the projects which had been in agitation among certain persons in this country. He had been a good deal concerned in the measures of 1795. He had at that time prosecuted for high treason, because he disdained to bring the persons then under prosecution before a jury for any other crime than that of which he was conscientiously satisfied they were guilty. The judges of the country, the Parliament of the country, had stated the crime to be high treason. The bill which was then introduced was brought in by his advice, and of that bill this was nearly a transcript. In addition to the experience which he himself had acquired by his practice in Scotch causes, they had at that time on the woolsack, a noble lord, (Loughborough) well acquainted with the English law, and particularly well acquainted with Scotch law. Lord Loughborough then thought the bill right, and he thought it right, and he still thought that this bill was right as it originally stood, with reference both to the English law and the law of Scotland. With respect to the necessity for the measure, he never had been more fully convinced of that necessity on any occasion, than he was on the present, when the design was abroad to destroy all principles of religion and morality, by which alone society could subsist. And as for the amendment, he begged it might be remembered, that he considered the bill as altered for the worse, with respect to the individual and the magistrate, both in Scotland and in England; and he voted for it only because he thought it necessary that the bill should, though in a worse state than before, be passed without delay.

Lord Holland observed, that, granting to the friends of the bill that there were causes for alarm, he must still say, that if there was a disposition among any description of men to carp at authority, he knew of nothing so necessary under these circumstances, as a due attention to the character and credit of the two Houses of Parliament. The noble lord on the woolsack had adverted to the anxious attention which he himself had applied in the drawing up of the bill; but as a peer of Parliament, he could not help complaining, that the House had been deprived, in a great measure, of the benefit of that deliberation. The noble lord thought that the amendment made the bill worse; but the Commons, let it be recollected, had thought that it made the bill better; and yet the noble lord had never explained to their lordships the grounds upon which he had proceeded, and on which his opinion rested. Good God, could it be expected, that they should be regarded with respect and reverence by the people, unless they did their duty to that people? When a petitioner applied to their lordships, and stated, that he was ready by visû voce evidence at their bar, to contradict one of the most material parts of the Report of their lordships' committee, the noble lord had then insisted on the standing orders of the House, and declared that he would not sit in it unless its standing orders were supported; and yet the noble lord was ready to surrender up the liberties of the people to the discretion of the Ministers of the Crown, without any explanation of the grounds of his opinion, or any proof of that anxious attention which, he said, he had applied to this measure. It had been asserted, that measures of this kind had always been passed with precipitation; and the reason was, that the danger was imminent. But what was their present situation? After the measure had run through their lordships' House with so much rapidity, here they had it again, after the lapse of a week, with a material amendment. The Commons, a much more slow, cool, and deliberative body than their lordships, (hear, hear,) had spent a week in the consideration of the measure, and found out that the bill was defective. The noble lord had said, however, that the alteration was for the worse, and upon that principle he ought to vote against the amendment. But no, said the noble lord, that would be the cause of farther delay. The argument would come with a better grace if they had not heard it before; but the noble lord had not explained why he thought the bill better in its former state. As the bill originally stood he was quite clear that the words in the original bill would apply to commitments by any magistrate. As the words now stood, it appeared that England and Scotland were placed in the same situation. But as he could not be certain whether he understood the effect of the amendment, or what would have been the consequences by the common law of Scotland, he thought it somewhat hard that these matters had not been fully explained to the House. They who had talked loudest against any innovation in the Constitution, were now the most eager to swallow down this bitter cup of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, because it was necessary that Ministers should be armed with certain powers; and now they voted for an amendment which deprived them of part of the powers which they had declared to be necessary. If the powers before given to this bill had been diminished as to England, as well as with respect to Scotland, the amendment would have had his approbation: but he certainly did not envy any additional security given to Scotland, and he thought the exemption of Ireland from this measure would do much to conciliate that country. He felt that sufficient opportunity had not been given to express one half of the objections which existed to this measure.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that the state of the country, as far as he could acquire a knowledge of it from the most diligent inquiries he could make, was most incorrectly described in the Report upon which the bill now before their lordships had been founded. It was true that 26 persons had been apprehended in Scotland; but they were poor unfortunate men, in wretched circumstances, and totally destitute of property or influence of any kind. Nothing could be more absurd than to suppose the meetings of such men capable of producing such degree of insecurity in the Government as to call for a measure of so extraordinary a nature. In fact, there was no proof of any necessity for the suspension. Would any noble lord lay his hand on his heart and say, he believed so general a conspiracy as that represented in the Report could exist, and yet that it must be dangerous to submit to Parliament any evidence respecting it? Surely, in so extensive a conspiracy, some details might be laid before the House, without the danger of disclosing any thing that might defeat the due course of justice, or cause the improper exposure of individuals. Parliament was, however, called upon to vote away the liberties of the people upon the loose statements of a Report which had been contradicted in material facts. If expressions which might be the effect of distress were to be taken as evidence of conspiracy, Ministers might find abundance of such proofs daily in the streets of London: but as it had been said by a great political economist, that demand is of no value without the means of supply; so it might be said, that a plot is no plot without the means of executing it. With respect to the clause referring to Scotland, the noble and learned lord had stated that it stood in the same words in former bills: but he had not assigned any other reason why it should be inserted in the present. Its being wrong was no reason for its repetition; and if it was right, why was nothing said in its defence? but the introduction of such inconsistent clauses was nothing new. He recollected when measures of the same kind were before Parliament on a former occasion, that he felt it his duty to point out an inconsistency in the enactments of a bill as applicable to England and Scotland, though it was not to be expected that the small minority with which he then acted could prevail on the House to alter their view of the general question. A bill to prevent seditious meetings was then brought into Parliament by a clause of which the people of Scotland were liable to be sent to Botany Bay for the same charge which, if proved in England, would only have been punished with imprisonment. He then experienced great difficulty in shewing that such would be the effect of the bill. No reason had been stated why these distinctions had been made; but though he had no objection to the amendment in the present bill, he should take the opportunity which the question on it afforded of giving another vote against the measure.

Earl Bathurst was surprised that the noble lords on the other side should now attempt to recur to the Report which had already been very fully discussed. That there was a certain danger had been admitted by the noble earl opposite: the question, therefore, was only a question of degree. Several noble lords had laid much stress on the Report having been contradicted; but the contradiction applied only to immaterial points, and could not affect the general deductions made by the Committee. There was no doubt of the Union Club at Sheffield having passed a resolution referring to the Union Club in London. There was as little doubt that such a society had been instituted in London: the only error, therefore, in the Report was produced by the Sheffield resolutions, and was really of no importance. With regard to the question now before their lordships, the noble and learned lord on the woolsack had shewn that the same provision as to Scotland existed in the bills which passed in 1795 and 1798; and on these occasions no objection had been made to it. The noble earl who spoke last had then a seat in that House; and yet, with all the consideration he paid to such measures, he had not thought it necessary to call their lordships' attention to this clause. In short, in all the bills which had passed for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, and the act against wrongous imprisonment in Scotland, this clause had formed a part, and yet no complaint had ever been made on the subject. It might, therefore, be fairly inferred, that no inconvenience had hitherto been experienced from it.

The Earl of Lauderdale, in explanation, observed, that though it was true that he was present in that House in the year 1795, when the bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act passed, it was by no means surprising that the clause had escaped his and other noble lords' notice, as the bill went through all its stages in one day, and no opportunity had been afforded for examining its provisions.

Earl Grey.—The noble lord who spoke last having made some reference to what had fallen from him on a former occasion, he felt it incumbent on him to trouble their lordships with a few observations. The noble lord appeared to think, that the only question was as to the degree of danger, and that all admitted some danger. He certainly had not stated that there was no danger; but the whole tenour of his argument had been, that there was not a danger of such a nature as to call for a measure, the effect of which would be to suspend the liberties of the people. That was the position he had laid down, and to which he still adhered, notwithstanding the opinion which the noble and learned lord on the woolsack had that night given. That noble and learned lord had stated, not only that there was more danger now than in the year 1794, but more than in the years 1715, 1722, 1745, or any former period in which the Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended. In fine, that the danger of the present period infinitely surpassed any that could exist in those times in which the succession to the throne was at issue; because what was now to be contended for was not whether this or that family should inherit the throne, but whether the morality and religion which formed the basis of every government should not be destroyed. He would wish to ask the noble lord, whether he really considers this a fair comparison of the danger of the two periods? Whether the attempt to substitute another family for that which reigns over us in virtue of the revolution settlement—a substitution which the noble and learned lord seemed to think would be but of slight importance—would have been a matter of indifference to the country? Whether he conceives that the success of any of the descendants of James II. would not have been followed by the subversion of the laws and liberties of the country? But the noble and learned lord says, there is quite a new danger from the circulation of publications which tend to subvert all the principles of religion. He had not asserted that there was no sort of danger; but what he contended was, that there was none of sufficient magnitude to require the extraordinary measures about to be adopted. The publications alluded to were surely liable to be prosecuted by the existing laws: if the present laws could not reach them, that fact should be proved before new laws were required: but, at any rate, whatever danger might be apprehended from irreligious publications, he was confident that it could in no way be met by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. He thought it, however, very extraordinary that this charge of infidelity should be so much insisted on. It was not long since the House had heard complaints of a very contrary nature. They had heard of danger to true religion and the established church, from the increase of Puritanism and Methodism. The reverend bench opposite had always appeared to feel most alarm for the establishment from that quarter. Indeed, when the number of bible and missionary societies, and associations of every kind for propagating the Gospel which existed, were taken into consideration, nothing could seem more unfounded and unjust than this charge of irreligion. Instead of danger from the want of religion, or from an increase of infidelity, the only danger that struck him was, what might be apprehended from superstition; for he believed at no former period, since the reformation, had superstition so extensively prevailed in this country as at the present moment. He had admitted, that the right of meeting had in some instances been abused, and observed that he had no objection to a measure to regulate that right, if it were shewn the present laws were insufficient for that purpose. This was all the length he had gone: but the noble lord had said, that the Report was in no respect materially contradicted by what had come out since it was laid on the lords' table. In the first place he should observe, that they had before them a Report detailing statements of the most serious nature, without one atom of proof to support them: but what was more important was, that these statements were directly impeached. The very gist of the Report was, that a society existed in London with affiliated branches in the country. This the secretary and members of the club described as the parent society offer to disprove. The Lord Mayor and Mr. Alderman Goodbehere were ready to be examined at the bar, in contradiction of the statement in the Report on this subject. But the noble lord says this is not a matter of any moment, and therefore will not hear the evidence. In his opinion, however, it was one of the principal facts, or what somewhere else might be called a principal feature, from which the existence of danger had been inferred. Though he did not disapprove of the amendment which was under consideration, yet, if an opportunity offered of opposing a measure generally objectionable, he could not be blamed for availing himself of it. If, therefore, his noble friend should think proper to take the sense of their lordships on the question, he should have his vote. He should wish, however, to know, whether any noble lord could explain in what situation the people of Scotland would now stand under this bill. The noble and learned lord had said, that the amendment made the bill worse. He must confess that, attending, as he had done altogether, to the principle of the bill, which he considered most objectionable, he did not apply his mind to the details. When the noble viscount, in introducing the measure, said that it was not extended to Ireland, but to Great Britain only, he had taken it for granted that the people of England and Scotland were placed precisely in the same situation. As there was a difference, he thought that the noble viscount ought to have stated to the House what that difference was. The question was not, whether the clause was inserted in the bill of 1795, but whether it ought now to be retained? Is the situation of the people of Scotland rendered better or worse by the amendment? He had heard it whispered, that the effect would be to render the law nugatory in Scotland: this he should not regret: but how was the amendment to be reconciled with the assertions of some noble lords, that the danger was greater in Scotland than in England? Some explanation ought to be given on this point. All he had heard stated was, that the bill was the worse for the amendment, but how it was worse no noble lord had shewn. Earl Darnley said, he was not sorry he had taken this opportunity of opposing the bill, but he should not divide the House on his motion.

The motion was then negatived, and the amendments were agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 5.

GAME LAWS.] Sir Edward Knatchbull moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill to prevent persons from going out at night, armed, to destroy game; and to repeal that part of the last act respecting rogues and vagabonds.

The bill was brought up, and read a first time.

LANCASHIRE PETITION.] Mr. Wilbraham Bosile presented a petition from certain magistrates, gentry, and clergy, in the hundred of Blackburne, in Lancashire, which complained of the acts of persons pretending to be reformers, and the practices of emissaries of disaffection. It was his wish that the sentiments of that large county should be understood; and he believed they were better expressed by this petition, which was drawn up before the Report of the committee of secrecy, than they were by the proceedings at Preston.

Lord Stanley did not object to the petition, but could not let it pass without a few observations. He readily admitted that the signatures were very respectable; and he believed that the signers expressed their own opinions; but he was yet to learn, how the opinions of gentlemen of one hundred were to be taken as the sense of a great county, in opposition to the sentiments of a public meeting, regularly called by public advertisement, and where all might attend who pleased. It was asserted, that the public meeting was not a meeting of freeholders; but the requisition called for a general county meeting. That county had not for years been in the practice of petitioning or addressing: it was much divided in politics, which occasioned considerable warmth, and it had been an object to avoid public meetings; but the circumstance of an address to the Prince Regent was not thought likely to excite that warmth.

Mr. Cawthorne could vouch for the respectability of the signatures in Blackburne, and believed the majority of the freeholders of the county coincided with the sentiments of the petition. The county meeting at Preston was attended by numbers of cotton-spinners and weavers, with a Mr. Casey, an Irish renegade, whom he believed to be a mischievous character. (Hear.) That was his opinion of him, and of some others, who succeeded by noise and numbers. (Hear.) He believed he knew Preston as well as the noble lord opposite did. Crowds of cotton-spinners, and of children, could be collected there when any body pleased. He did not believe that 20 freeholders voted at Preston.

Mr. Brougham observed, that to be praised by one who had all men's commendation was esteemed a high compliment. But this was not the case with the respectable individual, Mr. Casey, who was not praised by a gentleman who had all men's commendations. He had however been an ornament to the commercial world as much as any who attended the Exchange, or other places of commercial resort. His misfortunes in business, so far from operating as a diminution of his character, would, he should have thought, have screened him from personal attacks, which had never in the hours of prosperity been made against him. (Hear.) As to his being mischievous, that was a point to be settled only according the opinions and principles of individuals. He had been a powerful advocate of his own opinions; and if he had not been a successful one, his name would not have been mentioned in the House in the way they heard it. To call this gentleman a renegade, because he had transferred his residence from Ireland to England, was invidious, and might lead to monstrous inconvenience; but more especially, he should think, to those who, on leaving their native country, left their principles behind them. (Hear.) This was an extraordinary mode of observing upon an individual. He (Mr. B.) had known Mr. Casey for some years, and he was sure he was not the only member present who would repel an imputation on his character; and who would say, that he had exhibited an open, direct, and manly conduct in public matters, with a just proportion of propriety in private life. (Hear.) Preston was said not to speak the sense of the county, because it did not speak the sentiments of some individuals. The requisition was for a county meeting, and it was impossible to prevent great numbers of persons from attending. It was, therefore, a very numerous meeting; and though it was said that not twenty freeholders signed, yet the High Sheriff affixed his signature, though he differed from the majority. He had received information on this subject quite as respectable as that on the hon. member. (Hear.) He meant no disrespect, but he gave to his information fully as much credit; and it was of a contrary tenour to the hon. member's assertions. The sense of the meeting was decidedly against the address as proposed.

Mr. Baring thought, that the whole history of petitions shewed the necessity of some regulating enactment respecting county meetings. Frequently they spoke only the sense of the rabble of the county-town. The signature of the High Sheriff was the only satisfaction the House received. The difficulty occasioned was, that a few turbulent jacobins might collect a large assemblage of people to petition, and when the matter was inquired into, it might be found that respectable persons had little or nothing to do with it. He knew this to have been the case in several public meetings. He considered it desirable, not only now, but at all times, to regulate the mode of holding these meetings, by which means the right of petitioning would be more secure, and the weight of petition greater.

Mr. Cawthorne rose again. (Cry of spoke, spoke.)

Mr. Birch said, it was too much to say that this petition spoke the sense of the county. The Preston requisition was from the nobility, gentry, clergy, freeholders, and others. He did not doubt that many had signed the present petition through the influence of their employers. ("Not one," from the opposite side.) He could not credit that. As to Mr. Casey, he had never heard any thing against his character, either as a merchant or a man. (Hear.) His misfortunes surely furnished no argument against him. (Hear.)

Mr. Wilbraham Bootle observed, that he had abstained from all personal remarks or attacks. He wished to set himself right with the noble lord (Stanley.) What he meant was, that he believed this petition spoke the sense of the majority of the county more than the meeting at Preston did. He found fault with the conduct of nobody. When the hall was opened at Preston, there was a great rush of people of all sorts, actuated by curiosity or other motives. The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

THE LATE MR. HORNER.] Lord Morpeth rose to move a new writ for the borough of St. Mawes. Though speeches on such an occasion were rather unusual in the House; yet he trusted that, under all the circumstances, the House would allow him to say a few words on the character of his lamented and departed friend, whose decease had occasioned the necessity of this motion. The gentleman whose death was now universally regretted, had for some time past been prevented, by serious indisposition, from attending to his professional pursuits, or to his duties in that House. He had, therefore, been induced to try the effects of a warmer and milder climate: but he had fallen a victim to a long, lingering, and severe disease. Under the pressure and affliction of his disorder, he yet preserved, undiminished, the qualities of his excellent and enlightened understanding. If he were to attempt to describe the merits and virtues of Mr. Horner's character, he might say, that in the relations of a son and of a brother he was most amiable. These, however, were topics which did not naturally come into the consideration of that House; but they were blended and incorporated with his character as a man in public life, so that, altogether, his merits became a species of public property, and formed an addition to the general stock of public virtue. He could appeal to gentlemen of the same learned profession with the deceased member, and to the gentlemen of that House, for their assent to the admiration and regard in which he was held. He had himself raised the edifice of his fame on good, true, and solid foundations. He was inflexible in his attentions to all great matters of justice. He possessed a clear, simple, but nervous style of oratory, peculiarly adapted to the discussion and elucidation of the public business, with which also he combined a great force of legal argument. As to his political opinions, he did not feel it necessary to mention them: they were sufficiently well known to all, of whatever character they were. The gentlemen opposite, he was convinced, would allow that he never aimed at any undue display of them: and at the same time he never shewed bitterness of feeling, or personal animosity. (Hear.) From such things his amiable qualities exempted him. Short as his contracted span of life had unfortunately proved, the merits he displayed must be regarded as the harbinger of future and more matured excellences. His death was a great loss to his family and to his friends, to that House, and to the country at large. At a time when the Constitution of the country was so rigorously examined into by many, to expose its defects and blemishes, it was a source of consolation to see that under it a man, without possessing the advantages of hereditary rank, or of a large fortune, was yet enabled, by his industry and the cultivation of his talents, to vindicate to himself a high station in society, which, he believed, was acknowledged by all. He should apologize to the House, not for introducing this subject, but for his inability to do it justice. (Hear.) He then moved the new writ.

Mr. Canning observed, that in all cases similar to the present, he knew of no instance more calculated to conciliate the unanimous feeling of the House. He had not had the happiness of private acquaintanceship and intercourse with the lamented member deceased. He had the pleasure of knowing him only within those walls. During the two last years he had not enjoyed the opportunity of witnessing his more matured and splendid efforts; but he had always previously anticipated his rising excellence. He had recognized his varied knowledge and attainments, his strength of principle, the genuineness of his warmth of feeling, and the modesty which accompanied his other merits, and threw a lustre on them all: securing to him at all times a favourable and even partial attention, and gaining for him a secure reputation. (Hear.) It was not his (Mr. C.'s) desire to mix other matters with a topic of this nature; but with his own avowed and notorious opinions respecting the Constitution of this country, he might be allowed to say, now when this borough was a second time vacated by the loss of great talents, that there was at least some consolation for theoretical defects, in the circumstance that the existing Constitution of Parliament sent them such men, occupying such high stations in society, and fitted, after being the ornaments of the House, to become the sustainers of the power, honour, and glory of the country. (Hear.) He was happy in giving his cordial approbation to all that had fallen from the noble lord.

Mr. Manners Sutton rose to bear his testimony to the virtues and merits of the lamented individual whose character had been so justly drawn by the noble lord. He had had the honour of knowing him, and the satisfaction of witnessing his private and public conduct; and though he often dissented from him on political questions, he could say that no change of circumstances, no difference of opinion, ever diminished the warm attachment and high regard he had for him. The noble lord had justly estimated the loss which the country and his friends had sustained by his death; for such a combination of commanding talent, of profound knowledge, and of strict integrity, had seldom been seen or regretted. His right hon. friend (Mr. Canning) had borne testimony to his character, though he professed that he was not personally acquainted with him, and had shewn a laudable eagerness to do honour to his memory from a view of his public conduct; but it was impossible for those who merely knew him in public life to have a full idea of his merits, or to entertain towards him that affection which his private virtues could not fail to inspire. Those who knew him best admired him most; and found their respect for his public virtues mixed with affection for that gentleness and integrity in private life, which made him not only esteemed but beloved. His loss would long be severely felt by his friends and the House. He (Mr. M. S.) could not expect that he could add any thing to the tribute that had already been so justly paid. It was from no idea that the memory of his lamented friend required his praise, that he now pressed forward to offer the expression of his feelings to the House; but he could not sit silent when an opportunity occurred of joining his testimony to that of the noble lord. He felt that a few words from him on such an occasion were as much a debt of gratitude as an act of justice. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. C. Wynn said, that his noble friend (Lord Morpeth), and his right hon. friend who had last spoken (Mr. M. Sutton), had expressed themselves concerning their departed friend with that feeling of affection and esteem which did them so much honour, and which was heightened by their habits of intimacy, and their opportunities of observing his character; but the virtues by which he was distinguished were not confined within the circle of his acquaintance, or concealed from the view of the world. Every one who saw Mr. Horner had the means of judging of his temper, his mildness, and his personal virtues; for they were seen by all. He carried with him to public life, and into the duties and the business of his public station, all that gentleness of disposition, all that amenity of feeling, which adorned his private life, and endeared him to his private friends. Amidst the heats and contests of the House, amidst the vehemence of political discussion, amidst the greatest conflicts of opinion and opposition of judgment, he maintained the same mildness and serenity of disposition and temper. No eagerness of debate, no warmth of feeling, no enthusiasm for his own opinions, or conviction of the errors of others, ever betrayed him into any uncandid construction of motives, or any asperity towards the conduct of his opponents. His loss was great, and would long be regretted. (Hear.)

Sir S. Romilly hoped that his acquaintance with Mr. Horner would plead his excuse for the anxiety he felt to say a few words on the present occasion. Agreeing with every thing that could be said of his private virtues, he would not enter on that subject. It was as a public man that he would speak of him. Of all the great and good qualities for which he was distinguished, his attention was turned most to his independence of mind and character. From this feeling he stored his mind with the treasures of useful information; from this he was led to apply himself assiduously to the study of our internal economy, of the sources of public wealth, of our foreign relations, and of all the great questions on which, as a legislator, it was his duty to form or express an opinion. From the same independence of mind he was led to devote himself to the labours of his profession, and to all those branches of knowledge connected with it; and notwithstanding his failure in obtaining that success in it which he so well merited—notwithstanding that he did not attain that practice or that reputation which his acknowledged talents and his great accumulation of legal science deserved—notwithstanding the frequent calls made upon his time by other business, and the attention he devoted to public affairs, the same spirit of independence led him still to prosecute that line of business in which his success would have secured him fortune in the most honourable though painful and laborious way, and allowed him the free and unshackled exercise of his talents. In the last 12 years, the nation had experienced a loss of many of its greatest ornaments—of many of its great men. The present, however, was a loss connected with circumstances and reflections which made a deep impression on the mind, and inspired a peculiar degree and kind of regret. All these great men had had opportunities of displaying their abilities; they had attained the summit of their fame, and left a lasting impression on their country; but his lamented friend was snatched away from the stage of public life before he had shewn the full maturity of his talents, and before he had reaped that reputation which would have been their reward. The House and his friends saw him improving from year to year; they saw him displaying more eloquence, more knowledge, more force, every additional discussion; but they saw likewise, that he had powers which had not been displayed, and they anticipated greater effects from his maturer efforts. This hope had been disappointed, and the greatness of the promise made the disappointment doubly severe. If any thing could heighten our regret for the loss of his great talents, eloquence, and exertion, it was the manner in which they were employed. Separated from their end, eloquence and talents appeared to him (Sir S.) of small value, or even little desirable. Eloquence alone was a transient quality, and calculated to procure transient reputation. It only was noble and praiseworthy when it was employed in laudable objects; when it had for its end the diffusion of knowledge, the promotion of human virtue and happiness, the dispelling of the clouds of ignorance and superstition, the enfranchisement of slaves, the support of liberty, the improvement of our laws and institutions, the protection of the distressed, and extension of improvement. It was by such an employment of talents that they became valuable, and it was to such objects that Mr. Horner directed their efforts. In this way he had exerted those abilities that Heaven had bestowed, and by such an exertion of them heightened their value, and aggravated our regret for their loss. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Eliot was anxious to join his tribute to that which was already paid to the manly integrity, the dignified eloquence, the public and Private virtues, which distinguished the hom. gent. whose death was now deplored.

Mr. C. Grant had known his lamented friend before he had distinguished himself so much as he had subsequently done, and could not be silent when such an opportunity occurred of paying a tribute to his memory. Whatever difference of opinion they might have on public questions, he could suspend that difference to admire his talents, his worth, and his virtues. It was not his talents alone that were developed in his eloquence. His eloquence displayed his heart: through it was seen his high-minded probity, his philanthropy, his benevolence, and all those qualities which not only exacted applause, but excited love. It was the mind that appeared in his speeches that gave them character. He would not enter into the account of his private life, although his private virtues were at least on a level with his public merits. Amid all the cares and interests of public life; he never lost his relish for domestic society, or his attachments to family. The last time that he (Mr. G.) conversed with him, he was anticipating with pleasure the arrival of a season of leisure, when he could spend a short time in the bosom of his family, and amid the endearments of his friends. When he looked at his public or private conduct, his virtues, or his talents, he would be allowed to have earned applause to which few other men ever entitled themselves. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Lascelles hoped he should be excused for now stating publicly on this melancholy occasion what he had always stated privately when an opportunity occurred. He knew no man more valuable, nor any one who would have been a greater loss. If any thing could give consolation to his friends, it was, however, the reflection, that his talents and integrity were appreciated; and that if a vote of the House were requisite for establishing his reputation, he was sure that vote would be unanimous. (Hear, hear.)

The writ was then ordered.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.] The order of the day for the second reading of this bill being moved,

The Solicitor-General rose to state some circumstances which shewed the necessity of the measure. If conspiracy existed, this was the best means of limiting its extent. Every subject of this bill had formerly been before Parliament, which had passed laws to guard against the dangers that existed. Nothing could be more dangerous than great bodies of men collected together, and addressed by inflammatory harangues, which attributed the distress of the country to misgovernment, and endeavoured to convince the people that their grievances could only be redressed, and Parliament reformed, by physical force. They were engines that were always to be dreaded, and might be wrought with terrible effect against the tranquillity and good order of society. It was not, however, the intention of the proposers of this measure that it should extend to the prevention of legitimate and constitutional meetings. The bill would not apply to county meetings, nor to assemblies convoked by the authority of sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, aldermen, or any corporate body. These means of petitioning, therefore, would still remain; and, he apprehended, would furnish ample opportunity for the representation of every political grievance, whether real or imaginary. One particular object of the bill also was to allow meetings to be holden at the requisition of 7 householders, after sufficient notice, in order that the individuals so calling the meeting might be known. This part of the measure, however, would require considerable regulation, and it might be proper that a power should be vested in the magistrate of preventing or suppressing such meeting, if the purpose of it should be the effecting any alteration in matters of state, without the consent of the King and Parliament; every such design being obviously unlawful. Another point was that of authorizing the magistrate to take into custody every person who should propound matter of a seditious nature for discussion in a public assembly. This provision was adopted in the act of 1796. The clause in question would go to the extent of prohibiting, under certain penalties, all meetings exceeding the number of fifty persons, and not called together by any constituted authority, or at the instance of 7 householders. It was his intention also to submit an additional clause in the committee, referring to a point in some degree distinct from the subject-matter of the act; and this was to forbid the last-mentioned meetings, namely, those called at the requisition of seven householders, from adjourning such meetings to another time or place, with a view of evading the notice required at their original assembling. The present bill declared such adjourned meetings to be unlawful assemblies, and would subject the offenders to punishment. The House would see, that the measure before them would not at all touch those regular and legitimate meetings which were convened by the magistracy, or the proper local authorities. The act of 1796, which was amended in 1799, did apply to lecture rooms and debating societies; but this provision was construed to be omitted in the latter enactment, and to have ceased with the expiration of the former. It was proposed, therefore, that this provision should be restored. Some difference would be found with regard to its duration, and that of the other regulations which it established; the duration of this particular enactment being temporary, and limited for the period of three years. The act of 1794, which was still in force, furnished a precedent for putting down one society by name; and it also declared such societies as should administer oaths, or other tests, or have branch societies, or send delegates, to be unlawful assemblies. This, however, did not reach the evil as it existed at present; for these societies now were independent of each other,

Although many of them had the same object—that of exciting insurrection, and overturning the Government of the country. All their proceedings were as consistent as though the parties of whom these various combinations were formed acted in direct league and concert. By this measure all those societies which communicated with each other by means of delegates or missionaries, would be placed on the same footing as those which professed to be branches or affiliations of the same society, and which were already illegal. It was the same evil which had before been attempted to control; and it was equally necessary to defeat the new means devised of propagating it. The bill would likewise go to dissolve one society by name, and this was the society known by the name of the Spenceans. He believed every member of the House must agree with him, that this society professed principles which were subversive of every thing that was valuable or essential to a well constituted State—principles incompatible with all order and all government. It might be said, that they did not appeal to have established any test, and that their meetings were open. He could not think, however, that discussions of such a nature were the less dangerous on account of the publicity and boldness with which they were entertained. He had only to add, that the measure would apply only to such societies as should be constituted for purposes of political mischief.

Mr. Ponsonby expressed his willingness to postpone the full discussion of this measure to the future stages which would be presented in the Committee, and on the third reading. It was not easy to understand the precise nature of such a measure at present, compounded as it was of the acts, with several new additions. He certainly was not aware of any objection to the provision with regard to the seven householders; and did not think it could operate so as to interfere injuriously with the constitutional right of the subject to petition the Legislature for a redress of grievances. He should deem it his duty, however, to offer some suggestions on other parts of the bill in the Committee; after which the principle would be better understood, and might be debated on the third reading. In the mean time he would call the attention of the honourable and learned gentleman to two clauses in the act of 1799, one of which was, in his opinion, calculated to do good, by inducing those who had been mistaken to retire from those societies against which the law was now to be directed. He thought also, that another clause, limiting the period within which actions against magistrates for their conduct under this act could be brought, might be very properly adopted. The bill, he must likewise observe, as it stood at present, appeared to him to be very loosely worded.

Mr. Calvert stated, that a most respectable and numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Southwark had just taken place, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament against the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; but finding that it was too late to adopt this proceeding, the Bill having been already read a third time, they had determined, without one dissenting voice, to petition the House against any further encroachments on the Constitution. (Hear.) Under these circumstances, and agreeing entirely with the unanimous vote of his constituents, he must feel himself constrained to take the sense of the House upon this early stage in the progress of the measure.

Sir F. Burdett.—Although he felt no desire to anticipate the discussion, which might be taken with more advantage perhaps on a subsequent occasion, thought it right to declare; that he should oppose the principle, as contrary to the conditions stipulated for the subject in the Bill of Rights. With regard to the propriety of putting down political clubs, he felt satisfied that the measure was resorted to merely in consequence of the numerous petitions which had been received on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. Nothing was more common, when a public grievance was pointed out, than to say, the public make no complaint of it. The public do, however, at last complain pretty loudly; but he did not think that their voice ought on that account to be stifled. It appeared to him, that if the Government was conscious of acting with integrity towards the people, they could not feel so much alarm at any expression of the popular voice. There were not less than 600 petitions on the floor, and he believed there never was an instance of a people displaying so much patience, good order, and obedience to the laws, under the pressure of so much distress. Their conduct took away every pretence for infringing the Constitution; and he was surprised that the absurdity of the Spencean doctrines did not render gentlemen ashamed of expressing any apprehensions from such a cause.

Lord W. Russell conceived it to be his duty, as a representative, bound to defend the purses and liberties of his constituents, to enter his protest against the present measure. He would cheerfully give to the Government all the security that was consistent with the principles of the Constitution; but he considered that the House had already, by suspending the law of Habeas Corpus and trial by jury, given them as much power as the Romans gave to a dictator, when they directed him to provide ne quid res publica detrimenti capiat.

The Hon. Mr. Law contended, that the Bill, instead of taking away the right of petition, gave the right of free discussion. He could not but observe, however, that it contained no provision to hinder meetings from being held in places very near each other on the same day. Such a clause, he thought, would be very desirable, in order to prevent combinations which might distract the attention of the magistrates, and of the civil and military force of the country. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.)

Sir John Newport said, that in passing a law of this nature, the House should have under their consideration every provision intended to be introduced, and not leave it to a period when they could not go into the discussion. The Bill was now in a very imperfect state, and, therefore, he should not pronounce his opinions on it till he saw it amended in the Committee. On this ground he gave his assent to the second reading.

Mr. Galvert then said, that not wishing to set up his own judgment against the opinions of both sides of the House, he would not insist on a division.

Sir M. W. Ridley rose and said, that he wished to have some explanation from the Attorney-General, respecting the meaning and operation of that clause in the Bill, which, as it appeared to him, would prevent persons from resorting to any rooms for the purpose of reading books, pamphlets, and the daily journals. The words of that clause, as applicable to this subject, were as follow:—"And whereas divers places have of late been used, under the pretences of being places of meeting, for the purpose of reading Books, Tracts, Pamphlets, Newspapers, or other Publications; Be it enacted, that every house, room or place, which shall be opened or used as a place of meeting for the purpose of reading books, pamphlets, newspapers, or other publications, and to which any person shall be admitted by payment of money, or by any ticket or token of any kind, delivered in consideration of money, or other valuable thing, or in consequence of paying, or giving, or having paid or given, or having agreed to pay or give, any money or other valuable thing, or where any money or other valuable thing shall be received from any person admitted, either under pretence, or for any other cause, or by means of any device or contrivance whatever, shall be deemed a disorderly house or place, unless the same shall have been previously licensed, in manner hereinafter mentioned:"—(that is to say, by a justice of the peace, for which license a fee of shall be paid); "and the person by whom such house, room, or place shall be opened or used for any of the purposes aforesaid, shall forfeit the sum of for every day or time that such house, room, or place, shall be opened or used as aforesaid, to such persons as will sue for the same, and be otherwise punished as the law directs in cases of disorderly houses; and every person furnishing or delivering any book, pamphlet, newspaper, or other publication as aforesaid; and also every person who shall pay, give, collect, or receive, or agree to pay, give, collect or receive any money, or any thing for or in respect of the admission of any person into any such house, room, or place, shall for every such offence, forfeit the sum of ." Now, as the hon. baronet read this clause, he conceived that it went to prevent persons from resorting to reading rooms and circulating libraries, for the purpose of reading newspapers and books, which would be a most unwarrantable oppression of the subject. In the town in which he lived, there was a reading room which was frequently attended by the most respectable persons; and yet, under this clause, the person who kept it, and the parties who resorted to it, (unless, indeed, it were regularly licensed, which appeared to him to be a very arbitrary mode of collecting money,) (Hear,) would be liable to be prosecuted. (Hear.) But this was not his only objection to this Bill, he objected to the preamble, which stated, "Whereas assemblies of divers persons, collected for the purpose, or under the pretence, of deliberating on public grievances, and of agreeing on petitions, complaints, remonstrances, or other addresses to the Prince Regent, or to both Houses of Parliament, have of late been made use of to serve the ends of factious and seditious persons, to the great danger and disturbance of the public peace, have produced acts of riot, tumult and disorder, and may become the means of producing confusion and calamities in the nation." Now, what was this but a libel on the whole people of England? It asserted that which was not true; for he maintained, from all that he had seen or heard on the subject, that in none of the meetings holden for the purpose of petitioning had any acts of riot, tumult, or disorder taken place. The riot in the metropolis, on which the Secret Committee had founded a great part of their Report, did not commence in Spaffields, but was committed by some disorderly persons, whose object was totally unconnected with the purposes for which meetings had been called in almost every part of the kingdom. (Hear.)

Lord Cochrane presented himself to the notice of the House, in order to read an extract from a letter which he had received from a person at Glasgow, relative to the object for which the meeting in that city had been holden, and to shew the manner in which some of the persons had been treated. The postscript stated, "that it was merely the intention of the persons assembled to devise some method for procuring parochial relief, which was not granted in that country in the same manner as in England." "The Committee of Glasgow did, in the most solemn manner, declare, that no Spencean societies had ever existed in that city; nor had they ever heard of the name of the Spenceans till they read them in the newspapers." (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) "One gentleman, however, a man of respectable character, and a useful member of society, had been seized in his own house, at one o'clock in the morning, whence he was dragged from his wife and family, and then thrown into a dungeon, where he lay on a damp floor for two nights. He was then examined, and nothing having been proved against him, he was liberated." (Hear, hear.) "Another gentleman had been treated in the same manner, and was afterwards restored to liberty." The writer then observed, that the reign of terror had commenced, and that the people were exceedingly indignant at the attempts to ensnare the unwary, which they conceived were made by the creatures of Government. (Hear.) The noble lord concluded with saying, that he understood the Lord Mayor had stated, two days ago, that he had furnished Ministers with two-thirds of the green bag. It might be very convenient for Ministers to divert the public mind from the real interests of the country, and he (lord C.) firmly believed, that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and other bills, were brought in more for that purpose than any other. It was necessary, however, that the Bill then before the House should undergo the strictest discussion before it was passed, and that reasons of a weighty nature should be given for introducing it. Motives ought not, in general, to be imputed to any person in that House; but they came with a very bad grace from those who were the protectors of corruption. (Hear.)

Mr. Baring would not object to this measure if a clear and decided case could be made out for its necessity. He conceived, however, that every gentleman in the House was as able to judge of the state of the country as every member of the Committee; and, certainly, as far as his knowledge extended, there was no occasion whatever for invading the liberties of the people. (Hear.) He had not the least doubt that some blasphemous publications had been brought before the Committee; but he could not for a moment believe that such publications prevailed throughout the country. There never was a time within his recollection or reading, when there existed a stronger religious feeling and veneration for those sacred subjects, the detestation of which seemed by the Report to be one of the grounds of these proceedings. This was a period in which enthusiasm seemed to have taken hold of the minds of men, and a disposition had sprung up in the lower classes to dive into unknowable mysteries, and to puzzle themselves with what they had better leave alone. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) As to the riot which followed the meeting at Spafelds, a very inconsiderable part of the population of the metropolis had been concerned in it; half a dozen people got down from a waggon, and very few joined them on their way to the city. With respect to the Spencean plan, he had never once heard of it till he saw the Report; and, even then, he knew so little of the founder of that sect, that he thought he had been a Mr. Spence who wrote a pamphlet a few years ago on foreign commerce. Connecting these circumstances together, he was decidedly of opinion that there had been very great exaggeration in the apprehensions of the Committee and of his Majesty's Ministers. He could not but think, that all the plot or plans, or whatever they were to be called, might have been put down, if left alone, with perfect security to the country. (Hear, hear, hear.) It did not appear that there was any intention of opposing the Bill going into a Committee: and, therefore, he should not deliver his opinions upon it at present; but he could not suffer it to pass even thus far, without stating, that it contained some provisions, which, if ultimately carried, would give Ministers a discretionary power over the most harmless intercourse of society. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. C. W. Wynn observed, the Report did not state that the Spencean societies prevailed over every part of the country. It certainly appeared, however, that the Bill extended farther than it could possibly be intended to go. He did not think it could be wished that respectable rooms and circulating libraries for reading newspapers and books should be subject to prosecution, unless they were licensed.

Lord Rancliffe said a few words in opposition to the measure, when the Bill was read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the whole House for the next day.

SEDUCTION AND TREASON BILLS.] The Army and Navy Seduction Bills, and the Bill respecting treasonable practices, were read a third time and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett moved, that the Petitions which lay on the floor, signed by nearly a million of subscribers, should be received. (There appeared to be nearly a waggon-load of petitions; they lay in a heap, and almost covered the floor of the House: there were 600 of them.)

The Speaker.—Bring them up. (A laugh.)

Sir F. Burdett then stated, that they were all to the same effect; but after the clerk had read the names of Blackburne, Derby, Huddersfield, Kingston-upon-Hull, Manchester and Salford, Bolton-le-moor, Loughborough, Melbourne, it appeared that a great proportion of the petitions were printed, upon which the Speaker informed the hon. baronet, that he must take all such back; one also was discovered to be addressed to the Prince Regent, which was likewise ordered to be returned.

Mr. Manning rose to order, and observed that when the hon. baronet knew that he had 600 petitions to present, he should have consulted the convenience of the House in ascertaining whether they were printed or no, and he trusted that the hon. baronet would be cautious for the future.

After a few words from Sir Francis Burdett,

The Speaker suggested the propriety of proceeding with the petitions some other day, to which Sir Francis acceded; and intimated, that he should then insist on the propriety of receiving printed petitions.

Sergeant Best having objected to the length and mode of signature in some of the petitions,

The Speaker observed, that every one acquainted with the proceedings of the House, knew how much business was done on the faith and confidence reposed in members; it was therefore to be expected, that no petition which had once been rejected would be presented a second time.

After some few words from Mr. Law and Sir F. Burdett,

The Speaker again suggested the propriety of adjourning to another occasion the question, that the petition do lie on the table.

A member having discovered that one whole column of signatures was in the same handwriting, and that many signatures were detached from any petition, moved the adjournment of the question, in which he was seconded by Mr. Law.

Mr. Calcraft thought it difficult to decide at a single glance that any number of signatures was in one handwriting; he extenuated the language of the petitions, and thought the signatures might have been detached by accident. He considered the proposed adjournment as inconvenient.

After a few words from the Speaker,

Sergeant Best insisted, that the sending a number of signatures in the same handwriting was a gross contempt of the House; and contended, that if the House wished to preserve to the subject the valuable right of petitioning, they ought to watch over the due and decent exercise of it.

Sir Francis Burdett explained that the signatures had been accidentally detached.

After a conversation between the Speaker and Sir C. Monk, on the subject of signing by proxy, which the Speaker declared to be inadmissible, except in the case of a party who was abroad, and had given a written authority for that purpose.

Lord Cochrane rose to defend the petitions: he knew persons in office had frequently procured signatures to petitions without a top; and as to the expressions made use of in those now before the House, he thought no rigid line should be drawn when it was considered that of the whole House, 90 members were returned by a few peers, and Lord Palmerston called to order.

Lord Cochrane said, he spoke in answer to some observations from the other side: he knew that in the borough of Ilchester one hundred houses had been pulled down, and the inhabitants sent to the poor-house.

The Speaker called the noble lord to order, and reminded him that the question was, whether the petitions should lie on the table.

Lord Binning observed, that if the hon. baronet had considered what was due to the House and himself, he would have delayed a day or two, merely to ascertain which of the petitions were printed, and which not.

The debate on the question, whether the petition should be brought up, was then adjourned till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, March 4.

The Royal Assent was given by commission to the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill, the Malt Duty and Offices' Contribution Bill, the Malta Trade Bill, and several private bills. Commissioners the Lord Chancellor, Marquis of Winchester, and Lord Melville.

Some farther evidence was heard on Bayley's Divorce Bill.

The Army Seduction Bill, and Treasonable Practices Bill, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Earl Grey presented a petition from the Burgh of Kilmarnock, praying for Retrenchment, and Parliamentary Reform, by Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage. The petition was couched in respectful language, and he therefore presented it; but friendly as he was to the principle of Reform, he trusted he need not say he was decidedly adverse to that species of Reform which the petition prayed for.—Laid on the table.

The Earl of Darnley presented a petition from the ward of Bishopsgate, praying for Retrenchment and Parliamentary Reform. He took this opportunity to state that he was decidedly adverse to the plan of Reform, or what was so called, by Annual Parliaments, and Universal Suffrage; and for this plain reason, that he was convinced such a Reform would soon inevitably lead to confusion and revolution, the entire subversion of the Constitution, and then to a military despotism. But he also believed, that it would be dangerous to resist the prayers of that mass of petitions which came from the temperate and respectable part of the community, and to refuse any Reform whatever: and he therefore expressed his wish, that this petition should not only be received, but that, according to its prayer, it should be taken into immediate and serious consideration.—Laid on the table.

Lord Holland presented a petition from a person of the name of Waters, praying the House to abolish capital punishments. (See page 173.)—The petition was laid on the table.

The King's Bench Proceedings Bill, was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, March 4.

A petition in favour of strengthening the hands of Government was presented by General Grosvenor, from Chester. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Calvert presented a petition from the borough of Southwark, which was not numerously signed, owing to want of time only. He was aware that a petition could only be considered as the petition of the subscribers, but this was brought up as the petition of Southwark. It expressed great regret at the impression made by the Report of the Committee, as well as the hope that the patience of the people would have occasioned better opinions of them: and it prayed the House to pause before they passed any other law infringing on the public liberties.

Mr. Dickenson observed, that many persons might sign petitions without understanding their contents; and that it was not always clear, when signed by a few, that they would be signed by many others, if time were given. This, he understood, was the case with respect to a petition from Bath.

Mr. Calcraft did not think the petition objectionable on such light grounds, when a meeting of 4 or 500 resolved that the deputy bailiff should sign in behalf of the borough.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir Francis Burdett presented a petition from inhabitants of the Old Artillery Ground, praying for Retrenchment and Parliamentary Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The hon. baronet then presented several other petitions to the same effect: which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Brougham presented a petition from St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, signed by 6,736 persons, among whom were the most respectable inhabitants. The petition recommended Retrenchment and Reform according to the wisdom of Parliament. A considerable obstruction had been put in the way of this petition by some of the magistrates, and particularly by some of the police magistrates, who were appointed by, and were removable by, the Government. The gentleman who endeavoured to prevent this petition was Mr. Gifford, who was probably very well known to many members of that House. He applied to the rector to obtain the refusal of the vestry to the petitioners, and used his endeavours to that end. Other agents were also employed. Unable to prevent the inhabitants from exercising the right of petitioning, recourse was had to a stratagem, by sending non-resident individuals to sign, in order afterwards to make that a ground of objection. Most of the pretended signatures of these non-residents were written by one hand, and one sheet of signatures was entirely withdrawn on that account. He felt it his duty to state these circumstances, which he was informed of through respectable channels; more particularly after the animadversion which had been made upon various petitions.—Ordered to lie on the table.

TORTURE OF A BRITISH SUBJECT.—HAYTI.]

Mr. Sharpe presented a petition from James Davison, a British subject, lately established as a merchant at Cape Henry, in the island of St. Domingo. The petitioner complained of having been imprisoned, and tortured with the thumb-screw, by Christophe's governor of Cape Henry, on a groundless charge of endeavouring to effect a revolution in favour of Pétion, the rival chief of St. Domingo. The petitioner prayed the House to take such measures as, in its wisdom, should appear necessary to redress the injury he had sustained, and to watch the rising power which had committed this outrage, the respect that is due to a British subject.

Mr. Sharpe then presented another petition from Mr. Samuel Marsom, a British merchant, residing at Cape Henry at the time of the outrage described in the former petition. He confirmed the statement of Mr. Davison, and alleged that he had been deputed by the British merchants resident in Hayti to apply to the British Government, and having received no attention from the Colonial Department, he thought it his duty to apply to Parliament.

Both petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane presented a petition for Reform from Rutherglen; and made some observations respecting a schoolmaster at Glasgow, who had been put in confinement for two days.

The Lord Advocate felt that it would be extremely improper in him to say what it was, precisely, that the magistrates had discovered concerning the persons apprehended at Glasgow. It would be injurious even to those people themselves to do so. As to what had been said about the oath taken by certain deluded or disaffected people, and as to whether it was found on any of these apprehended persons, he did not feel that it was agreeable to the spirit of British justice to make any particular statement of that description, which might possibly subject individuals to the operation of gross prejudices. He should not, however, exceed the limit of safety in stating, that parochial relief had nothing to do with these meetings.

Sir F. Burdett read an extract of a letter from Glasgow, in which it was stated, that a Government spy, who had said in a public company that the King was of no use, was not held in custody by the magistrates, because he declared before them, that he was "a loyal man." The same was the defence made by Lambick, the police-officer, when charged with cruelty to a boy who was found pulling down a hand-bill circulated by the police, abusing Mr. Hunt. This sort of declaration of loyalty appeared calculated to cover as many sins as charity. (Hear.)

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane presented petitions for Reform from Greenock, and places in the west of Scotland, which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane then said, he had some of a similar nature, and with a similar prayer, of a considerable number, which he moved might be brought up and received without being all read.

The Speaker observed, that if the number was small, not exceeding eight or nine, the House usually granted this indulgence. He had last night objected to the 600 as being too many. If the petitions varied in their terms, the rule of the House was to order them to be read separately.

Lord Cochrane then presented petitions from Kimbolton and Brady, in the Isle of Wight, praying for Reform, which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The noble lord presented another from Grooby, in Lincolnshire, praying for Reform. It stated, that the House of Commons did not, in a true or constitutional sense, represent the people; and complained that it tired the patience of the nation with debates that had no view to public interests.

Lord Castlereagh objected to its being received on the ground of the objectionable language in which it was couched.

Sir F. Burdett said the noble lord had given no reasons for its rejection. It was allowable to tell the House that it did not represent the nation, because that was the very ground on which petitions for its Reform could consistently be offered it. The words might be offensive to those who did not concur with the petitioners; but if the petitioners were not allowed to make such a statement or complaint, on what pretence could they pray for Reform?

Lord Binning was for rejecting this petition, on the ground of its containing the very phrases which caused the rejection of a former one.

Mr. Brougham denied that the expressions were the same as those used in a former petition which was rejected. When it was said that the House did not legally represent the nation, the phrase might be construed to imply, that it had not the power to make laws to bind the people; but when it was stated that the representation was not constitutional, it was merely a mode of declaring that there had been departures from the Constitution which ought to be corrected by bringing it back to its former purity. In short, it was nothing else but a way of stating the argument for Reform. He wished rather to throw open the door to the prayers of the people, than to shut it. It was much better to receive a petition couched in loose, popular, and incorrect language, where no disrespect was intended by it, than to incur the imputation of cavilling with the expressions and disregarding the complaints of the people.

Lord Binning said, that upon looking at the words of the petition, they would be found to be the same as those formerly objected to.

Mr. B. Bathurst observed, that if the House did not constitutionally represent the people, its sitting was unconstitutional, and its acts were not binding, nor could it legally impose taxes. He, therefore, would oppose the reception of the petition, as impeaching the power of the House, and denying its title to exercise its functions, particularly the important function of taxation.

Lord Cochrane contended that the House did not represent the people in a constitutional sense.

The Hon. Mr. Ward thought the objectionable words implied that the House of Commons existed against the law and the Constitution of the country. The petition had not been drawn up by simple men who were not aware of the import of their expressions, but had been penned by the same person probably that was the author of many others.

Mr. Calcraft was for receiving the petition, on the ground that the petitioners acknowledged the virtual authority of Parliament, by the very act of presenting their petition to it, although they denied its constitutional purity.

Mr. C. Wynn, in addition to the words that were now objected to, stated that the observation about the debates of the House would be sufficient to render it obnoxious.

Mr. Lambton did not see how the House could reject this petition with any regard to consistency, while it had received another couched in the same expressions. He read the words alluded to in a petition from Wick, in Yorkshire; it even went further than the present, because it alleged that the House was only a tool in the hands of a rapacious and all-grasping oligarchy of boroughmongers.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald said, that the House should make no precedent of receiving insulting petitions; and if in its indulgence, or its carelessness, it had allowed any disrespect to be offered it formerly, the circumstance of its being now pleaded as a reason for a repetition of the insult should only induce it to be more cautious in examining whatever was presented to it, and more attentive in guarding its dignity.

The petition was rejected.

Lord Cochrane presented another petition from Yorkshire, which, upon being read, was objected to by Mr. Wynn, and withdrawn. The noble lord said he had others, but as they contained similar expressions, he would not now present them.

Lord Lascelles presented a petition for Reform from the West Riding of Yorkshire.—Ordered to lie on the table.

GAME LAWS. Colonel Wood rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the 28th of Geo. II. in order that the sale of game should be made legal. He hoped by this measure to put an end to poaching, which he allowed to be an evil of great magnitude; destructive to the morals, the happiness, and industry of the British peasant. Parliament during almost every reign had been legislating on the subject of game, and had made many unjust and oppressive acts. He was fully persuaded, that as long as there was the temptation of money in this large town to procure luxuries, luxuries would be obtained. He then moved, "that leave be given to bring in a bill to repeal the said act, and to make other provisions relating to the sale of game."

Sir Charles Burrell said, if the game laws were to be altered at all, it should be by a committee of a few persons, with the assistance of some legal members. The present game laws were beneficial, inasmuch as they induced men of fortune to reside on their estates; whereas, in other countries, whole tracts of land remained uncultivated. He should certainly oppose the introduction of the bill.

Mr. George Banks contended, that the present system of the game laws contributed to the public happiness and the public good. If any alterations were to be made, he should suggest an increase of the penalty to which qualified persons were liable for buying game.

Mr. Curwen considered that the game laws, from beginning to end, were most unjust, oppressive, and tyrannical, and utterly subversive of the liberties of Englishmen. (Hear.) He would wish to see the whole done away, and every man restored to his right. If they were to be done away, it would tend to promote the quantity of game, and the sports of gentlemen who were interested in it; but if the total abolition could not be agreed upon, it would be better to make it extremely penal in the persons who would buy game.

Mr. Long Wellesley thought, that the game laws should remain untouched. There were rights of forest and rights of chase, which were very valuable, but which would be affected by any alteration. The hon. gentleman was proceeding with his observations, when cries of question became very general, and he sat down.

Sir Francis Burdett said, if any punishment were to be inflicted, it ought to be rather on those who induced others to get the game; but it would be better to make it legal to buy it.

Mr. C. W. Wynn recommended that some regular and connected system should be adopted, and that the House should not resort to temporary measures.

Colonel Wood, in reply, observed, that he did not wish to go back to those good old times of Henry VIII. (as some seemed to think them) when it was necessary to have a licence to shoot crows. It was certain, that at present pheasants were to be bought and sold in almost every poulterer's shop.—The cries of question were here renewed, when the House divided, and the numbers were,

For the motion	46
Against it	34
Majority	—12

RENEWAL OF COMMISSIONS UPON DEMISE OF THE CROWN.] Mr. Ponsonby rose, in pursuance of his notice, to call the attention of the House to the situation of persons holding offices under the Crown, but who were liable to be removed, on the demise of the Crown, unless the successor to the Crown should be pleased to continue them. The right hon. gentleman stated, that, by the 7th of William III., it was enacted, that if, on the demise of the Crown, any Parliament should be in existence, it should continue sitting for six months afterwards, unless the successor should choose to dissolve it. So, in the act of Anne, it was declared that several high offices, therein enumerated, should continue, and that the persons holding them should not be deprived of the enjoyment of them by the demise of the Crown. Now, the object of the bill which he intended to submit to the House was, to carry the principle of these two bills into effect, as to persons holding offices, civil and military, during the pleasure of the Crown. It was a circumstance in favour of this measure, that it could not be considered to be one of party feeling. (Hear.) It was impossible to say who would be the successor to his Majesty, or who were the persons that that successor might wish to employ. By the operation of the law as it now stood, many of the highest officers in the state, such as lords-lieutenant, governors and deputy governors, justices of the peace, and all persons holding commissions in the army and navy, must lose their offices on the demise of the Crown, and go through a very expensive process in having them renewed. The sole object was, therefore, that all persons holding offices during the pleasure of the Crown, should continue to hold such offices, unless the successor to the Crown should think proper to remove them; and that it should not be necessary to take out any new patents for the renewal. He would not then enter more fully into the merits of this question; but should conclude with moving, that leave be given to bring in a bill, that all persons holding offices, civil and military, during the pleasure of the Crown, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Wales, in the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, in Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, and in all foreign colonies and possessions, should continue to hold them on the demise of the Crown, unless discharged therefrom by the successor to the Crown.—Leave given.

LUNATIC POOR IN IRELAND.] Mr. Peel moved for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the state of the lunatic poor in Ireland. He stated, that there were some excellent institutions in Dublin for the reception of lunatics, and among others, the Richmond Lunatic Asylum; but they had all been so overstocked, that local accommodations were become absolutely necessary.

After a few words from Mr. Grover, the question was put, and the committee appointed.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.] The Solicitor-General proposed that the blanks should be filled up on Thursday, as he had several clauses to propose.

Sir J. Mackintosh presumed that Thursday would also be a proper time for moving amendments.

After a few words from Sir C. Monck, Lord Castlereagh, and Mr. W. Smith, the Report was brought up and the bill committed for further consideration on Thursday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, March 5.

The Earl of Shaftesbury reported from the Committee of Privileges that the claim to the Mountnorris peerage was made out.

Earl Grosvenor presented a petition from Southwark, adopted, as he stated, at a very respectable meeting, and numerous signed, praying that no more laws might be passed in restraint of the liberty of the subject.—Laid on the table.

His lordship then presented five or six other petitions in favour of Retrenchment and Reform.

The Earl of Liverpool asked, whether the noble earl had read them.

Earl Grosvenor replied, that he had, and that they appeared to him such as he might properly present. The words in some of them were rather strong, but he did not think they ought to be nicely criticised, especially at a period like the present.

The petitions were laid on the table.

SEDUCTION AND TREASONABLE PRACTICES BILLS.] The Earl of Liverpool observed, with reference to the Army and Navy Seduction Bill, and Treasonable Practices Bill, that he trusted there would be no objection to forward them one stage this day. He had understood from what had been said on a former occasion, that as to these bills there was no difference of opinion, though there might be some difference respecting the details of the Seditious Meetings Bill. If any one, however, wished to make observations on the subject of these bills, that might be done in another stage.

Earl Grosvenor understood the object of these bills to be, to strengthen the laws as they stood, and would not object to them; but had objections to the Seditious Meetings Bill.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that to the bill for extending to the Prince Regent the same security as that which had been given to the Sovereign there could be no objection. He believed also that there would be no objection made to the other; but if any of their lordships wished to make any observations respecting it, certainly that might be done in another stage of the bill.

Both bills were then read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, March 5.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved a grant of 300,000*l.* on account, for expenses of a civil nature in Great Britain, which formed no part of the ordinary charges of the list.—Agreed to.

Lord Palmerton moved for 500,000*l.* as a further sum for the expenses of the land service, with the exception of the troops in France, and in the territories of the East India Company.

—Agreed to.

Mr. Curwen hoped for great reduction of expense.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that he had no objection to the postponement of the discussion on any part of the subject of the military expenditure. He then moved a grant of 100,000*l.* towards the expenditure of the ordinance.—Agreed to.

SCARCITY IN IRELAND.] Mr. M. Fitzgerald moved an address to the Prince Regent, praying that his Royal Highness would be graciously pleased to direct an inquiry into the state of food and provisions in Ireland, for the purpose of ascertaining the propriety of suspending for a time the distilleries from grain in that country.

Mr. Peel did not consider that stopping the distilleries would throw any great supply into the market, whilst it would produce considerable political evil, and very much increase the distress of the agriculturists. Steps had been adopted for importing a quantity of American flour into Ireland, for the purpose of increasing the supply for the people, and to be mixed with flour of inferior quality, which, without such a mixture, would be useless.

Sir J. Newport was fully convinced, that the stoppage of the licensed distilleries at the present moment would produce no positive benefit.

General Ferguson wished to call the attention of Government to the state of the Highlands of Scotland, which were in a condition of extreme distress.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was ready to acknowledge the distress which had arisen out of the late unfavourable harvest, but he considered the best remedy for the evil would be, for Parliament and the Government to use their utmost endeavours to preserve the free intercourse between the different parts of the Empire. In his opinion, on former occasions, Parliament had been too ready to interfere on this subject; and the large sums which had been paid for imports of corn, had operated to encourage foreign growers at the expense of our own.

Mr. Baring agreed that all interference on the part of Government to prevent scarcities was to be deprecated, as they generally did only that which individuals would do better without them. As to the suspension of the distilleries, what he had heard of the right hon. gentleman's (Mr. Peel) speech was perfectly satisfactory in proving that distillation should not now be suspended, but he did not see why at an earlier period Ministers had not adopted that measure, considering the extraordinary distress in England and Scotland.

General Mitchell said, there was so much very inferior grain in the North of Ireland, that if distillation were prohibited, the farmers would be forced to illicit distillation in order to consume it.

Mr. C. Calvert did not understand how the grain in the hands of the distillers was rendered unfit for the purposes of human food, as had been asserted, nor why spirits could not be manufactured from sugar, if there was any necessity for stopping distillation from grain.

Mr. Peel explained, that as by malting grain was made unfit for ordinary purposes, it would be the interest of the distillers to subject their corn to that process previously to any prohibition on distillation being put in force. As for distillation from sugar, those who were acquainted with the prejudices of the Irish people were aware how much they preferred corn whiskey to sugar whiskey. It would be very difficult to get them to consume the latter. Unfortunately, even now the prejudice was strong in favour of illegal whiskey.

Mr. Calvert said, that in England less than one-fifth of the corn used in distilleries was malted.

Mr. F. Fitzgerald said, this was true also with regard to Ireland; but all grain used for that purpose which was not malted was crushed in mills, which made it unfit for any other purpose. He could state, that in Ireland, the quantity of grain unfit for any thing but distillation was very great, and that especially in the part of the country with which he was connected, the farmers had actually sold a great part of their inferior grain to distillers, though it had been argued in some publications that the grain was not used by those persons.

Mr. Baring wished to know why the distilleries had not been stopped in October last?

Mr. Peel said, that no distilleries had begun to work till December. It was to be remembered also, that the Irish Government had no power to stop the distilleries by proclamation. It might be said they should have assumed that power; but that would not have been enough, for they would have done nothing, unless they had suspended the article of the Union giving a free intercourse between England and Ireland, which they did not think themselves warranted in doing.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald then withdrew his motion.

NEW COINAGE.] Mr. Brougham, seeing the right hon. the Master of the Mint in his place, wished to move for a certain paper relating to a correspondence which he understood to have taken place between the Treasury and the Magistracy in the country, on the subject of the New Coinage. He had heard that it was of a private nature, but that it referred to the rate at which the old shillings were to be exchanged. This rate, as he was informed, was, that all shillings would be received, however worn or defaced, which were of the standard fineness; but that a new criterion had been since established. He did not think it could now be felt inconvenient to answer this question. He admired much the celerity and management with which the new coin had been distributed, although he could not help entertaining doubts with regard to the ultimate success of the measure generally. His doubts were raised principally by the difference between the value of the new coinage and the Bank tokens now circulating with them, and which was no less than the difference between 5s. 6d. and 6s. 8d., in their respective values per ounce of silver. Were it not for the failure of so many predictions as to the effects of a depreciated currency, he should be disposed to predict, that that which was of the lowest real value must soon drive the other out of circulation. The token might continue to circulate, like the note, upon credit, but the illicit coin had nothing but its value to depend on. He spoke with some diffidence, but it was not easy to see at once how the two things could be co-existent. He doubted the wisdom of undertaking so large an operation, whilst there appeared no security against a future rise in the price of silver, which might endanger the whole of the new coinage. Sir Isaac Newton, who, although not so high in office as the right hon. gentleman, was however entitled to some respect as a man of science, had held, that 2d. profit on the guinea would gradually cause it to disappear. The argument was much stronger as applied to the new silver currency, when it was considered what had been of late years the fluctuations in the price of that metal. Such dangers must always be apprehended whilst the Bank had it in their power, by a dash of the pen as it were, to raise the market above the Mint price of bullion. The sooner, therefore, they were allowed (as the phrase was) to pay their notes on demand, the greater the security to the new coinage. To come to a subject of much less importance, the execution of the signs of the coinage, it was an observation that occurred to every body, that his Majesty's head was extremely ill executed, and unlike, particularly on the larger pieces. It was observable, too, that on the reverse of the medal were to be found, in very small characters, but easily discernible with a magnifying glass, the letters W.W.P. (A laugh.) He wished to know whether there was any precedent for this, as he had not found that in the last coinage, any such letters as I.N. had been impressed. Cardinal Wolsey put a private mark on the King's coin, and it formed one of the articles of his impeachment.

Mr. W. W. Pole declared, that if there had been any such correspondence as that alluded to by the hon. and learned gentleman, he had never heard of it. There had passed within his knowledge but one letter relating to the difficulty of conducting the issue and exchange, so as to produce no hardship to the subject. With this view, it was determined to draw up secret instructions; and the observance of them had, he was happy to observe, been the means of giving universal satisfaction to the country. (Hear, hear.) He knew not whether any person had betrayed his trust in communicating them to the learned gentleman; but he certainly would not consent to furnish him with a copy. He was not aware of what he had done to expose himself to the random sarcasms of the learned gentleman; and he thought the whole of his observations, except so far as they were directed personally against him, would have been more properly made in the House last session, when the measure, which had now become an act of the Legislature, was under consideration. When the question was before the House, the dangers contemplated by the learned gentleman were foreseen, and provided against, partly by imposing a seignorage of 4s. on the pound of silver, by coining it into 66s. instead of 62s.; and also by enacting, that silver should no longer be legal tender above 40s. But a good metallic circulation must, in his opinion, have of itself a tendency to check the rise in the price of bullion. He had likewise the pleasure of informing the learned gentleman, that the Mint was now receiving gold from the Bank to be coined for the purpose of enabling them to return to cash payments. The Bank was also taking measures to recall their silver tokens; it was not, and never had been, intended to keep them running together in circulation. He could not pass by this opportunity without doing justice to the banking interest, both in London and Westminster, and in every part of the country. Without their active assistance, he sincerely believed the measure could never have been completed. The whole exchange for Scotland had been transacted at 62 stations, appointed by the Royal Bank. With regard to the learned gentleman's witticisms upon the execution of the coins, he could only say, that the best artists had been employed; that he was himself disappointed in the half-crown: but that he believed the smaller pieces were perfectly satisfactory, and equal to any former coinage. But with regard to the half-crown, he begged to say, that another head was in progress. (A laugh.) He could assure the hon. gentleman opposite, that the department to which he belonged, would continue their efforts till they succeeded in their grand work, uninfluenced by any taunts or sneers which might be cast at them from the other side. With regard to the letters W.W.P., the learned gentleman ought to know, that he was authorized by indentures to put what private marks he pleased on every piece of the new currency. The learned gentleman might make his objections, but he would not tell him what were those private signs; but with respect to the fact about Cardinal Wolsey, he would find in Snellie and Martin Folkes, that it was not the initials T.W. which were impressed on one side of the great pieces issued by the Cardinal, but the Cardinal's cap on the other, which formed the ground of the article in his impeachment.—

There were no less than twelve precedents of the same thing since the reign of Charles I.: and he could assure the learned gentleman, that whilst he had the sanction of his Sovereign, he would put such private marks on every succeeding piece of coin as he should think proper. It had been said, that the coinage had already cost half a million; but he was happy to express his belief, that this sum would cover the whole expense of distributing and exchanging it over every part of the kingdom.

Mr. Brougham said, his argument had been addressed to the Bank, rather than the Mint: and all he desired was the assurance that the former were preparing to pay their notes in metallic currency, and to withdraw their tokens from circulation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer only rose to state, that he had no knowledge of the correspondence between the treasury and the magistracy in the country, the production of which was the object of the hon. and learned gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. Curwen bore testimony to the general satisfaction which was felt at the manner in which the new coinage had been effected and brought into circulation.

After a few observations from Mr. Alderman Smith and Lord Cochrane, the question was put and negatived.

At the suggestion of Mr. Brougham, in consequence of the thinness of the House, Sir F. Burdett postponed his motion on the subject of the petitions for Reform till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, March 6.

BAYLEY'S DIVORCE.] Some further evidence was heard on the subject of Bayley's Divorce Bill. The evidence of adultery in this case, was a child born in six months and a half from a period in which there could have been access of the husband.

The Lord Chancellor said, that this was a case of great importance, as not only the divorce, but the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the child must be determined upon. He moved, that the second reading of the bill be postponed till Monday, and that the lords be summoned for that day, which was ordered accordingly.

The Army and Navy Seduction Bill, and Treasonable Practices Bill, were, on the motion of Lord Melville, committed and reported; Earl Grosvenor stating, that he had a remark to make on one of the bills, which he should defer till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, March 6.

There not being a sufficient number of members present at 4 o'clock, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 7.

The King's-Bench proceedings bill was committed.

TREASON AND SEDUCTION BILLS.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of the treason bill.

Lord Holland stated, that he had considerable objection to this, and the other bill for the more severe punishment of the offence of seducing soldiers and sailors, though he had no objection to the treason bill, in as far as it extended the provisions for the security of his Majesty to the Prince. But in cases where their lordships were enacting a law, establishing a capital punishment, they ought to apply the greatest care and attention to the object of making the words as clear and plain as possible. The bill went to make the act of 39 Geo. III., to which the present referred, perpetual; and it enacted, that it should be in all its provisions perpetual, one of these provisions being, that it should only be temporary. He was aware that the absurdity of the construction, giving perpetuity to that which was in its nature temporary, might prevent any such construction from being applied; but in cases of this importance, the law ought to be as clear and distinct as possible. There were acts of William III., and of Anne, which it appeared to be intended to be revived, and yet that was not clearly expressed. Another circumstance was, that the act of the 39 Geo. III., reserved the punishment of treason as it stood before. This bill rendered it perpetual in all its provisions; and yet it ought to be remembered, that the punishment in cases of treason had been since altered, which might create another ambiguity. But, independent of these objections to the manner of wording some parts of the bill, he had objections to the bills themselves. With respect to the seducing of the soldiers and sailors, there was surely law enough to punish such an offence, without this addition. The best alteration that could be made was, if possible, to facilitate the means of detection. The difficulty of detection was the real evil, and he could not well understand how the means of detection could be facilitated by augmenting the punishment. In a Report made in another place, relative to the traitorous practices alleged to exist, one of the means of seduction was stated to be that of the introduction of a foreign force. From what quarter did they derive that information? He could not ascertain that they had found any such scheme to be in contemplation by the Spencean Philanthropists or Union Clubs. The only quarter in which he had found any such notion broached, was in a pamphlet said to be written by a learned civilian of Oriel College, Oxford, in which it was most unjustly stated, that the object of all reformers was revolution. Then the pamphlet recommended an union of European Sovereigns against what the learned civilian called revolution; observing, that they had before joined to put down revolutionary principles in France; and the author remarked, that these attempts at Reform might thus be the means of introducing a foreign force. He presumed, therefore, that this pamphlet had been laid before the committee, and that they concluded from it, that the introduction of foreign troops was one of the plans for seduce the soldiers from their allegiance; and that it was the origin of these absurd fictions. Then as to the treason bill, his opinion was, that the act which it went to make perpetual, ought never to have existed; and he would have been much better satisfied to see a bill brought forward to repeal it. He thought that his Majesty and the Prince Regent might be satisfied with that security which Edward III. thought sufficient, and which was all that was required by William III., George I., and George II., in times of rebellion and disputed succession; but if that act were to remain on the statute-book, there was no reason against extending its provisions to the Prince Regent, though he believed in his conscience, that no additional security would be given either to the King or the Prince, by this act.

The Earl of Liverpool did not deny that the circumstances of the times were the immediate occasion of introducing these bills; but independent of these circumstances, he was clearly of opinion, that the acts ought to be made perpetual. Then, with respect to the bill for punishing the seducing of soldiers from their allegiance with death, he was satisfied that the additional severity would be attended with advantage, unless it exceeded the moral turpitude of the offence. Now, in that view, he believed it would hardly be contended that the punishment was too much for the crime to which it was affixed. It was argued, however, that the severity of the punishment would increase the difficulty of detection: but then it ought to be considered, that the object of the bill was to operate by intimidation. The crime was one which it might be difficult to prove; but, when proved, this ought to be the punishment, and the commission of the crime might be in a great measure prevented by apprehension as to the result. With respect to the treason bill, the noble lord had no objection to the extension of that security to the Prince Regent which was given to the King; but the objection was, that the law in question ought to be repealed both as to the King and the Prince. The act, however, only made that treason which, according to the current of authority and opinion, was treason before. On occasion of the trials which had been alluded to on a former night, Chief Justice Eyre, in his charge to the grand jury, and another judge in his charge to the petty jury, stated this to be treason: and it was to be presumed, that the jury had acquitted the individuals, because they thought that their proceedings did not come under the law as so stated.

But to remove all doubt, the act now to be made perpetual was passed, and therefore had a tendency to put an end to, rather than create constructive treason. But as to the inaccuracy in wording some parts of the bill, he had no objection to give his consent to the 3d reading of the bill being put off till Monday, in order to give an opportunity to remedy the defects.

The Lord Chancellor contended, that the act ought to be made perpetual upon the same principles upon which it was originally enacted. His opinion was well known, that the offence treason before; but unquestionably the acts ought to be clearly worded.

The 3d reading was accordingly postponed.

The Earl of Liverpool then moved the third reading of the bill for punishing with death the seducing of soldiers and sailors from their allegiance.

Earl Grosvenor rose to move, that the act should be continued only for a year, instead of being made perpetual. The object of the other bill appeared to be, to strengthen the existing law; but this bill went to perpetuate a sort of new treason. For this he saw no necessity whatever; and it appeared like a scandalous imputation on the soldiers and the people. The soldiers, he trusted, were not so easily to be seduced from their allegiance; and there were but few among the people who could be guilty of so heinous an offence as to attempt to seduce them. The only reason for the bill, that he could perceive, was the Spafelds flag, with the inscription, "The soldiers are our friends treat them kindly." Suppose a brother or friend were to request a soldier to attend him to a meeting for petitioning for Parliamentary Reform, Retrenchment, or the more heinous offence of removing his Majesty's Ministers, would that make him liable to the punishment of death? He concluded by moving his amendment.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

Lord Holland contended, that the words "mutinous meetings," and others in the bill or act, were too indefinite.

The Lord Chancellor proposed some amendments, to render the meaning of certain parts of the bill more definite and distinct.

These amendments were agreed to, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, March 7.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Calvert presented a petition for Reform from the parish of St. John, Horseley-down. The hon. member praised its moderation.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The Hon. R. Neville presented a petition for Reform from the freeholders, copyholders, leaseholders, and other inhabitants of the county of Berks. It did not carry its prayer for Reform to those lengths that certain wild and mischievous men demanded. If a motion were made for a committee on Reform, it would have the hon. member's concurrence.

Lord Cochrane strongly objected to the language sometimes employed in designating the reformers. Let their arguments be discussed and answered, but let not their motives be abused, nor their intentions questioned. When it was considered that Annual Parliaments were held for 200 years, or that every new session there was a new election, it did not seem just to say that those who now called for a restoration of Annual Parliaments meant mischief, and must necessarily be designing men.—The petition was then read. It prayed for representation co-extensive with direct taxation.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Charles Dundas presented a petition from the city of York, praying for Reform and Retrenchment.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Folkestone presented a petition from the town of Newbury, in Berkshire, praying for a redress of grievances, and a radical Reform in Parliament. His lordship added, that the petitioners, although few in number, were very respectable, and had adopted the prayer for radical Reform with a full knowledge that he did not agree with them in that principle.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Folkestone presented a petition from Horsham for Reform. The noble lord said, the chief magistrates of the borough had refused the petitioners the use of the Town-hall to hold their meeting.

Mr. Hurst had an objection to this petition, which was, that a number of the names attached to it were in the same handwriting.

The Speaker said, if such were the fact, the petition could not be received.

Sir F. Burdett said, it was only the fancy of the hon. member that these were the signatures of the same hand; and on such fancies a petition from the people should not be refused.

Lord Castlereagh highly disapproved of the frauds which had been practised, which had brought the right of petitioning into disgrace.

After some further observations, the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Sir F. Burdett presented a petition from the inhabitants of the town of Belfast, praying for Parliamentary Reform.

General Mitchell said, it was no more a petition from the loyal inhabitants of Belfast, than the Spafelds petition was from the loyal inhabitants of London. Such a Reform as the petitioners prayed for would lead to a Revolution.

Sir F. Burdett replied, that the gallant general had stated nothing against the petition which could have any weight. Belfast was in every way a most respectable town, and any petition coming from it deserved the most serious attention. The only kind of representation which Belfast enjoyed was that of a rotten borough; therefore nothing was more.

natural than that it should apply to the Legislature for relief from such an injury.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Sir F. Burdett also presented a petition from the joiners and carpenters, praying for Reform.

Ordered to lie on the table.

The hon. baronet then postponed the adjourned debate on the petitions for Reform until Wednesday next.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. Calcraft informed the House, that he was desired by a right hon. friend to request that his name might be struck off the list of the members of the Finance Committee, as he could not attend from ill health. His indisposition was of such a nature, that he was advised by his physicians, even if he came down to the House, to attend as little business as possible. He therefore moved, that the name of the Right Hon. George Tierney be taken off the Finance Committee. It was accordingly done, and Mr. Calcraft appointed in his stead.

POOR-RATES.] Mr. Calcraft said, he held in his hand two petitions on this subject, one from Langdon, and the other from Swanage, in Dorsetshire. The petition from Langdon states, that the parish contained 575 inhabitants, out of which number 409 received parochial relief; and the rate this year amounts to 19s. in the pound, rack-rent on those who could pay. It further stated, that every tenant, except one, in Langdon, had given notice to quit. That from Swanage stated, that there were 300 houses in that place, not one-seventh of which would be able to pay the rates, which would this year amount to one guinea in the pound! The parishes in question had had some idea of applying to the magistrates for a rate in aid on the other parishes; but it was found, on inquiry, that none of these parishes paid less than 7s. or 8s. in the pound; and that they would be utterly unable to pay more. A number of gentlemen, at the head of whom was Lord Eldon, had exerted themselves to form a fund, and to employ the labouring classes, and had materially assisted them; but he was sorry to say that fund would, in a few days, be exhausted. He should move that these petitions be referred to the Committee at present sitting on the poor-laws, which Committee he hoped would not separate till some effectual steps had been taken; the most effectual which could be taken, he thought, would be to render funded property rateable, as well as landed property. He was at a loss to conceive what greater objection there could be to the stating the amount of each public creditor's demand publicly, than there was in publicly stating the amount of the national debt.

Lord Castlereagh thought much of this evil arose from the system adopted by the farmers themselves, who of late years had been compromising between the poor's-rate and the price of labour. In many instances 10s. or more of the sum paid for poor's-rate should be paid for labour. He considered it as a bad system to reduce the price of labour beyond its fair proportion.

Mr. Calcraft agreed in part in what had fallen from the noble lord, which applied to agricultural districts. But the places from which these petitions came were not of that description. The inhabitants were principally employed in the stone trade, which had entirely failed of late, and caused the distress in question.

Mr. Curwen repeated his former arguments on this subject, and at the same time declared his conviction that the noble lord intended to meet the subject fairly.

Lord Cochrane considered the subject as most important: it was as the noble lord (Castlereagh) had said, that labour was not paid. Formerly, at Manchester, a workman received 2s. for weaving a web; now he had 7s. for the same work. His support was drawn from the poor rate. These cloths were afterwards sent to America, and there sold cheap at the expense of the land-owner in this country. If we were to carry on commerce at this rate, we had better burn all our ships, or our commerce would be our ruin, and by this time twelvemonth no land proprietor would be able to draw a shilling from his landed property. He knew but of one remedy: that was, to reduce the interest of the fundholder.

A member said, that out of 7,000,000l. paid for poor-rates in 1815, 300,000l. was spent in litigating paupers' settlements!

Sir C. Burrell wholly dissented from the doctrines of the noble lord. The fundholder had a right to his interest, under his contract with the public.

Mr. Brougham had reason to know that for some months past the wages of labourers had not been more than 4s. a week in Lancashire.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on the Poor Laws.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 10.

Further evidence was given in Bayley's divorce case, tending to shew that the child was not that of the husband. On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, this was ordered to be printed along with the other evidence, and the whole to be taken into consideration on Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 10.

GAME LAWS.] Sir E. Knatchbull moved the second reading of the Game Preservation Bill, which was read accordingly.

POLICE COMMITTEE.] The Hon. Mr. Bennett moved for the re-appointment of the Police Committee. The hon. member said, he did not anticipate any opposition, nor did he think it necessary to shew the utility of the measure.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee re-appointed, with the addition of two new names.

SCARCITY IN IRELAND.] General Mitchell presented a petition from the borough of Belfast praying for the suspension of distillation from grain. He quoted the prices of the Irish markets, both in the northern and southern districts; and gave it as his opinion, that they evinced a degree of scarcity that called for precaution. The question of revenue sunk into insignificance when compared with the importance of securing food to the people. The spirits that were necessary for the consumption of the country might be made from sugar; from that source an equal revenue might be expected.

The Hon. W. H. Quin was of opinion that much of the corn used in the distilleries could be used for no other purpose whatever, and that consequently it would be lost if distillation were suspended. It was not applicable to human food. The hon. member quoted the latest prices, for the purpose of shewing that the difference between the cheapest and the best kinds was so great, that the former could not be used as an article of subsistence.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald said, that he was still convinced that the state of provisions was such in Ireland as rendered it expedient to adopt measures of precaution, and to call for a stoppage of the distilleries. Ministers said, that it was now too late to be effectual. Why, then, was not distillation suspended earlier? (Hear.)

Mr. Marryat thought, that if we now suspended distillation, no possible harm could be done, and no responsibility was comparatively incurred: if we allowed it to proceed, the danger might be great, and the responsibility serious. (Hear.)

Mr. Knox declared his conviction, that unless some steps were taken by his Majesty's Ministers to avert the evil, Ireland would soon, in addition to the miseries of famine and pestilence, be afflicted with those of tumult and insurrection.

Sir N. Colthurst said that there were no apprehensions of famine in that part of Ireland with which he was immediately connected.

The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

NEW SOUTH WALES.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition from certain respectable settlers in New South Wales, not persons who had been sent there on account of crimes committed in this country, but actively engaged in agricultural and commercial pursuits in that colony. The petition complained of the system of government, and likewise of the harsh and oppressive conduct of the governor. It stated, that their agricultural interests were injured by the free importation of corn, and the prohibition of distillation, and that favours were shewn to American vessels which were denied to those belonging to British subjects. Some instances of the governor's arbitrary proceedings were likewise mentioned, and the petitioners prayed that the administration of the Government might no longer be intrusted to the discretion of a single individual. The hon. member, in moving that the petition do lie upon the table, expressed his wish that some provision should be made for the return of the female convicts after the term of their transportation, as he was sure the House would hear with disgust, that they had no other means than that of prostitution for procuring a passage home.

Lord Castlereagh rose only at present to say a few words for the purpose of guarding the reputation of the gallant officer (Col. Macquarie) from being prejudiced before inquiry. He had filled the office of governor of New South Wales many years: he had been brought under his (Lord C.'s) notice when at the head of the Colonial Department, solely by his personal merit: and, he believed, had fulfilled the sanguine expectations which were then formed of his competency for the due discharge of all the duties belonging to that arduous and distant station.

Mr. Bennet entirely agreed in the high character of Colonel Macquarie.—The petition was laid on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] General Fergusson presented a petition, signed by numerous respectable individuals in the town of Abaroth, praying for some improvement in the representation of Scotland. The hon. general made some remarks on the very imperfect manner in which that part of the empire was represented in Parliament; a single county in England (Cornwall) returned as many members as the whole of Scotland.

Mr. Brand concurred entirely in the opinion of his hon. friend; and declared his belief, that it was the zealous wish of the great and intelligent body of the people of Scotland, that a revision of the existing system was necessary, and that there was no ground for alarm in the meetings lately held, in order to prepare petitions for that purpose.

Mr. Boswell declared his conviction, that there was not one considerable landowner who was dissatisfied with the present system of representation, and he believed that there were very few instances of freeholders signing these petitions.

Lord A. Hamilton could not allow this opportunity to pass without saying a few words, particularly with respect to what the hon. member had stated, that all the landholders in Scotland were entitled to a vote. He must enter his protest against that assertion. The voters in that country were not commensurate with the landholders. He could not offer himself as an authority for what the people of Scotland might be satisfied with on this subject; but he would not hesitate to pronounce, that the representation of Scotland must be considered almost as a nonentity. The numbers entitled to vote bore no comparison to the population of the country. The boroughs were close, in the worst possible sense of the word.

The Lord Advocate said, that nine-tenths of the people of Scotland did not wish for any alteration whatever in the state of the representation. He had mentioned this fact on a former occasion, and would now take leave to affirm it again. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) If gentlemen doubted the truth of this, how did it happen that there was no petition on the table from the landed interest, or from corporate bodies, praying for an alteration? One or two petitions from obscure individuals did not diminish the strength of this observation; but there was no petition from any meeting of freeholders, none from the meetings of commissioners of supply, nor from the heritors of any one district. As to the petition lately presented by the hon. member (Sir R. Fergusson) from the borough of Kirkcaldy, it was not signed by one of his constituents, and he understood that a counter declaration had been Scotland, he repeated, was satisfied with the representation she had in that House. (A laugh.) It was settled by a Whig Government in 1707, when it was thought that the rights of the electors were commensurate to the situation of that country. The number of electors, particularly in the counties, instead of being diminished, had increased since the Union; indeed, in some of the counties the number of electors was now very seriously increasing. (A laugh.)

Mr. Douglas said, that the observations of the learned lord were perfectly correct; and in that part of the country to which he belonged they had serious thoughts of petitioning Parliament on this subject, that no alteration should take place. (A laugh.) He had that day received a letter from a respectable individual at Langham, stating, that a petition had been drawn up by a few low people in that town; none of the persons who subscribed it were respectable, but many of them idle, drunken, and profligate. In order, however, to make up by numbers what they wanted in character, they had proceeded to the charity school, and there obtained the signatures of all the children who could write their names. He did not impute to the noble lord, that he meant to mislead the public by such low and detestable means; but he stated this fact, in order that gentlemen might take the trouble of ascertaining whether the petitions they presented were authentic or not.

Sir R. Fergusson denied that any counter declaration had been signed to the petition he presented. To the present petition there could be no objection whatever: it was couched in mild and temperate language; but it certainly prayed for that which was so painful a subject to the learned lord and his adherents—the most rigid economy and retrenchment. (Hear.)

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that if the learned lord, when he undertook to state the sentiments of the people of Scotland on this subject, had mentioned what the actual number of voters was, it would have been much more satisfactory to the House. (Hear.)

Mr. Brougham observed, that the learned lord had taken some pains to assure the House, that nine-tenths of the people of Scotland were averse to Parliamentary Reform. It was probable it might be so; but it was very extraordinary that they should be so very anxious not to have Reform. But from whom were these petitions against Reform to come? He was afraid that they would come from those who had the elective franchise themselves. (Hear, hear.) It was almost impossible that they could come from those who did not possess that right. The learned lord had said, that the Whig Government of this country gave such a representation to the people of Scotland as they thought adapted to their property; and that the number of voters had increased. In counties, perhaps, this might be the case; but the House should recollect, that the inhabitants of Scotland were nearly doubled since the period of the Union. The elective franchise, therefore, should bear some proportion to the population of the country. As matters stood at present, a man might have a landed estate of 20,000*l.* a year in Scotland, and not have a vote, while others who had not an acre of ground might return members. (Hear.)

Lord Binning said, they had heard a great deal as to the weight due to these petitions for Parliamentary Reform: but the real fact was, most of them came from the precise family of the distressed manufacturers here, to whom that sort of panacea had been held out as a cure for all evils. They should be considered, therefore, as nothing more than a proof of distress and disaffection in the manufacturing districts. The question of Parliamentary Reform had made no way amongst the best educated people of Scotland. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.)

The petition was then brought up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Sir R. Fergusson presented a similar petition from Brechin.

Mr. Curzon could not suffer this opportunity to pass without stating what he believed to be strictly the fact—that in the county of York there were 60,000 freeholders, while in Scotland there were not above 2,000. (Hear.) He did not profess to know what the feelings of the great body of the people of Scotland might be on this subject, but it would be a most singular occurrence if they should petition the House against a Reform. He could not believe that they would adopt such an extraordinary proceeding until he actually saw the petitions on the table. (Hear.)

Mr. Brand presented a similar petition from Montrose.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the army estimates, the ordnance estimates, the exchequer bills' account, and also the treaty of 1815, respecting the pay of the British army in France, be referred to the committee of finance.

Lord Palmerston then proposed, that the number and charge of the land forces should be taken for six months, from the 25th December, 1816, to the 24th June, 1817, in order to enable him to bring in the Mutiny Bill. The committee to whom these matters were referred would probably make a report of them, and therefore, the discussion should be postponed till after Easter, when the House would have an opportunity of considering the details. All that he now required of them was, that provision might be made for the service till after Easter. The general bearing of the estimates was, that a considerable reduction had been made. The difference of charge between this year and last was 2,163,000*l.* As to the numbers, last year they rated 196,000 men, including the army in France, and the regiments employed in India; this year the number to be rated was 140,000, including officers and men. The changes to be made, and the number of men to be disbanded, would leave a reduction of 26,176 rank and file; to which was to be added a farther reduction of 4,800 men, who would be called home from our contingent army of occupation in France, at the beginning of April; so that the total reduction of rank and file would amount to 30,976 men. He should therefore move, that 121,035 men, including the army in France, and the regiments in India, be voted for six months, from the 25th of December, 1816, to the 24th of June, 1817.

Mr. Calcraft said, he was not then prepared to enter into the subject in detail; but, after the committee had made their report, the House would be able to ascertain what was intended to be done by Government. What he understood was, that they were then only called upon to consent to the numbers up to the 24th of June.

Mr. Curwen, trusting that the committee above stairs would recommend a farther reduction of our enormous military establishment, would abstain from any observations till he saw the Report. He was decidedly of opinion, that all the retrenchments which had been made were totally inadequate to the situation of the country. (Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, it would be better to reserve any arguments till the House proceeded to the discussion after Easter. He should now merely state, that the 26,176 rank and file included reliefs to foreign garrisons.

Mr. Peel, in answer to a question respecting the forces in Ireland, said, that an assimilation had taken place in the services of the two countries, and a considerable saving had been made in the Irish regiments.

The number of men being voted,

Lord Palmerston next moved, that a further sum of 237,600*l.* be granted for the supply in England, and 438,000*l.* for Ireland. The sum for troops intended to be reduced on the British establishment, would be 163,600*l.* and on the Irish establishment 16,700*l.* These sums being agreed to,

Lord Palmerston then moved, that the sum of 37,600*l.* should be voted for six months, at a calculation of 3*l.* a man for the yeomanry corps in England. He observed, there had never been any question as to the utility of this force; the events of the last six months had shewn the absolute necessity of keeping it in an efficient state; and he was happy to say, that these corps had on all occasions conducted themselves in such a manner as fully entitled them to the consideration of that House, and to the thanks of the nation at large. (Hear.)

Sir J. C. Hippisley praised the conduct of the yeomanry cavalry of Somersetshire. On two occasions, a requisition being made at seven in the evening, they had assembled to the number of 400 by nine the next morning, from a district of 40 miles in extent, and had marched 24 miles to Bristol in very inclement weather. The individuals of the present corps were not rich, and he thought that 4*l.* a man would not be too much.

Lord Castlereagh considered the testimony of the hon. baronet as not beyond the merits of the corps: his Majesty's Ministers had the highest sense of its importance; the civil power could not be supported without so constitutional a body; and had it not been for this, Ministers could not have come to Parliament with estimates so low. He hoped the testimony given would animate the services of the body, for which Parliament would no doubt hold out an adequate reward; but those services were less heavy now than in time of war, and he thought 3*l.* a man sufficient to carry it on.

Mr. Curwen doubted whether the corps would be rendered more efficient by the grant of war pay; but, if the regular estimates were to be reduced by the employment of this force, every one must offer his services to strengthen a body so constitutional.

Mr. Courtenay bore testimony to the merits of the light horse volunteers, and thought them a very constitutional force.

Mr. Keck, considering the description of persons composing these forces, thought that 4*l.* was not too large a remuneration.

After a few words from Mr. Shiffnar,

Mr. W. Wynn thought it impossible to procure the adequate service on the scale of last year's establishment. He had considered 3*l.* sufficient; but after witnessing the situation of the farmers, he deemed it unreasonable that they should now serve at their own expense. He suggested the propriety of allowing pay to officers, as those who held commissions were qualified for the local militia; and the object was inconsiderable, in a pecuniary point of view, if 4*l.* a man should be granted, besides something on days of muster.

Mr. Calcraft asked, whether the additional grant of 1*l.* a man, amounting altogether to 17,000*l.* only, would not be advisable, to satisfy the corps that they did not give up their time in vain. He was extremely glad to hear the eulogium that had been pronounced on this body of men; the more so, as an army of 70,000 regular troops was not warranted in time of peace. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Baring doubted whether the appearance of pecuniary compensation (for it was but an appearance) might not lower the character of the service. In Paris a very efficient corps of 40,000 national guards, whose duty was very laborious, received not one sixpence compensation; and yet it was a favourite service, and the men had a pride in not receiving pay.

Mr. Robinson observed, that the sum proposed was not for a compensation, but for equipment; the expense of which was such, that small farmers and shopkeepers could not afford it; the other sum, might, perhaps, be deemed a remuneration, but a very inadequate one, though something was certainly necessary; for the corps he belonged to had been out ten days, and marched to a distance of 60 miles, and he thought there could be no degradation in being somewhat indemnified for such a journey.

Mr. Baring disclaimed any idea of imputing a degradation in the receipt of pay.

The following sums were then voted for 182 days, from December 25, 1816, to June 24, 1817:—

For defraying the expenses of volunteer cavalry	£37,500	0
Ditto for Ireland	15,682	10
Chelsea Hospital	25,500	0
In-pensioners of Kilmainham Hospital	8,300	0
Out-pensioners of Chelsea	393,200	0
Ditto of Kilmainham	82,700	0

FRENCH PAYMENT.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after reminding the House that by the treaty of peace a sum of 50 millions of francs was to be paid by France, said, he was to apply for an authority from the House for the application of that sum. The regular payment of last year had enabled Government to save a considerable sum; and the military chests of the two armies were so amply provided, that no call would be made before the end of the year. It was with pleasure, therefore, he called on the House for the payment of 25 million of francs to the army under the Duke of Wellington.

On the question being put,

Mr. Curwen asked, whether the French Government were only to find pay for the troops, or clothing and provisions also.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that the whole was to be found, clothing, feeding, pay, ordinaries, and extraordinaries.

Mr. Curwen expressed his satisfaction, when

Mr. Baring took the opportunity of making some observations on certain operations in which he, with others, had been concerned: he should always pursue what he deemed to be right, and express his opinions unswayed by clamour or faction; but a great clamour had been raised on the subject of a contribution by way of loan, which had been made to France from various parts of the Continent as well as England, though it was this very contribution which had enabled the French Government to fulfil its engagements with punctuality. Undoubtedly, in all his operations, he should take care to engage in that might be prejudicial to the interests of this country; but he considered the transaction in question to have taken place, not injuriously to this country, but for a truly British object. It had been complained, that the specie of the country would be drained away, but the operation was never likely to produce any great effect this way; and as the whole was now finished, nothing more could be dreaded on this ground. A noble person, of great authority, who chose to instruct the world on subjects of this nature every three or four months, had lately advanced doctrines so absurd, that they hardly admitted of an answer. He had complained that the operation in question had sent money out of the country. Why, what did merchants always do but send money out of the country? The noble author had conceived, that because mechanics had been prevented from exporting their tools, merchants must be prevented from making the most of their money; this, however, could never be prevented; and it was for the interest of a mercantile country, that it never should be prevented. The operation in question had, he was certain, been productive of most beneficial effects to this country.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after explaining that the French Government paid our army only in the same proportion as foreign troops, and that the difference between the amount of foreign and British pay would be made up by this country, bore testimony to the honour and candour of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Baring) in the operation he had alluded to; he had given his Majesty's Ministers early information concerning the nature of the transaction, which he had offered entirely to relinquish if they deemed it injurious to the interest of the country. Government had thought it their duty to state, that so far from considering the operation as likely to be prejudicial to Great Britain, they thought it highly beneficial, as contributing to the tranquillity of Europe, by enabling the French Government to fulfil all its engagements.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that a sum of 5,152,000*l.* be granted to make good outstanding Exchequer Bills. He stated, that, at the end of the war, the amount outstanding had been 39,000,000*l.*; and at the end of a year from that time, they had been reduced to 19,000,000*l.*; that they now amounted to about 12,000,000*l.*, but a great proportion of these were charged on adequate funds.

A conversation then ensued between Mr. Ponsonby, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Bennet; when the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the floating debt to amount to 51,000,000*l.*, but that the public had been saved 600,000*l.* by successive reductions of the rate of interest on Exchequer Bills.

To a question from Mr. Baring,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer answered, that preparations were making for removing the difficulties in the currency of Ireland; but, if English currency were introduced, a shilling English would be still charged where a shilling Irish was now demanded.

Mr. Ponsonby observed the taxes were always paid in English currency.

1,680,000*l.* were then voted for the discharge of Irish Exchequer Bills, and the House resumed.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.] On the order of the day for the further consideration of the Report of this Bill, the House resolved into a committee, when several verbal amendments were proposed, and agreed to without discussion.

On the clause inflicting the punishment of death on such persons as did not disperse within one hour after being ordered so to do by a magistrate,

Mr. Gurney rose, and objected to the infliction of so great a penalty.

The Attorney-General said, that the object of this clause was to prevent the meeting of tumultuous assemblies, and to disperse them when they met. The clause would operate as a preventive, and it therefore was not likely that the actual infliction of the punishment it enacted would ever take place. There had been no instance of any punishment under the act similar to the present bill, which passed at a former crisis, nor under the riot act. The apprehension of punishment had prevented the offence; but how could it be expected that seditious meetings could be dispersed, if, after an hour's notice given by a magistrate, it should still be necessary to enter into par lance with the multitude? It was necessary to have a definite penalty specified, in order that the parties might know what would be the consequence of their continuing longer together; and the severity of the punishment would be a security against the violation of the law.

Sir James Mackintosh considered the argument of the learned gentleman as one of a very singular kind. He had insisted on the necessity of punishing persons offending against the law, as if his hon. friend, who had opposed the clause, had maintained that there should be no punishment. The question was, whether the punishment of death was the proper punishment for the offence. The hon. and learned gentleman had stated, that there had been no instances of punishment under the similar clauses in the riot act, and the act of 1795, which, he believed, was the fact; but if there had been no cases of punishment, the reason to be inferred was, that there had been no occurrence of the offence. The multiplication of unnecessary statutes, and the enacting of penalties too severe in proportion to the offence, only tended to weaken and degrade the authority of the law. The order of the magistrate to disperse, it was supposed, might be disobeyed. That disobedience would either bring the parties offending within the riot act, or it would not. If it brought them within it, then this clause was useless; for what necessity could there be for loading the statute book with sanguinary enactments? If it did not bring the parties within the riot act, then this bill went farther than that act, by punishing a less offence with equal severity. He would now ask the committee whether they were prepared to enact a law more severe than the most sanguinary of the criminal code of this or of any other country, namely, the riot act?—a law which nothing could excuse but the peculiarly difficult circumstances of the period in which it was passed. Unless he received a satisfactory answer, he would propose to leave out the words “inflicting death without benefit of clergy,” in order to substitute the punishment of “transportation for seven years.”

The Solicitor-General saw no reason for this amendment. The object of the present bill was to prevent assembling at all, except under the sanction of lawful functionaries, as he might call the magistrates, who were to superintend such meetings; and the clause in question gave to magistrates authority to disperse meetings so assembled, though there might be no actual riot or tumult. The House would bear in mind that this bill was not proposed to be permanent, like the riot act, but to be passed to remedy a temporary evil. The offence was not one for which any reasonable excuse could be offered. It was not one committed on a sudden impulse of passion, or inadvertently. The penalty did not attach, unless the persons assembled should continue together one hour after proclamation made by a magistrate for their dispersion. Now, unless assembled for some other purpose than passing resolutions, or agreeing to petitions, it was not probable that any individuals would resist the order to disperse. This was the effect he anticipated, and consequently he expected that the punishment enacted never would be inflicted. He was far from wishing for sanguinary laws, but he was convinced that the effect of the present act would be greatly weakened were any alteration to be made in the clause under consideration. Many persons, he was persuaded, would risk the staying together, if the punishment were only transportation, who would not venture to resist the law if they knew that such resistance made them liable to suffer death.

Mr. Barclay wished to know whether it was meant to assert, that when proclamation had been made under the riot act, it had always happened that the persons assembled dispersed in due time, and returned to their homes? For his part he believed the contrary was very frequently the case. There having been no punishment under the law, was no proof the offence had not occurred. In his opinion, the severity of the punishment had prevented prosecutions.

Mr. W. Smith had been of opinion, that the hon. and learned gentleman, (the Solicitor-General) was one of the last men in the country who would lend his support to the enactment of sanguinary laws; and gave him full credit for the humanity of his intention in that respect.—He believed, however, that on the present occasion, the hon. and learned gentleman had suffered his understanding to be misled. Did he consider where his argument would stop? If deliberation were to be the criterion for inflicting the penalty proposed in the present case, what other crime deliberately committed ought not to be punished with death? The learned gentleman was of opinion, that, if the amendment which had been suggested were adopted, the persons improperly assembled would persist in staying together; but he, on the contrary, thought their obedience would be better secured by their conviction that punishment would follow their offence: for, as had been well observed by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, the punishment of death, enacted by the riot act, appeared so severe in comparison with the crime, that the law had never been enforced. Had torture remained the law of this country, every argument which had been used by the learned gentleman in support of this clause, would apply with equal force in favour of that horrible practice. Suppose a number of persons assembled together, deliberating without any disorder, should, on receiving notice from a magistrate to disperse, venture to continue their deliberation, or to debate whether they ought instantly to disperse, and it should happen that they remained together some moments more than the limited hour, every man so assembled would, in that case, be liable to the punishment of death. This was a case which might happen. There was a great distinction with respect to the riot act. In the case of proclamation under it, there was an actual breach of the peace; and if resistance took place, immediate bloodshed would follow; but this was not the case under the present bill. He did not state this with the view of defending the riot act, but to shew the difference between the two measures. He hoped his hon. friend would move the amendment he had suggested.

Sir J. C. Hippisley said, it was now a century since the riot act had passed, and it had proved of the greatest advantage to the State. He had recently had personal experience of its utility. In the course of last week he had felt it to be his duty to read the riot act to an assembly which, thought not actually riotous and tumultuous at the time, had riotous objects in view. Had the act been less penal, he was convinced he should not have had sufficient influence to cause the dispersion of that assembly. He was perfectly confident, that it was only by his stating to the people the high penalties to which they would expose themselves if they continued together, that he prevailed on them to separate. If the punishment under the riot act had been transportation, he certainly should not have succeeded. With regard to the difference between the present measure and the riot act, the important difference with regard to the number allowed to continue together had not been noticed. Under the riot act the number was twelve, but by the bill now under consideration, it was fifty. He would vote for the higher penalty, as he considered it necessary for the peace of the country.

Mr. Wynn contended, that on every analogy to the laws of England, and to general justice, the penalty for not dispersing ought to be the highest inflicted by the law; for the offence was actual rebellion. He declared he would vote for the clause as it stood, being convinced that the punishment was not disproportionate to the crime.

Sir J. Mackintosh agreed with his hon. friend, that such a punishment could only be justified on the ground of its being applied to rebellion; but he contended that the offence was not one of that description. When the punishment of death was inflicted under the riot act, it was for actual violence and resistance; but here it was proposed to enact the same punishment for the mere non-compliance with the order of a magistrate. A century ago, it had been thought fit to punish resistance to a magistrate with death; but he called upon any hon. gentleman to shew an instance in which the law of England had made non-compliance with the order of a magistrate an offence punishable with death. He now moved, that the words "shall suffer death as in case of felony, without benefit of clergy," should be left out, and the words, "shall suffer transportation for the term of 7 years," inserted in their stead.

Lord Castlereagh rose to oppose the amendment. Many gentlemen had appeared disposed to seize upon the present opportunity to discuss the abstract question of crimes and punishments, but into that branch of the subject he should not enter. With regard to the riot act, to which hon. gentlemen had so strongly objected, he was of opinion with his hon. friend near him, that there was not on the statute book a law which had been more advantageous to the country.—The question was not whether the principle of the riot act was applied to the present bill, but whether there was a necessity for the measure. There was this difference between the two laws, that the riot act was applicable to tumult which had commenced, or was intended; whereas the present bill was intended, not merely to stop the incipient but apprehended riot. The hon. baronet (Sir J. C. Hippisley) had stated to the House, that he had dispersed persons because he knew they had assembled for a riotous purpose. The operation of the riot act was not, therefore, merely confined to actual riot. He would contend, that whenever resistance should be made to the order of a magistrate under this act, there would be such an opposition to the law as constituted rebellion: and he would ask, whether it was more prudent, by mitigating the penalty, to invite the people to make resistance, or to arm the magistrates with that precautionary authority, which would enable them to preserve the peace? If the two laws, the riot act and the present bill, were allowed to go into concurrent operation with different penalties, the result of that operation would be the greatest inconsistencies. Suppose in the same field one magistrate should order the people to disperse, under pain of transportation, and in another part of the same field the riot act should be read, it would be impossible for the persons assembled to know to which penalty they were exposing themselves. He could conceive nothing worse than to leave any doubt on this subject, and therefore thought that the House ought to be guided by the principle of the riot act. He was confident that the amendment would not be adopted unless it were determined that there should be a complete doubt raised as to the situation in which persons assembled in opposition to the act should stand.

Mr. John Smith did not recollect the riots in 1780, but had heard much of the burning of houses, and the other mischiefs they occasioned. He felt inclined to think, that the punishment of transportation was calculated to deter rioters from offences. He had observed, in cases where the punishment of death was enacted for an offence comparatively slight, that it occasioned insuperable difficulties in the way of punishing an offender. He knew of no such capital sentence having, in such cases, been carried into execution.

The Attorney-General thought the arguments for the objection vague. His learned friend had spoken of mere non-obedience to the law; but what was the distinction to be drawn between a mere non-obedience to the law, and a resistance to it? It was to be particularly considered how the clause applied to meetings originally assembled illegally, and not called by the notice and signatures of seven householders. The magistrates were authorized to disperse an improper meeting; but was the meeting to be allowed to doubt and debate on the legal power of the magistracy, to oppose the legislature, and to remain in deliberation as to what they thought fit to do? He had a high opinion of his learned friends' legal knowledge; but he thought there would be great danger if people were to entertain doubts respecting a law.

Mr. W. Smith thought transportation sufficient.

Mr. Wynn regretted that riots were not sooner stopped, but it was the riot act that enabled the military to enter and interfere. If a meeting were illegal in its origin, the non-compliance of the people with the magistrate's request and orders, was a violation of the laws. To remain together when ordered legally to disperse, was resistance and rebellion against the law.

Mr. Sergeant Bur observed, that, according to the riot act, a riotous disposition should appear to the magistracy; but if the mob did not disperse within the prescribed time, punishment might follow. That had lasted since George I., about a century. Why should the clause for capital punishment be deemed unnecessary, when it was enacted, not only by that act, but by a subsequent one? It had been found by experience, that dangerous crimes were prevented by holding out the threats of the severest punishments.

Mr. Smyth said, that when two sorts of punishment were proposed, both of them apparently effectual for the object, he should prefer the one that was least severe.

The Committee then divided on Sir J. Mackintosh's amendment:

Noes, 70 | Ayes, 26 | Majority against it, 44.

Sir J. Mackintosh said, he had another amendment to propose. To various parts of the bill, concerning the power of magistrates, he did not object; especially when persons were attempting to excite resistance or disaffection to his Majesty, or his Majesty's Government, strictly speaking. All such efforts, and all writings of that nature, he considered inexcusable; because they tended most dangerously to transfer the constitutional responsibility of the Ministers to the Sovereign himself. He held, with all eminent writers on the liberty of the press, that private security should be attended to, without which society would scarcely be tolerable. He had, however, a strong objection to one clause which spoke of hatred to the Government, and not simply of the King's Government, and the Constitution of the realm. The authors of the bill surely could not mean to apply the word "Government" in a sense in which it might be confused with the administration of the day, the liberty of canvassing whose conduct was the sacred birth-right of the people. The word "Government," in the way it was inserted in the act, he considered either mischievous or useless. Was it to be distinguished from the words "Constitution," or "government by King, Lords, and Commons," which last mode of expression he valued deeply? The word "Constitution" was sufficient. In the present session many petitions had been received against the acts both of the Ministers and of that House, when there appeared no studied insult in them. He wished, therefore, to let the clause have a full effect, but not to leave the magistrates an improper discretion. He therefore moved, that the word "Constitution" should be used, and the word "Government" omitted.

The Solicitor-General objected to this, as Government was a word constantly used in all indictments for sedition and treason, and insurrection, and one which every lawyer well understood. Speaking, therefore, as a lawyer, he would say, that he should prefer the word "Government" to the word "Constitution." His learned friend did only justice to Ministry, when he supposed that they meant not to confuse Government with Administration. "Government" was clear legal language.

Mr. Wynn observed, that by Government must be understood the Government by King, Lords, and Commons, as established by law. It would be advisable that a magistrate should receive and notify a regular legal notice of a meeting before it was held, which would prevent many improprieties; and, if the magistrates acted wrongly, they would, he apprehended, be liable to answer for it before the Court of King's-bench.

Sir J. Mackintosh said, he understood sufficiently the legal meaning of the word "Government," as applied to cases of treason and rebellion; but it required more consideration, as applied to merely seditious words. To avoid errors, it was better to speak of the Constitution of Government, or of the King's Government.

Mr. W. Smith made two objections to the clause: first, he thought it improper to lodge so large a discretion in one magistrate alone; and secondly, he conceived that, from the latitude of expression adopted in this clause, a magistrate might think himself authorised to disperse a meeting, whose discussions were perfectly constitutional. He would illustrate his meaning by referring to a report made in another place: that report spoke of some societies called Union Clubs, and described them as "professing the object of Parliamentary Reform, but, under those words, understanding, Universal Suffrage, and Annual Parliaments, projects which evidently involve, not any qualified or partial change but a total subversion of the British Constitution." Now he (Mr. W. Smith) had no hesitation in saying, that he looked upon all such schemes as wild and impracticable; and even if they were practicable, he should consider them as injudicious alterations, and no Reform; but at the same time he did not hold himself bound to bow to the opinion of those who said that they were totally subversive of the British Constitution. He knew, indeed, that there were some very high authorities who thought very differently, and who maintained such doctrines to be perfectly constitutional, instead of being destructive of the Constitution: yet a magistrate might, either from ignorance or prejudice, take it into his head to believe that such opinions had a tendency to sedition, and might, on such a belief, dissolve an assembly whose proceedings were perfectly legal.

Lord Castlereagh.—The argument of the hon gentleman would destroy the bill altogether. Some discretion must necessarily be lodged with the magistrate. The rule on which he was to act was, not that he should disperse an assembly regularly convened, or whose discussions were conducted in a constitutional way, although the debate might be intemperate, or even disrespectful; he was only justified in proceeding to an exercise of his power, where there was an avowed object of any speaker to excite the multitude to sedition and rebellion. The magistrate, even in this case, would act under a legal responsibility; and a jury of his country would afterwards have to decide on the propriety of his conduct and motives. Unless the magistrates were armed with such a power, the country would at once be given up to the consequences of those inflammatory harangues, which might be made at such meetings. The only meeting put under the law was one whose object was to excite rebellion against the State. There was no reason to suppose that the magistrate would escape his liability, if he should abuse his power; there would always be at such meetings sufficient persons to watch him, and who would afterwards detail his conduct to the jury which might try him. In fact, it might be said that this Bill would in many respects cause more inconvenience to the magistrates than to the multitude assembled.

Mr. W. Smith replied, that the responsibility of the magistrate was more nominal than real: for it was well known, that if he had acted from weakness or error in judgment, he would not be liable; corrupt motive must be proved; and such corruption was not likely to exist, or if it existed, was not easy to be proved.

The Hon. Mr. Lyttelton agreed with the member for Cambridge, that the punishment of transportation was likely to be quite as efficacious as the punishment of death. He objected also to the words "and Government," as coupled with the word "Constitution," because he thought them liable to popular misapprehension. From habitual looseness of expression, both in and out of the House, the word "Government" was generally supposed to mean the "Administration." And a magistrate might, from pique or ignorance think proper to arrest a man who in fact was not attacking the Constitution of the country, but merely the existing Administration.

Mr. B. Bathurst thought that it was impossible for any persons (especially magistrates) to be so ignorant as to suppose that the words "the Government as by law established," could possibly mean the Administration of the day. At any rate such a mistake in a magistrate would subject him to an action: and as a discretion must be lodged somewhere, he did not see where it could be better lodged than in a person who would be answerable for any abuse of this power before a jury of his country.

Lord Castlereagh said, it was a mistake to suppose that the magistrate was empowered by these clauses to disperse a meeting regularly constituted: his duty was merely to arrest any particular person whose speech was inciting the multitude to rebellion.

Mr. Lyttelton put the case of a meeting, which, though not regularly called by the sheriff, might consist of persons exceedingly respectable.

Lord Castlereagh repeated, that a meeting regularly convened at the requisition of 7 householders, could not at once be dissolved by a magistrate: any individual holding seditious or treasonable language might be arrested; and if the meeting obstructed the arrest of such person, then it became tainted; and then, and then only, the magistrate had the power to dissolve it.

Mr. W. Wynn thought that in some cases it would be better to hold to bail the seven persons who might lend their names to an inflammatory or seditious notice.

Mr. W. Smith, in order to shew that a magistrate might, from error, think it his duty to dissolve even the most constitutional meeting, referred to a recent case which he said had occurred in Cornwall. A requisition had been sent to the High Sheriff of that county, desiring him to call a meeting. The High Sheriff refused, and gave certain reasons for such refusal. A meeting was therefore held without his aid, and certain resolutions were passed. The persons assembled were respectable, and their resolutions constitutional. Now, it was highly probable that this Sheriff would, if the Bill now under discussion had been in force, have thought it his duty to disperse that meeting; and might have argued on the same grounds as he had stated in his answer to the requisition—that the doctrines there maintained brought the Government into hatred and contempt. The noble lord's construction of the clause was liberal; but would a court of justice construe it in the same way? The learned gentlemen knew very well that the Court would look merely to the language of the statute, and would not refer to the speech of any gentleman of that House for its proper interpretation. As to the words, "Government and Constitution," as it seemed to be admitted that they meant the same thing, one of them would be sufficient.

The Attorney-General supported the construction laid down by Lord Castlereagh, and observed, with respect to the suggestion of Mr. Wynn, that doubtless persons might be held to bail for a seditious notice; yet as the meeting might, notwithstanding, be held, it was fit that a power should be lodged with a magistrate to watch over and check its proceedings.

After a few words from Mr. Sergeant Best and Lord Castlereagh, the clause was carried; the amendment for leaving out the words "and Government" being negatived; as also an amendment by Mr. W. Smith for substituting the words "two or more justices," instead of "one or more justices."

On the reading of the next clause for apprehending persons who offended as before described, Sir S. Romilly proposed to leave out this clause altogether. He wished to know how the learned gent. opposite, who had paid so much attention to this Act, could explain the operation of this clause. Dreadful penalties attached to persons not dispersing, or who obstructed the arrest of any person by the magistrate. Now, if it should turn out that the magistrate had acted wrong, had arrested a person for no sufficient cause, would this error of the magistrate be a good plea for a person to be tried for obstructing, or for not dispersing? Or would the penalties still remain, and thus be made to depend on the bare opinion of a magistrate, and that possibly, an erroneous one?

The Attorney-General conceived that the clause was sufficiently explicit. If a man should make any treasonable proposition, he was to be seized, and not otherwise; if the meeting adopted the treason by obstructing the arrest of such a person, it was to be dispersed, and not otherwise.

The Solicitor-General said, that a magistrate would by this clause have the power which he possessed in every other case, with this difference, that he would act on what he heard as well as on what he saw. He was in the legal predicament of a constable or magistrate, acting "upon the view." He was also responsible for any abuse or misapplication of his power. The learned gentleman concluded his few observations by apologizing to the House for detaining them.

Sir S. Romilly thought no apology to the Committee necessary in a question of such extreme importance, in which the lives of many of the King's most loyal subjects were involved. The clause before the Committee pretended to give certain privileges to assemblies convened by seven householders; but under the construction now put upon it, he had not the least difficulty in asserting, that it would be far better that the clause should be expunged, since some officious magistrates might only make it a pretence for denouncing the most peaceable and constitutional meetings, and arresting all those who took part in the discussion. (Hear, hear.) The clause, as at present framed and understood, was rather to occasion riot and confusion, than to prevent sedition and rebellion. The most important rights might be invaded, if it were not amended. Suppose, for instance, at an assembly legally convened, a gentleman should state, that it was a mockery upon the Constitution that Old Sarum should have as many representatives as Westminster, some justice of the peace might think that, as by the law and constitution, Old Sarum was allowed that privilege, it was illegal and seditious to assert that it was a mockery, and the result might be the dispersion of the meeting. The whole representation of Scotland was in his (Sir S. R.'s) opinion no less a mockery; and yet if that opinion were stated out of doors, any magistrate might step in with his constables, arrest the individual, and dissolve the meeting. This pretended privilege on the signature of seven householders was nothing more nor less than an allurement to mischief.

Mr. Harvey supported the clause.

Sir M. W. Ridley opposed it.

Mr. Sergeant Best contended, that the object the clause had in view was not the mere words spoken, but the intention with which they were uttered.

Sir S. Romilly observed, that it would indeed be giving a wide discretion to a country magistrate, if he were required to judge not only of the tendency of the words actually delivered, but of the secret intention of the party: if so, however innocent might be the language of any man, his motive was to be judged by a review of his previous political conduct through life: and if, unluckily, it did not happen to please the magistrate, he might immediately throw him into prison. (Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, that no power was here given that a magistrate did not enjoy on other occasions: he was to exercise nothing more than his ordinary functions under this bill.

Sir S. Romilly.—If what the noble lord asserted were true, the clause and the bill were completely useless.

The Committee then divided:

For the clause 43 | Against it 16—Majority 27

The next clause upon which any discussion arose, was that in which places for lectures or debates were declared disorderly unless licensed.

Sir S. Romilly proposed to leave out the words "and on any subject whatever:" by which lectures upon chemistry, astronomy, anatomy, or any other science, would be prevented.

Sir J. Mackintosh suggested, that the insertion of the words, "and on any subject whatever connected with the Government and Constitution, as by law established," would remedy the defect.

Mr. Sergeant Best thought it better, that particular institutions, devoted solely to scientific pursuits, should be excepted afterwards, but that the clause should be general.

Sir S. Romilly reprobated the indignity offered to science, by putting it on a level with ale-houses and gin-shops, by requiring that places for its promotion should be licensed: these new licenses might in time be as much abused as those granted to publicans.

Lord Castlereagh appealed to the hon. and learned gent. whether he really believed, that magistrates would wantonly break into the lecture rooms of scientific institutions: the intention of the general words was, to prevent subterfuges by pretences of lectures upon ancient history, &c. which were, in truth, nothing but harangues of sedition and treason. He could see no objection to the licensing of places really used for scientific discourses.

Sir J. Mackintosh proposed, that the amendment of Sir S. Romilly should be postponed, until the Committee arrived at the clause for excepting from the operation of the Bill the two Universities, the Inns of Court, and Gresham College, but it was not agreed to: and the question being put, the amendment was negatived.

When the Chairman reached the clause above referred to, Sir J. Mackintosh moved the insertion of these words, "that the Act shall not apply to any lectures really and bonâ fide limited to science, learning, or the arts." He apprehended that these words would exclude all moral, political, and theological discussions; the most important branches of human knowledge, all improvements in which Ministers were disposed to obstruct. He also proposed an amendment, excepting the East India College from the operation of the Bill.

Mr. B. Bathurst objected to the amendment, as opening a door for spreading dangerous doctrines, under the pretence of teaching science, learning, or the arts.

Sir J. C. Hippisley moved an amendment upon the amendment, That the Royal Institution be excepted; but Sir J. Mackintosh said, this was unnecessary, as it was included in the general class of institutions established by Royal Charter.

After some conversation between Sir J. C. Hippisley, Sir J. Mackintosh and Mr. B. Bathurst, the two clauses exempting the East India College and societies incorporated by Royal Charter or authority of Parliament, were agreed to. The third, about the exemption of all lectures for the promotion of science, learning, and the arts, when bonâ fide delivered, &c. was rejected.

When the clause relative to the duration of the act came under the consideration of the Committee, it was agreed that it should expire the 24th of July, 1818.

On the reading of the clause declaring the Societies called Spencean Philanthropists to be unlawful combinations, Sir James Mackintosh said, that he was quite ashamed to have the names of such contemptible enthusiasts introduced into a solemn legislative enactment.

The Attorney-General said, that he felt as much contempt for those poor lunatics as any one could, but he expressed his conviction that the clause should stand, because they had not only a great crowd of auditors, but were also making a considerable number of proselytes.

The clause was then read and allowed to stand part of the bill; and also the clause against Delegates, Missionaries, and Correspondence, was read, and allowed to stand.

Freemasons' Lodges and charitable Institutions were exempted from the provisions of the bill.

Mr. J. L. Foster rose to propose a clause exempting Ireland, which, after some conversation between Mr. Williams Wynn and Lord Castlereagh, was given up as being unnecessary.

The Solicitor-General then brought in some other clauses to exempt religious societies, which were ordered to stand as part of the bill.

He also brought in a clause to give the Attorney-General power to stay proceedings in prosecutions under this act.

All the clauses having been gone through, Sir M. Ridley gave notice that he would move an amendment to the preamble.

The House having resumed, the bill was ordered to be reprinted and read a third time on Friday.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.—Mr. Martin moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill to facilitate proceedings in the Court of Exchequer, by authorizing one of the barons to sit and hear suits in equity. The bill was brought in, and read a first time.

The House adjourned at 2 o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, March 11.

SINECURES, USELESS PLACES, &c.—Earl Grosvenor rose, pursuant to notice, to submit some resolutions to the House on the subject of sinecures, useless places, and the granting of offices in reversion. The subject, he observed, was at all times important, and particularly so at the present moment, considering the state of the public mind: but he did not agree with the noble earl opposite, who had on a former occasion said, that it was not material that the matter should be brought under discussion at an early period of the session. The noble earl probably alluded to certain measures which were stated to be in contemplation for the reduction of sinecures and useless places: but he did not feel himself justified in placing much reliance on hopes held out by Ministers; and more especially on a subject like this. What he contended for was—that their lordships ought to take the subject into their own hands, and give a distinct and solemn pledge to the country upon it. It was, however, with considerable pain that he now brought the matter under discussion, not merely on account of the delicacy of the subject, and the prejudices connected with it—not merely on account of the negatives which he had met with, when on former occasions he called the attention of the House to this matter; but also on account of the critical situation of the public mind. In looking at that situation, he could not view it without something like despondency; not from any such alarms as the noble lords opposite felt, but from the mistaken notion which the Executive Government appeared to entertain of the character of the people of England. They totally misunderstood the open, generous, liberal, and manly character of the people, whom they charged with disloyalty and disaffection; and with that opinion adopted measures which might be attended with the most fatal consequences. But he held in contempt the notion, that in times of difficulty and danger “the post of honour was a private station,” and he was not one given to despair. This subject had been so often discussed, that much novelty could not be expected, and he should confine what he had to say within as narrow bounds as possible; and so he wished that the various resolutions on the subject of Retrenchment and Reform should be entered as read. Their lordships would observe that, though these petitions differed materially as to the nature and extent of Parliamentary Reform, they all agreed in condemning useless Places and Sinecures, and in calling for Economy and Retrenchment. Many a long and weary contest had he had with the noble and learned lord on the woolsack on this subject. The argument of the noble lord was, that innovation was a dangerous principle: but, adopting the language of a celebrated dramatic poet, he might say, that it might be dangerous to eat, drink, or sleep; but that out of the nettle danger, they would pluck the flower safety. The object of the noble lord was to embrace the Constitution as it was, with all its decays and corruptions. His (earl Grosvenor's) object was to cut off the gangrened limb, and restore the Constitution to its full health and vigour. On former occasions he had been met with the objection, that this was not the proper time—that it was a period of war; and he was asked whether he would set about building his house in a hurricane? And he was apprehensive that, though this was a time of peace, he should still be met by the old objection—that this was not the proper time. In his present view of the subject it would not be necessary to enumerate all the sinecures and useless places at home and in the colonies, which gave so much improper influence to the Ministers of the Crown: the masterpieces of the revels, and such places, sometimes given to the amount of 5,000*l.* each, to children of two or three years old. Into these details it was not necessary for him to enter. He only called upon their lordships to-night to declare their opinions on the principle, and to vote that sinecures and useless places ought to be abolished. He did not wish to throw imputations on individuals. There was no demerit in holding these offices: and if indignation were felt on the subject, the public indignation ought to be directed, not against the individuals holding the offices, but against the offices themselves. His object was to procure a vote of the House that these sinecures ought to be abolished on the fall of the lives of the persons by whom they were now held. The very name of these sinecures excited disgust; and a great and eminent lord, who once sat on the woolsack, had this opinion of them. It had been objected on former occasions, that sinecures ought to be reserved for the reward of distinguished services: but it seldom happened that, when such services were to be rewarded, any sinecure was vacant; and in reality it was well known that for the most part they were not the reward of great and distinguished public services. Witness the instances of Marlborough, Nelson, and Wellington. There were, however, some eminent exceptions; such as his noble friend the Auditor of the Exchequer, and the noble earl opposite, who had been much employed in the public service. He might be told, that it had already been recommended to abolish several sinecures—the Surveyor-Generalship of the Isle of Wight, the Wardenship of the Cinque Ports, the Clerkship of the Pells, the Justiceship in Eyre, and four offices in the Exchequer: but then he wished their lordships to give a distinct pledge on the subject. He was not called upon to place implicit confidence in what he heard; and he had so often found these things come to nothing, that he did not feel satisfied without a pledge from their lordships: and, besides, though the Commons might think that these offices ought to be abolished, their lordships might, perhaps, unless they gave that pledge, be of a different opinion, as on former occasions. The object, then, of the first resolution which he should propose to their lordships was, to procure their vote that sinecures ought to be abolished. The object of the second resolution was, the abolition or regulation of useless places. He was aware that the noble earl opposite had laid a paper on the table relative to that point; in the examination of which he would not take up their lordships' time. The noble earl might say, that a great deal had been done by a Committee appointed by the Treasury Board: but the paper in question, if it shewed that something was done, also proved that a great deal was still to be done. Two inspectors-general were continued at large salaries; and in the Barrack department, great reductions might have been made which had not taken place. The Treasury Board itself might have done all that had been done by its Committee, and much more. "These things they ought to have done, and not left others undone." The Treasury might have reduced the salaries of those under their own controul; for instance, that of the Resident at Lisbon, whose salary was greater than that of the Ministers who had been sent thither—certainly not greater than that of the present President of the Board of Control. There were other offices which had not been considered, though they well deserved consideration: the office of the Secretary for the War and Colonial department for example—that was a question which ought to have been considered. There was another office, also, which he had mentioned on a former occasion, which he conceived to be not only useless but illegal; and that, also, ought to be abolished. It would also have well deserved consideration, whether the office of one of the Paymasters of the Army, and whether the offices of two of the Lords of the Admiralty, might not be abolished. It had been said that certain of these lords were in a course of education there for the office. He had himself on one occasion been in the Admiralty, and he remembered that the course of education which he received for the office, was to have some large volumes of statutes relative to the Admiralty put into his hands, which he was desired to read all over, and these contained frequent references to other acts of Parliament. The late Lord Stanhope had read the whole statute book, but he believed few others had done so. However, he had been desired to read over these statutes: but as to the duties—he had been certainly very often called upon to sign his name, so that the office was no indifferent school for writing: still if the First Lord of the Admiralty had consulted them frequently, these additional lords might perhaps be considered as of some use, unless they were a naval lord; however, he believed that the First Lord of the Admiralty was not in the habit of consulting them. All these offices therefore were very proper subjects for consideration. An act had lately passed for authorizing the receiving of voluntary contributions from certain offices; and it was said, that this had been done on various occasions: but he could not think that those who were employed in the active service of the state ought to be called upon so to contribute from their salaries; at least there was only one case in which such contributions might be proper, to a certain extent: and that was, when the salaries had been considerably increased a few years ago, during the depreciation of the currency. In such a case some contribution from these offices might be proper: but, generally speaking, nothing ought to be taken from the salaries of those employed in the active service of the state. It was not the active bee, but the idle drone that ought to give up his emoluments. After the example which had been given by one nobleman, who had held a large sinecure, it might be expected that others would follow. But a noble lord had, on a former occasion, recommended that the landed proprietors should contribute. Such, however, was the general distress of the country, that none were exempt from it except those who derived their incomes from the taxes: and the distress was very heavy on the landed proprietor. A friend of his had told him, that the distress was so great, and the tenants so unable to pay, that if the income tax had not been taken off, he would hardly have had any income at all to live upon. Whether the distress was generally felt by landed proprietors with such severity, he could not undertake to say: but it was unquestionable, that they were exposed to a very heavy pressure. The third resolution which he intended to propose to their lordships, had for its object to put an end to the practice of granting places in reversion. Unless an end were put to that practice, no good could be done: and neither sinecures nor useless places could, to any very great extent, be abolished or regulated. The 4th resolution was of a more general nature, and related to the subject of Reform, for which this was a proper time. He earnestly requested the attention of the House to the state of the public mind; not as filled with disloyalty and dissatisfaction, but as calling for some Reform. The want of Reform was considered as a practical grievance. The people thought that, in the present state of the representation, they had not that check and control over the conduct of the Executive Government which they ought to have; and without such Reform the public mind never would be at peace. No people ever were more attached to their institutions than the people of England were, in what they considered as the true and genuine Constitution of their country. The public mind had become more enlightened, and the people in general understood what were their rights and privileges much better than formerly; and were naturally anxious to have that to which they conceived themselves entitled. These opinions were not confined to England, but were circulated throughout Europe; whether derived from the American or French revolution, it was not, for the present purpose, very material to inquire. But the sentiment had embodied itself in the minds of the European population; and all the power of governments, though accompanied with racks and tortures, would never be able to crush it. The public mind never would be satisfied till the people, all over Europe, obtained what he wished to God they might obtain—a fair representation. An able and eloquent writer had attributed the downfall of the French monarchy to clubs and corresponding societies, and those practices which were at present made the ground of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act: but he considered those practices not as cause but effect. They were the effect of dissolute morals and manners; of financial embarrassments; and above all, of the despotic nature of the French government. (Hear, hear.) Many a government had begun under the happiest auspices, and with the fairest prospects, and ended as the French Government had done:

* Sinecures, Unnecessary &c.

“Fair laughs the morn, and soft the zephyr blows,
“While proudly riding o’er the azure realm,
“In gallant trim, the gilded vessel goes;
“Youth at the prow, and Pleasure at the helm, “Reckrless of the sweeping whirlwind’s sway,
“That, hush’d in grim repose, expects his evening “prey.”

“&c.”

He could not help now saying a few words with respect to a matter personal to himself. He had, on a former occasion, been called to order for naming certain members of the Executive Government in the other House. Now he was desirous that it should be understood, that on that occasion, as well as on every other, he opposed measures, not men; that he proceeded on public grounds, and was not actuated by personal or party hostility towards individuals; and he protested and declared, that if his noble friends near him were to become Ministers, and were to act on the principles which appeared to govern the conduct of the present Ministry, he would oppose them. The Ministry which he wished for was one which would look, not merely to the prerogatives of the Crown, but also to the privileges of the people; a Ministry which, while it steadfastly regarded the prerogative and dignity of the Crown with one eye, would regard the privileges of the people no less steadfastly with the other; and if the caprice of the sovereign should at any time call upon it to deviate from these principles, he wished for the Ministers who would resign their places, rather than comply. He did not oppose the present Ministers on any personal ground; and he earnestly and solemnly entreated the House, and especially the bench of Bishops, to recollect, that if it was possible that a people should conspire against their Government, it was also possible that a Government might conspire against the people. (Hear, hear.) There was one point more to which he wished to call the attention of the House. The savings, as it appeared from the papers on the table, amounted to 50,000*l.*: but the excess of salaries lately created amounted to 196,000*l.*, or from that to 170,000*l.*: from which their lordships would perceive, how small in comparison the saving was. He proposed, then, these four resolutions:

1. That it is the opinion of this House, that all sinecures in the patronage of the Crown ought to be abolished after the expiration of the subsisting interests.

2. That all useless places should be abolished or regulated forthwith.

3. That for the future no places should be granted by the Crown in reversion, as tending to prolong and perpetuate useless offices, and to render inadequate the discharge of those to which active duties are annexed.

4. That it is more especially the duty of the House to adopt the foregoing resolutions at a period of unusual difficulty and distress, and of universal petition for economical Reform and Retrenchment.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the noble earl who had just sat down began the speech which contained the grounds on which he had submitted his resolutions to their lordships’ consideration with a general eulogium on the loyalty of the people. In that general eulogium he was sincerely disposed to concur; but he believed that there was no man who fairly considered what had recently been the state of the country, and what the probable effect of the unreasonable practices which had been disclosed would be, who would not admit that precautionary measures were necessary: not indeed on the supposition of disloyalty in the great body of the people, and, therefore, not adopted against them; but for the protection of a loyal people against those who wished to seduce and demoralize them. When the noble earl said, that the bill which had passed for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and those now in their progress before Parliament, had excited discontent and dismay, he asserted what appeared to him completely contradictory to the real state of the case. Where were there any evidences of discontent or dismay, since these measures had been originated? Let the noble lord, on the contrary, compare the despondency which existed a few weeks ago, with the state of the public mind now, and judge fairly of the difference. What had been the effect of the measures introduced by his Majesty’s Government, and already, in part, sanctioned by Parliament? It was to be seen in the removal of that apprehension and despondency which had prevailed: it was to be seen in the ameliorated state of the public mind and public credit; as was evident from the very considerable rise of the funds which had taken place. He certainly did not mean to undervalue that consideration which was due to the measures which had been adopted, or to insinuate that the grounds on which they were proposed ought not to be jealously canvassed; but this he would maintain, that their immediate consequence had been the restoration of public credit and confidence. With regard to the only one of those measures which as yet had passed through all the forms requisite to render it a law, it was rather singular that the noble earl should regard it as so peculiarly objectionable. The noble lord ought not to deal quite so hard with those who now supported the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, as he had voted for it himself not less at least than six or seven times. It is true, the noble earl will say, that when he so voted, the circumstances of the country were very different, and that the present circumstances do not call for such a measure. This, however, was what he disputed; and whether the circumstances of the country now required the passing of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was not a question to be argued between him and the noble earl—it had been decided by Parliament. Before he proceeded to make any remark on the objects of the resolutions themselves, he must observe, that it was possible for resolutions to be so drawn as to contain nothing objectionable on the face of them, and yet to be such as would be very improper for that House to adopt. A subject might be stated which would be a very fit one for inquiry, in certain circumstances: and which would be unfit in others. It certainly would be neither regular nor proper in their lordships to go into an inquiry on the subject of the resolutions proposed by the noble lord, with a knowledge, that an investigation on the same subject was in progress in another place. It was also to be considered, that this was a branch of legislation not so appropriate for their lordships' deliberation; and that if the noble earl's resolutions were adopted, it was not easy to see how any practical measure could be founded upon them. The first resolution which the noble earl proposed to move, was for the abolition of sinecures. Now, the question he would wish to ask on that resolution was, what the noble earl meant by a sinecure? He would contend, that no noble lord could give a distinct answer to the question. He would be glad to be informed, how any definite meaning could be attached to the word sinecure. The noble earl would find the term sinecure-office in a bill which had been introduced into Parliament: but neither in that bill, nor in the long list of offices pointed out as fit objects of regulation, by a report of the other House, could any one be found to which the term sinecure would with propriety attach. To certain offices in the Exchequer this term had often been applied; but were they really sinecures? On the contrary, they were offices of high importance and great pecuniary trust. It might be proper to regulate them; it might or it might not be proper to find other means for rewarding merit than the existence of these offices presented. This was a question he did not at present mean to argue; but what he contended for, and would maintain, was that if the noble lord regarded any one of these offices as a sinecure, in the proper sense of the word, he was most completely mistaken. They were all offices of trust, which had duties to be performed either by the holders or their deputies. In fact, the term sinecure, applied to any office of the State, was a perfect nickname. The noble earl called to abolish something of which the House knew nothing, and the existence of which he could not point out. Where are these sinecures the noble earl would abolish? And how many are there of them? He should be glad to hear any noble lord answer these questions. Here he begged it might be understood that he was not giving any opinion against legislating on the subject of the offices in question; that was a matter on which Parliament was competent to determine; but of this he was certain, that to ascertain what offices might with propriety be abolished, and what others might be changed, reduced, or otherwise regulated, required very mature deliberation; and more knowledge and experience of business than he believed the noble earl could pretend to possess. What the decision of their lordships might be, when the subject should be fairly under their consideration, would depend upon a view of the effects of the present system of rewarding merit, with the probable consequences of that system which might be proposed to be substituted. He would not pretend to anticipate that decision; nor did he now object to the discussion of the subject, but should reserve his opinion until it came before their lordships in a proper shape. With respect to the noble earl's opinion, respecting an increase of the influence of the Crown in Parliament, it was so absurd he did not think it necessary to enter into a refutation of it. The contrary was notoriously the fact: but he should be ready to state his opinion on that question, also, if it should be at any time brought in a practical form under their lordships' consideration. That there was a call, an imperious one, on the Government to inquire into the state of the public expenditure, he would not deny. If ever there was a time for economy it was the present, when the public distress was from various causes, so great. Whether Ministers had or had not done their duty in the measures of economy they had adopted, there would be other opportunities of considering; and he should not now detain their lordships by discussing that point. He would, however, just observe, that the reductions made in a great branch of the public expenditure exceeded what had been expected by the best informed advocates of the system of economy in another place. The peace establishment was estimated by a person well qualified to judge, and not disposed to take the most favourable view of the conduct of Ministers, at 700,000*l.* more than the sum at which it had been fixed. This he thought might be considered as at least a strong presumption of the disposition of his Majesty's Government to adopt every practical measure of economy. As to colonial offices, all of that class which it was possible to do without had already been abolished: but the increase of our foreign settlements, and the extent of their relations, required a department for the management of colonial affairs. He was confident that it was impossible for public business to be carried on without three secretaries of state. Under the present, or any ordinary circumstances of the country, the business of the office of the third secretary of state, to be properly executed—and it never had been better executed than now—was as much as physical and moral strength of an individual was capable of performing. Among those who might choose to take the trouble to inquire what business was really done at this office, he was confident there would be no difference of opinion on this subject. Upon the whole, seeing no practical good that could be derived from the resolutions proposed by the noble earl, he must necessarily give his vote against them.

Lord St. John was surprised to hear the noble lord dwell, as he had done, on the advantages of the measures adopted by Government. It was truly said, that difference of political sentiments often made the same objects appear very unlike to persons who viewed them at the same time; but he scarce thought it possible for any political difference to account for the opposite manner in which the noble secretary of state and himself viewed the present situation of the country. He had heard of many circumstances having a tendency to support the funds: but he never expected to have been told, that they were benefited by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The noble earl had also described the measure to which he attributed this beneficial effect as a precautionary one. Now this seemed quite a new way of viewing it. If he had at all understood the grounds on which the measure was proposed by Ministers, it was not for the purpose of preventing, but for putting down sedition. The noble lord had challenged any person to give a definition of the term sinecure: but if it was difficult to describe a sinecure, it was easy enough to tell what a sinecurist was. That denomination would very properly apply to a person who held an office which was executed by another. He could not agree with the noble earl, that the House of Lords had no concern with questions of this kind. Such an but it was particularly so at the present moment, when their table was loaded with Petitions praying for Retrenchment and Economy. He thought their lordships were also competent to take measures for abridging the influence of the Crown, surely could not be questioned. He must remind the noble earl, that after the act of succession had passed, that measure which had for its peculiar object the securing the independence of the House of Commons originated in their lordships' house.

The Earl of Lauderdale could not concur in opinion, either with his noble friend who moved the resolutions, or the noble Secretary of State. His noble friend had described the difficulties which the country experienced from the weight of taxation. If he had looked into the situation of the landed interest, he would have found it in a state of distress far beyond any thing ever experienced in this country. The noble earl opposite seemed to doubt this statement; but if he inquired into the condition of the tenantry, he would soon be convinced of the fact: he would find that few of them were able to pay their rents; and that the greater part of those who did pay, derived the means of so doing from the appropriation of their capital, and not from the produce of their farms. Did the noble lord consider what must be the ruinous effect of this state of things? It was capital in the hands of the tenantry that had created that high state of cultivation for which this country was justly famed; but if the capital was exhausted, that agricultural prosperity would necessarily cease. A noble lord had said, on a former occasion, that the situation of the agricultural classes could not be so bad as it was described, as the repeal of the property-tax must have been a great relief to them. If, however, inquiry were made among the farmers, it would be found, that they would be content to suffer the infliction of the property-tax, if they could be placed in the situation in which they stood five years ago. Whatever measures might tend to relieve them, he was certain the abolition of sinecures was not among the number. Nothing was more ridiculous than the expectation of great public benefit from that abolition: except, perhaps, what the noble Secretary of State had asserted to be the effect of the abolition of the Habeas Corpus Act. What facilities that measure might give to the noble earl's tenants, in enabling them to pay their rents, he did not know; but if the suspension had really raised the funds, as the noble earl asserted, it was fair to suppose that the subsequent fall of one per cent. had been owing to the discovery made by the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, that the amendment made on the bill by the Commons had done it great injury, inasmuch as the benefit of the measure in the manner intended, would not be extended to Scotland. The state of the country, however, required very different remedies than those proposed by either of the noble earls. A noble friend near him (Lord St. John) had spoken of the table being loaded with petitions: but if the public distress was to be in any way attributed to the existence of the offices in question, it would follow that public offices were now more highly paid than they had been in former times: which was not the fact. The opposite parties of that House had often been described as two factions, only contending for the loaves and fishes of the British Constitution; but as each party in its turn had yielded to the public prejudice against these offices, if the same system proceeded there would soon be neither loaf nor fish left. With regard to the influence of the Crown in the House of Commons, there was a report on their lordships' table which placed that question in its true light. That report, which was made to Parliament in 1807, proved that the number of persons holding offices had diminished instead of having increased. To avoid entering into details on this question, he should only state some prominent facts. Before the union of Scotland, the number of members of the House of Commons holding places under the Crown was greater than at later periods, though the House of Commons was augmented by that union. In 1705, these 98 individuals holding offices had seats in the House of Commons; in 1807, the number was only 74, being a diminution of 24. In the year 1716, the difference was still more remarkable; there were then 164 placemen in the other House; which, compared with 1807, gave an excess of 90. In 1718, the number of placemen who had seats was 154; which made the excess at that period 80. In 1797, the number of placemen was 193, and the expense of the salaries above 265,000*l.* In 1807, the number, as he said before, was reduced to 74, and the expense to only 193,000*l.*, making a difference of 119 in number, and 92,000*l.* in expense. This comparison decidedly proved that the influence of the Crown had greatly decreased in the House of Commons: but he begged that he might not be supposed to state that it had decreased on the whole. On the contrary, he was aware that it had infinitely augmented through the country at large. This was naturally to be expected, from the large civil and military establishments maintained by the Government, and from the influence of a national debt, amounting to 700,000,000*l.*; the charge on which was 37,000,000*l.* It was not, therefore, the influence of the Crown in the House of Commons which was to be guarded against, but the influence out of doors. This was evident from the readiness with which the Crown appealed to that influence whenever a majority of the House of Commons was disposed to bring about a change of administration. The noble earl who moved the resolutions had talked of the great emoluments of public offices; but the view he had taken was altogether erroneous, and founded on the common public prejudice. There never was a period in our history when men in office were less corrupt; and perhaps never a time when the public was more corrupt. He agreed with the noble Secretary of State as to the impossibility of pointing out any office which was completely a sinecure. He looked upon sinecure offices as a sort of lottery, where, though the rewards were few, yet the hope of the great prize would induce many a man to exert himself to deserve it. He had not himself been much in office; but though he had never been minister, he was perfectly acquainted with the circumstance—that three or four important claimants might be put off by the hope of a reversionary sinecure, who, without such a mode of rewarding public service, would at once have required a pension. His noble friend had truly observed, that the distresses of the people made them look on all sides for relief: he was one of those, however, who believed that the people would never have turned their attention to this particular subject, nor have looked to such a source for relief, unless the Parliament itself had set the example of referring to such a fund for a supply. In fact, the evil under which the country laboured lay much deeper: it was the infinite load of the public debt. He had himself published to the world his sentiments on this point, though he had not had the good fortune to be listened to. He had no hesitation to state, clearly and explicitly, that he deprecated and even reprobated the discussion of these minor matters, because he felt a conviction that they took off the public attention from greater objects. He was ready to admit, that no taxes could be too great for a nation to pay, provided the objects to be attained were greater: but such a fact must be fully proved, which had not yet been done. As to the argument drawn from the funds, every man who looked to the state of the currency must know, that though the funds might probably be yet considerably higher, yet speculators alone would derive any benefit, while the labourer and the manufacturer would be entirely without relief. The funding system had been productive of the greatest disadvantages, and had taken as much as five millions from the pocket of the landholder. That was the wisest distribution of property which would give happiness to a whole people: but as to the abolition of sinecures, he thought that the measure would not only do no good in itself, but that it would tend rather to increase than diminish the hatred of public men; and would, in its consequences, force upon the people a stronger idea that such men lived only on the public property.

Earl Darnley observed, that if no other argument could be found for the abolition of sinecures, yet it ought to be entertained for this single reason—that such a measure contained in itself the general principle of Reform; and such a principle was of the highest importance at a time like the present. He was ready to agree, that a system of pensions must be substituted for the present system; but he thought such a mode of remuneration would be more economical, and (he begged pardon of noble lords) less offensive, than the present. But, he thought, at this time, he thought that the circumstances of the country were such, that it became the duty of Parliament to direct its attention to some specific of Reform, whatever difference of opinion might exist as to the particular and specific plan.

The Earl of Liverpool professed his intention of withdrawing his motion of the previous question: and though he must oppose the present general motion, yet he would not be unwilling to attend to any specific proposal.

Lord Holland thought that the noble earl had great reason to flatter himself on the accession of strength which he had obtained: but the principle of the question was not affected by such a circumstance. As to the office of wine-taster, which some noble lords might naturally be anxious to retain (a laugh), he would say nothing about it, but would address himself to the general question. He did not exactly see the relation between the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill and the present question; but as it had been referred to, he would say, that he could never hear the mention of that measure without giving it his most severe reprobation. The noble earl had boasted, that the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act had raised the funds to 70: if so, the prospect of the country was most alarming; for if a suspension of three months had raised the funds to 70, Ministers had the strongest temptation to make the measure permanent. But it was not true that the measure was of such prodigious importance, and the argument of the noble earl was good for nothing, unless he could go on to shew, that the measure, besides raising the funds, would give employment to the idle, and food to the hungry. His noble friend (Lord Lauderdale), whom, notwithstanding a difference of opinion, he heard with the greatest pleasure, on account of his ingenuity and information, had, to a certain degree, said very truly, that a great delusion prevailed at public meetings as to the quantity of relief which such a measure as that now proposed would produce; but his noble friend had not stated the whole of the argument. He had contended, that the influence of the Crown had not increased in Parliament; and had described the distresses of the country as resulting from its enormous debt: but it would have been as well if the noble earl had taken into his consideration the enormous increase of the army, and of all the other establishments connected with the Crown. He might then have seen some strong reason for cutting down the luxuriance of these establishments. The noble earl opposite had pretended, that the business of the country could not be conducted without a third Secretary of State. The fact, if so, was rather curious: for it had been pronounced formerly as not entirely essential in time of war; and it was odd, that this branch of the war department should be found to be more necessary in time of peace. He had not himself much experience in office; but, from what knowledge he had, he would venture to say, that the duties of the war department would be better performed without the third secretary; and the business of the country was impeded more than accelerated by the existence of this additional office. The conduct of Ministers with respect to the pious Lords of the Admiralty was very unsatisfactory, and their language on the subject was neither wise nor respectful to the country. And though Ministers had taken great credit to themselves for some general reductions, he begged to know why the retrenchments had not been made last year. The noble earl might think these concessions boons: but in fact they were extorted only by the petitions of the people—by such petitions as he trusted still to see the table crowded with. One noble lord had denied the existence of sinecures: if they were not sinecures, he (Lord Holland) did not know what they were; but if the word was matter of objection, let it be altered; and the substance of the present motion would still stand. And as to the reason assigned for not entering upon this question, that inquiries were now pending, it was precisely the reason why this Parliamentary proceeding should be adopted. A noble earl had objected to this as an abstract and speculative proposition; but “abstract” and “speculative” were nick-names too often applied. He must here allude to a speech made the other night, that the French revolution began by the abolition of sinecures. Was it so? Who, then, was the great author of a similar revolutionary measure in this country? At whose instigation were sinecures first abolished? Was it not by the great champion of anti-revolutionary principles? To what extent would such an argument lead us? If the abolition of sinecures was a revolutionary measure, then Mr. Burke was the great revolutionist: if it was jacobinical, Mr. Burke was himself the arch-jacobin. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) If the Spencean doctrines should prevail, and every proprietor's land be cut into squares for the public good, Mr. Burke alone was answerable: nay, if their lordships should all have their throats cut, all the dire mischief was to be attributed to Mr. Burke's Bill. (A laugh.) Such was the absurd consequence to be deduced from the argument of a noble lord—that the very proposal of abolishing sinecures was in itself revolutionary. The noble earl had talked of certain salaries (offices would have been a proper term) as necessary to maintain the splendour of the Crown. He was himself as anxious as any man to support the due splendour of the regal dignity: but he thought that too much might be expended in doing so, as well as too little. When Mr. Burke spared the great offices of the household, his professed object was to keep about the Throne persons of refined education, of exemplary character, and of high rank; persons, in short, whose situations were such that they were not likely to attach themselves to the Crown for the sake of the salary. On this point he would not be so personal as to point out what individual offices might be abolished; but he thought the subject extremely fitting for parliamentary inquiry.

The noble earl had said, that pensions would be as expensive a mode of remuneration as sinecures: but the question was not one of sinecures versus pensions, or of pensions versus sinecures; but of pensions plus sinecures. (Hear, and a laugh.) He had never seen that the existence of sinecures tended in the smallest degree to diminish the number of pensions. Whenever any public service was performed, or any great man was to be rewarded, a pension was immediately demanded for him as much as if no such thing as a sinecure was in existence. He did not mean to cast any personal reflections, but two instances occurred to him too striking to be omitted. The first was the case of the late Mr. Pitt, a man whom, though he differed widely from him in politics, he was ready to praise for his noble disinterestedness and disregard of money? When he died, application was made to Parliament, and all his debts were paid by the public. On Mr. Perceval's death, a similar application was made, and pensions were given to his children. So in all cases, whenever an opportunity presented itself, a message came down immediately to Parliament, and a pension was recommended to reward each fresh instance of merit in a public servant. It was not fair, therefore, to call it a question whether pensions or sinecures should be allowed to be the best mode of public reward; for the real matter in dispute was whether both modes of remuneration should exist at the same time, and for the same purposes. For his own part, he thought sinecures the most unjust species of compensation; but, if not unjust, he was sure that it was the most invidious; and that was no slight objection. To call it by the gentlest name, he would say it was inconvenient, because it was peculiarly liable to unconstitutional influence. In this point of view, there was much more room for abuse in the distribution of sinecures, than of pensions. In every case of pension, whatever influence might be exerted was manifest and declared. All was open. A regular request was made to Parliament: the service of the person to be rewarded was publicly announced, and was discussed and weighed, and calculated before the pension was bestowed. He might apply to pensions and sinecures, the language of Scripture, which had lately been quoted for another purpose: with respect to their different natures and effects, he would call the pension, "the arrow that flieth by day," and the sinecure, "the pestilence that walketh in darkness." (Hear, hear.) It was, indeed, the chief and prevailing objection against sinecures, that their influence was secret and silent. It was this that made them so offensive to the country: it was this which would ever continue to make them offensive, though the degrees of injury which they produced might be infinitely less than it was pretended to be. This, therefore, was alone a ground (he would, if their lordships pleased, allow it was the chief ground) why they should be abolished. (Hear, hear.) It was no truth, true, that the Crown had an interest in remunerating its servants by this mode; but it was at least equally clear, that public opinion was decidedly against it. The nation is not considered sinecures as odious burdens; Ministers were bound, not merely to listen to the voice of the people, but to obey it. The noble earl had talked of delusion, and of false persuasion, that had been superinduced; but the best way of removing it, if found inconvenient, was to abolish sinecures: and as they were the cause, the effect would cease with them. The plan hitherto adopted, if indeed it deserved the name of a plan, was most injurious to the purposes of Ministers themselves: they refused to abolish at once in an open and manly way; but, by degrees, they clipped and trimmed one office and then another, without giving satisfaction to their own or to any other party. The noble earl had spoken of the danger of concession; but that danger was incalculable, when compliance was extracted and extorted by the compulsion of national sentiment. His Majesty's Government might delay as much as they pleased, but the time would come when they must grant what the nation required; they might patch and paint for a time, but "to this complexion they must come at last;" and it was not only far better for themselves, but for the public tranquillity, that they should comply at once with a good grace, instead of being forced at last to yield what in itself was most just and reasonable.

The question was then put on the previous question, which was negatived. The House divided upon the original motion, when the numbers were—Contents, 3, Non-contents, 45, Majority, 40.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, March 11.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir W. Gellie presented a petition from the freeholders and inhabitants of the county of Kent, praying for Retrenchment and Reform.

On the question being put that the petition be brought up,

Sir E. Knatchbull said, that he could not suffer the opportunity to pass, or the petition to be read, without making an observation or two. The petition was presented as that of the county of Kent, and as expressive of the sentiments of the county. He believed that it expressed the sentiments of the majority of the meeting at which it was voted, but he denied that it expressed the sentiments of the county, or could be received as the petition of the county. The high sheriff had signed it in the name of the meeting; but he could only sign for himself—he could not sign for others; and this petition, therefore, could not be received, except as the petition of the individual whose signature it bore.

The Speaker stated the rule regarding the reception and signature of petitions to be the following. There were only two modes in which petitions could be viewed as coming before the House. They must either come from individuals, assemblies of individuals, or corporate bodies. If they came from corporate bodies, and were signed in the name of the corporation, and sealed with its seal, they were considered as the prayer of the corporation. If they came from individuals or meetings of individuals, they were to be considered only as the petitions of the persons whose signatures they bore. They could not, when signed by one in the name of the rest, be considered as the prayer of the whole.

Sir W. Geary wished the petition to be read as the petition of the high sheriff representing the meeting.

Sir E. Knatchbull had no objection that the petition should be considered as expressive of the sentiments of the meeting.

Mr. Calcraft was sensible, after what had been said, that the forms of the House precluded the petition from being received as any thing else than the petition of the high sheriff who signed it; but he hoped that, as it was substantially the petition of the meeting, though signed in their names, it would have all the weight which such an origin could give it. The hon. baronet (Sir E. Knatchbull) had allowed that it expressed the sentiments of the meeting. That meeting was most respectable—it was numerously attended—it was called with due notice—the requisition was most respectably signed. In consequence of the address to be voted to the Prince Regent, which was a part of the business of the day, the hon. baronet had it in his power to have assembled a greater number of his friends to oppose the petition. The hon. baronet might have exerted all his influence. He was well supported in his opposition by a young man, who displayed great abilities on the occasion, and he might have had the assistance of some demagogues. If the hon. baronet complained, that he had not all the advantages that he could have wished in the contest, or that he thought he could in future obtain, he might call another meeting, and he (Mr. C.) and his friends would be glad to meet him on the same grounds, and would not despair of similar success.

Sir E. Knatchbull begged to say a few words in reply to what had fallen from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Calcraft) opposite. The hon. gentleman was mistaken when he said that he (Sir E. K.) opposed the petition. He neither attended when it was discussed, nor offered it any opposition whatever. He hoped, therefore, the hon. gentleman would retract what he had said about his opposition. The Chair had rightly decided, that the petition could only be received as the petition of the high sheriff.

Though the high sheriff had signed it, however, as he conceived at the time his official duty demanded, he (Sir E. K.) was convinced that he neither concurred in the sentiments of the petition, nor would have signed it in his own name.

Mr. Calcraft expressed his great willingness to retract what he might have inadvertently said about the hon. baronet's opposition to the petition. He congratulated him on his late change from strong aversion to his measures, to a state of neutrality. (Hear.) Had it not been thought sufficient that the high sheriff should sign the petition in the name of the meeting, there would have been no difficulty in obtaining numerous and respectable signatures. The hon. baronet had wished even to take away from the petition the advantage of its one signature, by saying that the high sheriff had signed it contrary to his own sentiments. He (Mr. C.) did know intimately the sentiments of the sheriff; but he never heard that they were opposed to the petition, and could attest that he seemed perfectly willing to sign it in the name of the meeting.

Sir E. Knatchbull was ready again to express his conviction that the petition did not express the sentiments of the county in general. (Hear, hear.)

Sir W. Geary assured the House, that the petition expressed the sentiments of the meeting at Maidstone; that that meeting was convened as a county meeting, after due notice; that the requisition was respectably signed, and that the meeting was respectably and numerously attended. The only formality wanting to make this petition a petition of the county was one that might have been easily supplied. He remembered that a petition came up from Cornwall at the beginning of the session, signed like this by the sheriff, and another one had followed with numerous signatures. He was glad that the conversation had taken place, as it would shew to the country the formalities that must be observed in presenting petitions, and would prevent any mistakes in future.

The Speaker said, that the House would not only see the importance of the rule that had been laid down, but the importance of diffusing a knowledge of it. Petitions could only be received as the petitions of those whose names they bore. When there was only one signature, as in the present case, the House remained entirely in the dark as to the sentiments of the meeting from which the application was said to proceed.

Sir C. Monck thought it was manifest, from the conduct of the hon. baronet opposite (Sir E. Knatchbull) that his intention was to damage the petition in the eyes of the House. (Hear, hear.) The petition could only now be received as the application of the high sheriff; but no one could rationally doubt that it expressed the sentiments of the meeting at which he presided, and that, consequently, it was the petition of the county in the name of which he had signed it. The observation of the hon. baronet that the sheriff had signed it contrary to his own private sentiments, from the belief that he was performing an act of official duty, sufficiently testified the nature of the petition; and contained an admission of which the hon. baronet could not thus have seen the tendency. Though in form it could only have been received as the petition of an individual, in substance and reality it was that of the county. He (Sir C. M.) was surprised that the hon. baronet should so contradict himself as he had done, by admitting that the petition was the petition of a county meeting, and not of the county.

Mr. Lushington contended, that his hon. friend (Sir E. Knatchbull) did not contradict himself in saying, that he believed that the petition expressed the sentiments of the meeting at Maidstone, but not those of the county in general. He (Mr. L.) believed, that the county was against the petition; and as far as he knew, the freeholders would oppose it.

Mr. Ponsonby said, that nobody could expect that those who visited the treasury, and were the friends of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lushington, secretary to the treasury), would sign petitions for Retrenchment and Reform, or adopt any other sentiments than those of the hon. secretary. This meeting by the hon. baronet was said not to combine the respectability, or to express the sentiments of the county, when it voted the petition now before the House. He would ask, did this meeting do nothing else that expressed the sentiments of the county? Were the other acts of the meeting not the acts of the county? Did the address to the Prince Regent not contain the sentiments of the county? Did the vote of thanks to the Marquess Camden not express their sentiments? Were not these two acts done by the same meeting with whom this petition originated, and at the same time? How, then, could they be said to express the feelings and sentiments of the county while this petition did not?

Sir E. Knatchbull explained. The right hon. gentleman did not know the manner in which the county business was transacted in Kent. It was usual to send to individuals of influence and property, notice of what was intended to be done. On the present occasion, this formality was omitted. He (Sir E. K.), as member for the county, ought to have been applied to. He, however, was not so applied to, nor were most of the leading characters of the county. Some indeed, who had received notice, refused to attend a meeting with such an object. The address to the Prince Regent would have collected the whole county, and would have been concurred in without a single exception. In the other measure the county would not concur.

Sir W. Geary repeated, that the requisition was respectably signed, that many attended, and that the object of the petition might have been opposed. The petition, in these circumstances, appeared to him a full and fair expression of the sentiments of the county.

Mr. Calcraft never heard before of the practice of sending notices to the leading characters mentioned by the hon. baronet. About four years ago, a county meeting was called to petition against concessions to the Catholics. He never saw the requisition for that meeting till he saw it in the newspapers. The requisition in no case was sent round, except to the friends of the measure to be proposed for consideration at the meeting. On the occasion of that anti-Catholic meeting, he went down along with some friends, and found himself in a minority: but he did not complain of want of due notice. The circular notice to which the hon. baronet had alluded, was to him a novelty, and seemed perfectly unnecessary. Why was the hon. baronet to be formally invited? (Hear.) It was his duty to attend on his constituents, and not for them to wait upon him. (Hear.)

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

FEES IN COURTS OF JUSTICE.] Sir J. Newport hoped, in calling the attention of the House to the motion with which he meant to conclude his observations, that he should obtain the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while he recounted what had already been done in consequence of his exertions. It would be in the recollection of the House, that about three years ago he submitted to them the necessity of an inquiry into the state and mode of proceeding of our Courts of Justice. Such an inquiry, as in the earliest and best times, was recommended: and was always gone into, to protect the public against impositions, and repair the decay, which time or neglect might introduce. At that time, after much discussion, he had the good fortune to carry the measure with no support from his Majesty's Ministers. They, on the contrary, differed from him with regard to its practicability and its utility: and three of the members of the Cabinet openly opposed him. The commission of inquiry, however, which he proposed, was sanctioned by the House. At that time he had the misfortune to have two hon. and learned gentlemen opposed to him, who thought his notions visionary and chimerical. The House, however, having decided on a commission by a vote, unnecessary delay was interposed between the decision of the House and the appointment of commissioners. On the 20th of June, 1814, the vote passed, and a commission was not appointed till February, 1815. Even when a commission was at last appointed to inquire into the English Court of Chancery, the composition of that commission was not such as could have been wished or expected. Out of the five members, of whom it consisted, two were Masters in Chancery, and those two individuals were to inquire into abuses which, from their situation, they were interested in supporting. The result of the operation of this commission, however objectionably composed, was a report which was now upon the table, and which proved that his (Sir John's) objects were not visionary in exerting himself for its appointment. In this report abuses were acknowledged of great magnitude and of long duration. It was in the nature of all human institutions to be liable to decay, not only from accidental external causes, but frequently from the private interest of those who were appointed to office. It would be seen by this Report, that the Lord Chancellor of England had, in April, 1815, about ten months after the discussion in the House, recognized an erroneous practice in the bankrupt department in Chancery, by which fees had been taken, and which he ordered to be curtailed. This practice had passed unobserved during the nine years that the noble and learned lord had held the seals, and was only discovered in consequence of the inquiry he recommended. The House of Commons resolved, on the 18th of April, 1793, that the officers of the Court of Chancery had an interest in the proceedings which tended to the delay of justice and to the oppression of the subject. In consequence of this, the commission, called Lord Hardwick's commission, issued. The Report of the Finance Committee, in which the Speaker had taken so distinguished a share, had laid down certain limits for confining the fees payable by suitors to the officers of courts of justice, and declared the principles by which the application of them ought to be governed; viz. that they should be levied equally, according to the service performed; and should go to compose an aggregate fund for the proper maintenance of those officers. His intention now was to submit two propositions, in the first place, declaratory of these principles; and to add a third with regard to the progress already made by the Commissioners of inquiry. Their first and only Report yet made, which was then before him, gave no account whatever of the aggregate amount of the fees within any certain period, and was thus deficient in a very important and necessary portion of information; for it was impossible for the House to judge, left as it now was in the dark upon that subject, whether the emoluments of any office had swain beyond the proper measure of compensation. When, on a former occasion, he had deemed it his duty to offer a statement, amongst other abuses, of the fees taken for expediting business, an hon. and learned gent. had positively denied that any such practice existed as that of taking fees for such a purpose. An hon. and learned friend of his had, however, then expressed his astonishment at this denial: and the present Report openly alluded to them, although in a very guarded way, and with an expression of doubt as to the possibility of withdrawing them. It stated, that the officers were in the practice of affording information and assistance to suitors, who were not familiar with the forms of business, and that their exertions were necessarily stimulated by the gratuities which they thus received. It added, that it might be a proper question for consideration, whether those exertions would be equally active if these fees were abolished; and whether the same extent of business would be accomplished, if the transaction of it should be limited to stated hours. But the effect of this system was obvious; the man who gave the additional gratuity got his business done first: the hardship must, however, fall somewhere; and on whom was it likely to fall but on the poor, and on those who were unable to pay the expedition-fee? He might venture to assert, that the hardship must fall exclusively on the poor; and whenever that should be the case, the court was no longer a court of justice, for it violated that fundamental provision of the great charter, which declared nulli vendemus justitiam. He would remind the House, likewise, with reference to this part of the subject, of the great augmentation of the stamp-duties on law proceedings, occasioned by the necessities of the State, but which had already too much closed the avenues of justice; and if to these obstructions were to be added the exactions of clerks, it must be evident, that all, except those who had large purses, would be debarred from legal redress. He believed he had touched but upon a very small part of the evil which actually prevailed: he had been well informed that he had not laid before the House, on a former occasion, a tenth part of the abuses in the courts of Ireland. If the commission of inquiry had been onerous and expensive, he had no doubt the public would derive an ample recompense from its labours, and he was happy in the reflection that he had been the humble instrument of shewing how far the fountains of justice had been corrupted, and the poor man stripped of his only means of protection against injustice and oppression. The Honourable Baronet then moved three Resolutions, to the following effect:

'That the Fees payable on law proceedings are to be considered as direct taxes levied on the suitors, to defray the charges of the various offices; that they ought to be at a fixed rate, moderate in their amount, duly proportioned to the service performed, and as far as possible paid into a common fund for the general support of the establishment of each office.

'That the immense increase of the Duty on Law Stamps, imposed on the Legislature the duty of guarding suitors in Courts of Equity against the demand of fees exceeding a fair compensation for the labour performed, and precluding the possibility of an equal admission to those Courts to the rich and to the poor.

'That the Report of the Commissioners appointed by Parliament to investigate the subject, be referred to the consideration of a select Committee of twenty-one Members, who shall be directed to take into consideration the best mode of carrying into effect the recommendations in that Report respecting the Offices in Courts of Justice, and to report their opinion to the House from time to time, as they may think fit.'

The question having been put on the first Resolution,

Lord Castlereagh acknowledged the temperate manner in which the hon. baronet had brought forward his proposition, although he thought himself entitled to complain of that part of his statement, in which he represented the grounds upon which three of his Majesty's Ministers had formerly opposed the appointment of this commission. The fact was, that they admitted a sufficient case to have been made out for the inquiry as it applied to Ireland, and only opposed the necessity of extending it to England. He was certainly prepared to admit, that these inquiries often produced useful information; but he did not think a great expense ought voluntarily to be incurred for the mere purpose of fishing for abuses, or upon a chance of discovering them. The expense was often extremely heavy; one inquiry into the revenue of the united kingdoms had cost 147,000*l.* His objection to the appointment of a Committee was partly an objection of time. The inquiries of the commissioners were in full progress; the House had already received two reports from Ireland, one from Scotland, and one with regard to the English Court of Chancery. He did not think it would be wise in the House to interfere until it should be satisfied that nothing was likely to be done upon these reports, either by the judges, or the immediate Ministers of the Crown. The subject was one of a professional and technical nature, and nothing could be more difficult for the members of that House than to prescribe what were reasonable fees for the performance of each particular kind of business, according to the different practice in courts of equity and law. The House did not take up the report of the commissioners in 1740, but referred it to the law officers; and lord Hardwicke did not feel himself competent to act upon it till after the lapse of two or three years. The present Lord Chancellor certainly had it in contemplation to direct proceedings, in consequence of the Report now on the table: and with respect to the fees in bankruptcy, he had not lost a moment in retrenching them in his own department. He was also engaged at present, in concert with the Master of the Rolls, in the more elaborate task of investigating the nature and amount of official fees. The House ought not to commit itself to an undertaking, the scope of which would comprehend an inquiry into the present constitution of all the judicial offices, in the form of an abstract question, and with very imperfect information. He did not suppose it was the wish of the hon. baronet to deprive the judges of those offices in their gift, which enabled them to provide for their families, and to leave them on their present salaries. (Here Sir J. Newport observed, across the table, that he had not said a word upon the subject.) With respect, then, to the composition of the commission, and the circumstance of two masters in Chancery being members of it, of which the hon. bart. had complained; he sincerely believed, that, without his knowledge, the commissioners have arrived at an understanding of the subject. He had no personal acquaintance with those gentlemen, and therefore could not be supposed to speak with any particular partiality, when he expressed his belief that their appointment was above all suspicion. At the same time he entirely concurred in the principle, that the present practice ought not to continue, and that its long existence could not sanction it. The Report on the table recommended that it should cease: and if the hon. bart. should hereafter find that no measures had been taken by his Majesty's Government, or the heads of the courts, to carry this recommendation into effect, he would not find him disposed to say anything in their defence. Upon these grounds he trusted that the hon. baronet would see the propriety of withdrawing his motion, and assenting to the previous question.

Mr. Webber defended the commission of inquiry in Ireland.

Mr. Ponsonby observed, that the noble lord had been misinformed, or his memory had failed him, with respect to the opposition made to this inquiry by three of the Cabinet Ministers on a former occasion. The opposition was made to every branch of the inquiry, and it was carried by a majority of one, viz. by the vote of Mr. Stephen. With regard to the alleged expense of these commissions, he believed that it was in the power of Ministers to make them as expensive as they pleased, by obliging their friends with lucrative appointments; or if they meant honestly, that it was in their power to keep the expense within very moderate bounds. What had been the case in this instance he did not pretend to know; but he doubted much the soundness of the noble lord's opinion, that it would be better to wait till the commission should have made all its reports, and completed its inquiries, before the House at any proceedings with respect to them. It was the object of instructing a Committee to report from time to time, except that by this means the House was enabled to form a more deliberate and mature judgment than if the whole of a complex subject was submitted to their consideration at once? The noble lord had said, that time ought to be given to the Ministers of the Crown; but he had seen too many Reports laid on the table, (and particularly that in which the Speaker had taken so active a part,) without leading to any practical result, that he could not indulge very sanguine expectations of the expedition likely to be manifested on this occasion. If the noble lord, however, would name any reasonable time within which some proceedings should take place, he would advise his hon. friend to withdraw his motion for the present. His belief was, that the hope held out was nothing more than a device to get rid of the question; and trusted, therefore, that his hon. friend would not consent to withdraw it indefinitely.

Mr. L. Foster stated, that the commission had sat seven years, and at the end of that time were obliged to refer the matter to the Lord Chancellor; that his lordship, after taking three years to consider the matter, redressed every grievance, and abolished every abuse. There never had been so complete a clearance of the avenues of a court of justice. He had no doubt that, on the face of the Report, there might be some instances of increase of fees and irregularity of practice; but in all the really important affairs of the court, he was persuaded there was little ground for complaint. For the last seventy years there had not been one increase of fees, nor one abuse in the master's office; none in the register's office; in the six clerks' office a few, but those small; in the sworn clerks' office none since 1740; no increase in the examiners of the court; none in the master of the reports; and none in the register of Affidavit's office. In this enumeration he had set forth the whole machine which substantially did the business of the court. He was far from saying that the report did not deserve consideration; but the question was, how the matter should be taken into hand? and he thought the same course should be pursued as before, and believed it must finally come to this. If a committee, formed of professional men, were to sit every day till the end of the session, their undertaking would be little less laborious than that of the former committee: he knew this by experience, as he had himself sat upon the commission in Ireland: he had then found the difficulty of the subject, and he was persuaded that a committee of the House was more likely to take up insulated points and to do harm, than to effect any real service. It would be by far the best mode to submit the whole to the Lord Chancellor, and if there were any points which he might not like to venture on, they might be made the object of a supplemental act. He was aware it might be urged, that this was calling the Chancellor to be judge in his own cause, and that many of the fees of the Court appertained to himself. At least this would be no objection as far as the fees of others were concerned; as, with respect to his own, it was to be expected, that the consideration of his own interest would, with so exalted a character, be an additional motive for the exercise of impartiality. It appeared by the Report that not one of the Lord Chancellor's fees had been increased; and the Report stated, that they were all ancient and legal. The hon. baronet seemed to think otherwise as to the office of secretary of bankruptcies: but that had been lately regulated, and the Lord Chancellor had himself voluntarily relinquished 1,000*l.* a year to those who transacted a great share of the business. On these grounds he thought it would conduce to the public good, to put the reformation called for into the hands of the only competent authority, and he could assure the House that he would never support any undue delay.

Sir J. Newport shortly replied, that he would forbear to press his motion, if the noble lord would name a certain day for the settlement of the business. However, he thought it unfair to refer to the Lord Chancellor the revision of offices, in the gains of which he himself participated. It had been said, that the Lord Chancellor had relinquished 1,000*l.* a year; but when had he relinquished it? After the commission had been instituted. The office of secretary of bankruptcies had been discharged sometimes by one and sometimes by another, and no regular appointment had been made till the inquiry took place. The noble lord had alleged that it was inconvenient to adopt general principles which might be controverted by the language of some subsequent report; but it was impossible that the principle contained in the first resolution could ever be impugned. The stamps imposed on law proceedings were the most fatal tax ever proposed, and had the effect of shutting up every avenue to justice. The noble lord (Castlereagh) was afraid of encouraging litigation, if the stamps should be abandoned; but if they were continued, the poor man was deprived of justice altogether. (Hear.) The load of law taxes had induced thousands to relinquish their legal demands, because they could not pay the duties of the suit. No tax that could be devised could be half so injurious as this: not even a tax on the necessities of life. If, by such a tax as that, an individual were prevented from purchasing a whole loaf, he might purchase perhaps half a one; but no man could obtain justice by halves, or pay for half a writ, if unable to discharge the stamp for the whole. The Legislature should be called on to abandon these duties, which closed the courts of justice against every poor man; taught him to look for irregular means of redress; and destroyed the proudest boast of England—that her law was open to the poor as well as the rich. He would not, however, press his motion, if the noble lord would name a certain day; but if the matter were to be delayed indefinitely, he must now take the sense of the House.

Lord Castlereagh said, it was impossible to name a certain day on such a complicated subject: but it was open to the hon. baronet to apply to the House again, if he thought the interval which might take place too long.

The House then divided:

For the motion 16—Against it 63.

[POLICE IN IRELAND.] Mr. Peel rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend an Act passed in 1814, entitled "An Act for the better execution of the law by means of superintending magistrates, and constables under them." The object of that Act, and of the present Bill, was to supply the deficiencies of the civil power, and to provide an adequate system of police for the disturbed districts of Ireland. If he were called on to say, from his experience of five years, what measure would be most effectual towards producing tranquillity in Ireland, he should say it would be the formation of an adequate civil power. When he considered the situation of Ireland, labouring, as she was, disadvantages arising from political errors of former times, and destitute, for the most part, of an efficient police, he was less surprised that disturbances should have existed, than that they should not have been readily checked. It was true, that Ireland was governed by the same laws as England, and enjoyed the assistance of magistrates in the same degree as ourselves: but she was lamentably destitute of all subordinate civil agents, such as police officers and proper constables, who, in such a country, were almost as necessary as the higher magistrates. The want of these subordinate agents was supplied in an objectionable and expensive manner; powerful, indeed, in a military view, but cumbrous and oppressive in the cases where its assistance was chiefly required: such as in checking illegal distilleries, in preventing and detecting outrages. The constant engine in all such cases was a military force: to this the magistrates looked as to their only arm of power; and if the House considered how inapplicable such a body was to the purposes of patient investigation, required for the bringing to justice past offences, and for the prevention of future crimes, they must wish that means might be found to exchange a system, expensive and objectionable, for one that would be more constitutional and more effectual; and he hoped they would not allow a few partial objections on the face of the measure to countervail a design of the greatest utility. To say nothing of the expense of soldiers, and the danger of subverting the discipline of an army, by splitting it into small divisions, the military were, on many grounds, unfit for the purposes of a police; and, at all events, as likely to be instruments of oppression as of wholesome restraint: he had, therefore, been long considering a proper substitute for the engine at present employed in the civil government of Ireland. At a very early period after he was connected with the Irish Government he attempted something like a civil system of police, namely, that the Lord Lieutenant should be assisted by the magistrates and constables in preserving the peace of the country. The Act which he had introduced on that occasion had passed with the unanimous concurrence of that House: it had, indeed, received the support of an hon. baronet (Sir J. Newport) who was generally opposed to the measures of government; and who, at all periods, had been more anxious to promote those objects which would be most beneficial to the country, of which he was so great an ornament (Hear, hear), than to throw difficulties in the way. The Act of 1814 had been carried into execution in the counties of Tipperary, Down, Clare, and Cavan: and the people generally considered it as a source of real advantage. The whole expense was defrayed by the disturbed districts: but there were many parts of the country in which it was still desirable to act upon the same principles. The absence of the great landed proprietors, and the withdrawing from the country a great part of the revenue, in many districts, where there was the greatest necessity for the application of the Act, had produced considerable difficulty in carrying it into effect. In the north of Ireland the most violent acts had been committed: persons had even acknowledged the crimes of which they had been guilty, but had baffled every attempt of the law to repress their aggressions, and punish their violent proceedings. On almost every occasion of that nature, they had been provided with horses, in order to escape from the infantry, and cavalry who were sent in pursuit of them. In such a state of things, the question with the Government was, not only whether they should suffer such a system to continue, but in what manner it could be prevented. The magistrates had found it necessary to call in the assistance of the military; but they were obliged to find accommodation for a large body of dragoons. It was to provide against the recurrence of measures of that kind that he now proposed the introduction of this Bill. The first clause, he ventured to hope, would meet with the unanimous concurrence of the House. As the law now stood, it was necessary to appoint a superintendent magistrate; but as this led to a great expense, he should propose to dispense with the attendance of those officers. The second clause was, to give the Lord Lieutenant and Council the power of determining what proportion of the expenses should be paid by the disturbed districts, and what should be paid by the country generally. The third clause went, that in all cases a return should be made to Parliament, in the beginning of the next session, of the cases in which the Act had been applied, and of the expenses incurred in its execution. In the last session of Parliament, frequent discussions had taken place as to the large military establishment to be kept up in Ireland; but so far from considering it excessive, it was a tolerably unanimous opinion that it was necessary: but, not only was Ireland to be exempted from the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the Bill for preventing seditious meetings, but a very considerable reduction was proposed to be made in the military establishments of that country. (Hear, hear.) It was intended to reduce the military force from 25,000 to 22,000 men; and seven brigades of 400 guns to 200 guns, whereby a very considerable saving would be produced. He was sure that a very slight consideration of the subject would induce gentlemen to think, that if there had been a regular police in Ireland, the public peace would not have been disturbed; and that the measure which he now proposed was the most beneficial that could be adopted. The right hon. gentleman then concluded with moving, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the said Act of the 54th of the King.

Sir J. Newport observed, that the greatest benefit which the House could confer on Ireland was, a regular constitution of police. If the armed force were to act on all occasions, it would bring the country into a state of military tutelage, which might lead to the most disastrous consequences. Nothing could be so desirable, as that Ireland should be placed in the same situation as Great Britain, and that its Government should be enabled to act without the intervention of a military force. In substituting constables, they were only retracing their steps from the way they had abandoned. The peasantry must be convinced that the laws ought to be enforced—and they must be enforced. He had little, however, or nothing to add to the clear statement made by the right hon. gentleman; and should, therefore, sit down with expressing his entire concurrence with his proposition.—Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

ARMY ESTIMATES.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the Army Estimates.

Mr. Calcraft said, he should defer any observations he might wish to make on this subject, till the committee of finance had made their report; but if that committee did not recommend a reduction of the military force, he should consider it his duty to call the attention of the House to that very important subject.—(Hear, hear.)

The resolutions were then read and agreed to.

Lord Palmerston then moved for leave to bring in the Mutiny Bill, which was agreed to, and the bill was read a first time.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the Bill for more effectually preventing Seditious Meetings.

Sir J. Newport said, that on the third reading he should think it necessary to make some observations on the Orange meetings in Ireland, which now presumed to dictate to the country what should or should not be done within it.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time on Friday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, March 12.

Some further evidence was heard in Bayley's divorce case.

From the nature of the evidence originally given, the ground of divorce was such as rendered it necessary for the House, in case the divorce were granted, to decide that the child was illegitimate: but evidence was given tending to shew, that an act of adultery had been committed, independently of the evidence involving the question as to the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the child.

The Lord Chancellor stated, that the case was one deserving their lordships' most serious consideration. The standing order of the House, requiring a clause to prevent a marriage between the guilty parties, proceeded on the supposition that evidence must be given of adultery committed by the woman with some particular person. It would be hard, however, where adultery should be clearly proved to have been committed, to refuse a divorce, because the particular party could not be pointed out. Then the House would consider long, before it would grant a divorce on evidence which would render it necessary for their lordships originally to decide upon the status of the infant. It was a rule with that House, in granting a divorce, not to alter the state in society of any other individual whatever, and more especially where there was no appearance to defend the interests of that individual. But there was another ground which he particularly recommended to their lordships' attention, which arose from the evidence last given. That evidence went to shew, that the husband having left the country, in the King's service, in March, the wife had first become pregnant in August, so that an act of adultery, if she had so become pregnant, must have been committed. This left at large the question as to the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the child; and he recommended to their lordships, to consider particularly, whether the divorce might not be granted on this last evidence. He moved that the House be summoned farther to consider the case to-morrow, which was ordered.

The mother of the wife had deposed, that the child was baptized as the child of Kelly (with whom the act of adultery was supposed to have been committed) and — Smith, Mrs. Bayley's maiden name. This, on the motion of the Lord Chancellor, was ordered to be expunged.

The rules and regulations of the Millbank Penitentiary were presented, and laid on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, March 12.

GAME LAWS.] Colonel Wood brought in a bill to repeal the acts prohibiting the sale of game; which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.—EXCHEQUER BILLS.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House went into a Committee of Supply. The right hon. gentleman moved, that 18,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills be granted to his Majesty, to exchange for the following Bills outstanding:—

Irish Exchequer Bills . . .	£4,200,000
English Exchequer Bills . .	12,200,000
Ditto, ditto	1,700,000

18,100,000

Mr. Curwen asked what part of the unfunded debt was unprovided for? Were there not five millions?

Mr. Sharp said, that the money-market was now improving, but the issue of Exchequer bills would absorb whatever could be spared. New taxes would be necessary to defray the principal and interest of these bills. If a new Parliament should be called soon, and if it was necessary, when this one had expired, to give it a descriptive title, it might be called the Taxing Parliament. The great evil under which the country at present laboured, was insupportable taxation.

Mr. P. Moore thought that the right hon. gentleman should have given the House a general view of the ways and means, before he called on them to vote particular sums.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answer to the member for Carlisle (Mr. Curwen) said, that the Appendix to the Account of the Unfunded Debt, which had been presented to the House, contained particulars of the sums already provided, and of those which remained to be provided for. As to the observation of the hon. member (Mr. P. Moore) that a general statement of the Ways and Means should be laid before the House, he could only say, that it had not been usual, and it was not very possible to make that statement at so early a period of the session.

Sir J. Newport complained, that the Treasury bills in Ireland had always been issued to the Bank of Ireland, which exacted as high interest from the public, as it would have done from any individual. It was desirable that these bills should be paid off by sums raised here, on account of the interest: care should be taken, however, that, as there was capital in Ireland, which could not now find employment, the commercial interest should not suffer for the want of this mode of investing their money.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not allow that commercial interest was neglected in the transaction of the Irish Treasury, or that it had not benefited as well as the Bank.

Sir J. Newport had occasion to know, that the merchants in Dublin were often for weeks without being able to obtain a single Treasury bill, owing to the mode of transacting business between the Treasury and the Bank.

Mr. Grenfell took the opportunity, suggested by the conversation about the Bank of Ireland, to make some observations about the Bank of England. As his motion was negatived on a former occasion, he was compelled to take this mode of submitting some remarks to the House, and of asking a few questions of the right hon. gentleman opposite. He held in his hands an account of one or two charges, which he would state. In the first place, there was a charge of 1,898*l.* for the management of 4,000,000*l.* of debt transferred to the Bank in 1791. This debt should not be paid at a higher rate than the rest. The rate of charge, however, for managing every million of this debt would amount to 47*½*%; whereas the management of the other parts of the public debt was paid only at 300*l.* Why was there this difference? The sum was but trifling, but why was the public called upon to pay even this trifling sum, without necessity? He would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he meant to take any steps for reducing this charge? He would wait for a reply, and say no more till he heard it; as he wished to bring forward the matters of which he complained piecemeal, expecting from such a mode of proceeding the most satisfactory answer.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having made no reply, the hon. gentleman continued:—As he had got no answer to one question, he would put another, in which he might be more fortunate. In the paper which he held in his hand there was another charge mentioned, equally objectionable with the last: it was a charge of 6,174*l.* for receiving a certain portion of the property tax last year. This was service greatly overpaid. What did the Bank do for such an expense? They received the money from those who were bound to pay it, and might carry it in one week from the Bank to the Exchequer, and for all they received after the rate of half-a-crown for every hundred pounds. (Hear.) He was glad such a charge would not recur; but he thought it should not have been paid: and he asked if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken any steps towards reducing it?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had only one answer to make to both questions—namely, that the committee was not now sitting on the affairs of the Bank. The two charges adverted to by the hon. gentleman had been often explained. The sum of 1,898*l.* paid for the management of four millions of South Sea Stock, was sanctioned by Act of Parliament ever since 1722. As for the per centage on the Property Tax 50,000*l.* had been saved to the country, by that portion of the tax having been thus received.

Mr. Grenfell said, he was in great error, if the charge of 1,898*l.* was sanctioned by Act of Parliament.

The vote was then agreed to.

COLD BATH FIELDS PRISON.] Mr. Ames rose to move for a return of the number of persons confined in Cold Bath Fields Prison, under the 39th and 40th of the King. He made this motion upon good authority, that some of them were in a very deplorable condition, without medical assistance, or the necessary comforts of life. He alluded particularly to the treatment of the elder Evans, (see page 376) who was confined in the same cell with a common thief; whilst his son was shut up in the foul ward of the hospital, exposed to disease and contagion, and was not suffered to have any communication with the father.

Mr. B. Bathurst would not object to the motion; but, with regard to the persons in confinement, he wished the candour of the hon. gent. had allowed him to go a little further, and to acquaint the House with what had passed upon his visit to the prison. He would ask the hon. gent. whether the elder and younger Evans had not both told him that they had nothing to complain of? When the former was first committed, there was no convenient place for his reception; but he had long since occupied the state-room, with the use of four others adjoining it. It was at his own request that the individual with whom he was confined was suffered to stay with him. The younger Evans was said to be confined in the foul ward of the hospital, such was the name given to the infirmary; and to be there exposed to the infection of contagious disorders. Had the hon. gent. ever seen a cleaner or more comfortable apartment? The fact was, that next to the state-room, it was the most desirable part of the prison, and had been so acknowledged by the young man himself. He had likewise the privilege of walking in the gaoler's garden, of which he frequently availed himself. There was but one patient at present in the infirmary, with a distemper in the leg; and he repeated, that the hon. gent. must have found that neither of the prisoners were disposed to complain of any of the circumstances incidental to their confinement.

Mr. Bennet said, that the term foul-ward of the hospital was the expression of the gaoler himself. He found, that whilst the father was confined with one thief, the son was condemned to the society of six. His observations had not been founded on what either of these individuals might be pleased with; he spoke as a public man, when he maintained that it was highly improper that two persons, accused of high treason, should be confined in the company of thieves and informers.

Mr. Canning observed, that the complaint of the hon. gent. was a sort of speculative feeling as to the nature of these confinements. The ground of complaint was, that these prisoners were allowed to have companions. He remembered a story of a man who was placed in solitary confinement having made a spider his companion: he watched its motions, fed it, and taught it to spin its web in a peculiar way; but the malicious gaoler observing the pleasure he derived from this mode of diverting his mind, killed the spider, when the unhappy prisoner exclaimed, that he felt a pang more severe than he had ever endured in his life. If the hon. gent., therefore, wished to have the associates of Mr. Evans removed, let the House of Commons, and Mr. Evans himself, remember, that it was the hon. member who had killed his spider. (A laugh.)

The returns were then ordered.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Sefton presented a petition from Liverpool, praying for Retrenchment and Reform. The noble lord stated, that every obstruction was offered to the business and views of the meeting in which the petition originated. The mayor had refused to convene a meeting pursuant to the requisition, which was respectably signed. He (the noble lord) particularly reprobated the conduct of those who endeavoured to prevent the people from assembling in a legal way, and expressing their grievances and their prayers to the Legislature. He thought persons who so stepped in between the Parliament and the people, were injuring the character of the former in the exact proportion that they obstructed the views of the latter. (Hear, hear, hear.) As the petitioners in this case could not obtain the sanction of the mayor, they could only assemble by themselves. (Hear.) They were determined to exercise their rights, and accordingly assembled. They called to preside at their meeting, an active magistrate, (Colonel Williams) well known to many of the members of the House, whose character needed no praise from him. (Hear.) At the meeting, there was the greatest good order, and the greatest decorum in conducting the business: though every provocation was offered to riot and disturbance, by insulting and unnecessary precautions against them. (Hear, hear.) A regiment of the line was called out, under arms, and the yeomanry cavalry were on duty. Notwithstanding this expectation of violence and tumult, nothing could be more praiseworthy than the conduct of the meeting. The present petition was unanimously agreed to, and signed by 14,000 persons. A petition more respectably signed was never presented to the House. (Hear.) It would be transgressing the bounds of truth if he should say that he was acquainted with all the petitioners; but with some of them he had the good fortune to be intimately acquainted, and others of them he was proud to call his particular friends. (Hear, hear.) The petitioners, after attributing our sufferings to unjust, ruinous, and impolitic wars—to an extravagant and uncontrolled expenditure of the public money—to unmerited pensions and excessive salaries—threw themselves on the wisdom of the House for such a redress of their grievances as it might think practicable, and for such a Reform of Parliament as it might think expedient and effective. (Hear, hear.) Such was the temperate prayer of the petition, conveyed in the most appropriate and respectful language. He knew not why the usual channels of conveying their application to the House had not been resorted to on the present occasion by the petitioners; nor was he acquainted with any reason why he should be selected for such an honour; but he was as happy to execute the commission, as he was proud to be intrusted with it. (Hear, hear.) He felt a greater pleasure in being made the instrument of communicating to the House this petition, as he concurred entirely in its prayer, and as anxiously desired a radical and constitutional Reform, as he decidedly reprobated, and would strenuously resist, the wild and mischievous theories afloat upon the subject. (Cries of hear.)

Mr. Birch did not wish to destroy the effect of the able speech of the noble lord who had presented the petition, by stating any thing additional in its support. He could not help informing the House, however, that he held in his hand the requisition by which the meeting was called, and there could not be found in the kingdom names more respectable than those by which it was signed. They were not only people of great respectability in point of education and worth, but several of them were men of great opulence. The hon. member could not forbear saying, that the prayer of the petition had his most hearty concurrence. (Hear.)

Mr. Benson rose to defend the character of the mayor. He was justified in his fears of disturbance, by the outrages that had not long ago occurred in the town. He refused to lend his sanction to the meeting because he dreaded their renewal. His apprehensions were such that they could only be allayed by calling in the force to which the noble lord had alluded, and which contributed powerfully to make the meeting so orderly and respectable as it was represented (Shouts of hear, hear, from both sides.) He did not deny that the requisitionists were respectable, or that the signatures of the petition were not so likewise: he only rose to defend the character of a worthy magistrate from misrepresentation.

Mr. Birch called upon the hon. gentleman (Mr. Benson) to state to what outrages he had alluded, as he never heard of outrages before. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Lord Cochrane could not help saying a few words about the fear of disturbance entertained by the mayor of Liverpool. At none of the meetings for Reform had there been any tendency to confusion or disturbance. Conduct of this kind was left to meetings of a different description. He had never seen such an irregular and disorderly meeting as he yesterday attended in Hampshire, called by the sheriff, (Hear, and a laugh,) and attended by the whole of the parsons, and their friends. (A laugh.) A Covent-garden riot, with all its apparatus of noise, marrow-bones and cleavers, could not have been more outrageous than this. (Hear, and a laugh.) The meeting was called for the purpose of collecting and conveying to the Prince Regent the congratulations of the country on his escape from the late atrocious attack on his person; but, instead of expressing the sentiments of the inhabitants, the freeholders only were allowed to vote. There was no outrage where there was perfect freedom: the outrage rose from unjust opposition. Here the inhabitants were not allowed to express their sentiments; and the consequence was, that the meeting became so disorderly, that it was dismissed without executing completely the objects it had in view; it was dismissed without settling in what way the address was to be presented, the persons who were to present it, or voting thanks to the high sheriff who presided. When he heard meetings for Reform called disorderly and tumultuous, which in no case they had been, he could not help stating, that this was the most turbulent and riotous that ever he attended; and that the parsons were the ringleaders in the confusion. (Hear, and a laugh.)

A Member said he was present at the meeting described by the noble lord, and allowed that it was noisy and turbulent. The noise was raised as much by the one side as the other. The address was, however, carried by a vast majority, and it was not ascertained that they were all freeholders. The sheriff found that the only way to take the votes was by making those for the address go to the one side, and those against it to the other; and notwithstanding that many inhabitants, not freeholders, might have voted, there were five for the address to one against it. (Hear.) Nobody could be heard on either side. (Hear.)

Lord Cochrane confessed that he could not be heard. (Hear.)

Mr. Brougham felt it his duty to call the attention of the House to the gratuitous assertions of the member for Stafford, relative to some notorious outrages which he stated to have taken place in the town of Liverpool. He called upon the hon. member to declare, at what time these outrages had been committed, as his statement otherwise would have very little weight with the House. He concurred in the observations made by his noble friend upon the unconstitutional proceeding of the mayor, in obstructing the communication between the people and the House; and although this was the first, he hoped it would not be the last time they should have the advantage of hearing the sentiments of his noble friend. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Benson said, he had spoken of tumults which, from his own personal knowledge, originated in Liverpool, and he believed the mobs never were more violent than when the hon. and learned gentleman headed them. (Order, order.)

Mr. Brougham observed, that after this second assertion of the hon. gent. he should call on the right hon. gent. opposite, (Mr. Canning), and an hon. general, the other representative for Liverpool (General Gascoyne) to negative it; they were both present at the time of the election referred to, and were capable of giving the fullest contradiction to a charge which he now heard made for the first time—a charge of having led on a tumultuous assembly to acts of riot and mischief.

Mr. Benson spoke to order: and said he had distinctly acquitted the hon. and learned gent. of any mischievous design; he had applied that word generally to the mob itself.

Mr. Brougham was by no means satisfied with the distinction taken by the hon. gentleman; and again called on the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), who, he was sure, was incapable of saying one thing to him on that occasion, and another thing at present to the House, to say, whether it was not agreed on all sides at the time, that there never had been a political contest in which so large a number of persons had been engaged, that was conducted with such tranquillity. It was an observation made at the close of the election, that it had resembled rather a peaceful pageant than a popular struggle. He had seen the hon. member on that occasion on the hustings, and might appeal, therefore, to his more accurate recollection.

General Gascoyne declared, that in the various contests which had taken place for the representation of Liverpool, during the last 20 years, in which he had been personally interested, he remembered none which had been carried on with the occurrence of so few acts of violence, or in which more strenuous efforts were made for the prevention of outrage.

Mr. Canning thought it fair to mention his belief, that no exertion had been spared on either side to repress every tendency to riot and disorder during the period of the election. He believed his hon. friend had confounded it with a subsequent election, which, certainly, was one continued scene of outrage, extending even to acts of personal violence. Although his hon. friend was incorrect, however, with regard to the particular occasion, the fact was undoubted, that tumults had prevailed to such a degree as to form a complete justification of the precautions adopted by the mayor. With respect to the petition now before the House, he was not desirous of creating any impediment to its being laid upon the table; although he had heard of certain practices which were resorted to for the purpose of obtaining signatures, and which were, he believed, pretty frequent on such occasions. Amongst the 14,000 signatures attached to this petition, he was informed that many were those of the softer sex, and some those of persons of tender age. (A laugh.) He did not mean to object to it on this account; but thought, on the contrary, that it should be treated with peculiar indulgence at a time when so much was said in favour of the principle of Universal Suffrage.

Mr. Brougham considered the right hon. gentleman's defence of his hon. friend more ingenious than satisfactory. He desired to know, if the hon. gent. had only mistaken one election for another, how he had been induced to believe that he had seen him actually at the head of the mob; when the fact was, that he was not in Liverpool at the time alluded to?

Mr. Benson had made the observation as applicable generally to the place in which the late meeting was held, which was the theatre of constant riot and disorder by mobs of every description; and his only view in so doing was to justify the mayor, who acted from no other motive than an anxiety to preserve the peace.

Mr. Brougham—Now the explanation of the hon. member is intelligible. If he merely means to say, that the persons whom I had the honour of addressing on that occasion, the persons who were kind enough to take an active part in the promotion of what they considered my interest, were remarkably numerous, I can have nothing to object to him.

Mr. Curwen reprobated the conduct of the mayor, of which there had been too many examples throughout the country, in presuming to attribute a riotous disposition to public meetings, for the purpose of calling out the military and stifling the voice of the people. (Hear, hear.) He was sorry to say, that a riot had lately taken place in the county which he inhabited; this, however, had falsely been ascribed to the operation of Spencean principles—principles which, he was sure, had never been heard of by the populace concerned in the tumults; and which, he believed, they would reject if attempted to be taught them. The fact was, that it had arisen solely from the pressure of want, and was totally unconnected with the slightest enmity or disaffection to the Government.

The petition was then read, and ordered to lie upon the table.

Lord Sefton thought it necessary to observe, with reference to the statement of the right hon. gentleman, of his understanding many of the signatures to be those of women and children, that his information was directly contrary: and that if the right hon. gentleman's intelligence was derived from the quarter to which he had formerly resorted, he was disposed to rely quite as much on the correctness and veracity of his own information.

Gen. Gascoyne knew many of the names attached to this petition to be highly respectable; nor did he think there was any thing wonderful in the number of the signatures, when it was considered that the population of Liverpool amounted to 120,000 persons. When the meeting spoke, however, of withdrawing their confidence from their representatives, he must observe, that he did not conceive he had been ever honoured with it, or that the persons of whom the meeting was composed were amongst those who had sent him to Parliament. Upon the subject of Parliamentary Reform, he believed that, in practice, the present was the best system of representation which had ever existed; and that the influence of peers, and of property in general, was as great in counties as in boroughs.

The order of the day being then read for resuming the adjourned debate on the petitions presented for a Reform in Parliament,

The Speaker begged to inform the House, that he had caused the several petitions on this subject to be sorted. The total number presented by the hon. bart. (Sir F. Burdett) was 527; of these, one had no name subscribed or annexed; two had no names signed on the same paper; 28 were of the same import as those which were negatived for lying on the table; 468 were printed; 11 were the same as the Halifax petition, which was received; four were the same as the petition from Hollingwood, which was rejected. Thirteen were petitions on various other subjects. The question, therefore, in regular order now before the House was, that the first petition be read.

Lord Castlereagh said, that as this petition was not signed, it must be considered as a nonentity. He should, therefore, move, that it be rejected.

This motion being carried without any farther observations,

The Speaker then said, that the next question was, as to the two petitions which had no signature on the same paper.

Lord Castlereagh moved, that these petitions also be rejected, which was carried nem. con.

The Speaker said, the next question was, as to the petitions that were of the same nature, and couched in the same language, as those which the House had already rejected.

Sir F. Burdett considered, that this question deserved the most serious attention. By the law of the land, the subject had a right to petition the King, and both Houses of Parliament. The Bill of Rights had secured this inestimable privilege to him, and it had been always regarded as one of the greatest bulwarks of our liberties. In the petitions then before the House, various grievances were complained of: but, particularly, the want of a proper representation of the people. On a former night, the House had objected to several petitions on the same subject, on account of certain expressions that were introduced into them. The noble lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh) had objected, that the petitioners said, the present House of Commons did not represent the country. This was so comprehensive an objection, that the House had better say at once, it would not receive any petition for a Reform of Parliament. In what way could the petitioners ask for relief, if they were to be precluded from stating what was so notoriously true? On former occasions, strong suspicions only were entertained, that seats in that House were bought and sold; but never till of late had this shocking and disgraceful practice been brought to light, and the fact established beyond the power of contradiction. "You, Sir," said Sir F. Burdett, addressing himself to the Speaker, "have expressed your strongest disapprobation of this vile traffic; and shall the people, then, be told, that they must not complain of such things? There are no words, Sir, that the people can employ on this subject which your own indignation has not anticipated. If our ancestors, as you have observed, would have started with horror on hearing of these practices, why may not the people now complain that the House of Commons does not contain a fair and legitimate representation of the country?" Other gentlemen had objected, that the petitioners introduced words merely to insult the House, instead of confining themselves to the grievances of which they complained; but was it fair to search out matters of this kind, and to look over all that part of the petition which complained of real grievances? Finding, however, that different gentlemen objected upon different grounds, it was impossible for him to know what would be agreeable to the House. Some hon. members certainly did not like to be told that they did not represent the people; but it was equally certain, and they themselves knew, that they did not sit there as the representatives of the people, nor could the people hope to have any grievances redressed by their exertions. He must contend, then, that these petitions ought to be received. If the House thought otherwise, it was of the utmost importance to the country that they should come to some decision, in order that the people might know in what language the House would be inclined to lend their ears to grievances. (Hear.)

Mr. G. W. Wynn conceived, that it was the intention of the petitioners to throw needless abuse on the House. It was utterly impossible to prescribe what language should be used on these occasions; but the House must judge, from the general body of the petition, whether it were a bonâ fide expression of grievances, or only intended as an insult. He should wish the House to revert to its regular practice: petitioners were not to use any language they thought fit. Many of these persons stated, that if Parliament had been reformed, the war would not have taken place. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) But no war could be cited that was more popular than the war of 1793. He had heard, however, that the form of a petition had been agreed upon in London, and afterwards printed; and that reams of this printed petition were sent into the country, recommended by a signature which he did not believe to be the hon. baronet's, but which appeared to be a fac-simile of his hand-writing. He could not think, therefore, that this petition presented a view of the sentiments of the country. The House must stand upon the ways of their forefathers: and feeling this, he should vote that these petitions be rejected.

Lord Cochrane said, that after all the distresses and privations which the people had so patiently endured, they had received that return which they did not expect, namely, a suspension of the Constitution. The House had been led to adopt certain measures which the state of the country did not justify; and which, he firmly believed, were only intended to prevent persons from meeting again in order to state their grievances. No instance whatever had occurred of any disturbance at any of those meetings; but Ministers had a particular object in alarming the timid. They now called upon the landed gentlemen to rally round them: but what was the situation in which those gentlemen stood? Why, it was neither more nor less than this—that they were about to be plundered of their property by the fluctuating state of the currency. The hon. member below had said, that the war of 1793 was extremely popular. Yes, Ministers then found means to frighten the country, by giving out that Buonaparte was coming in a great hurry to invade us; and now they told the country gentlemen, that the Spenceans were about to seize on their estates, and, therefore, they should rally round the Ministers. He hoped, however, that this delusion would not last. It was impossible, he thought, that men of judgment and experience should not soon see through it. The petitions then before the House complained of real grievances, and it would be a most offensive measure if they should resolve to reject them.

The Attorney-General was surprised to hear the noble lord say, that Ministers had found means to prevent public meetings; for, unless the names of the members for Westminster had been forged, there was to be a meeting to-morrow, not to desire the people to rally round Ministers, but to address the Prince Regent for their removal. The noble lord had said, there had been no riot or disturbance at any of the public meetings; but surely he must have been out of the country for the last six months, or he could not have been so ignorant of what had taken place. The language of these petitions was a direct insult to the House; and, therefore, he should vote for their rejection.

Lord Cochrane explained.

Mr. J. Martin thought the less offensive mode would be, not to reject the petitions, but to vote that they could not be received on account of their irregularity.

Sir G. Heathcote said, the House ought not to refuse to pay attention to the petitioners, merely because they alleged that the House did not represent the country. Great offence had been taken at one of the expressions in these petitions; namely, where the petitioners spoke of "the disgusting debates in that House." He would now ask, upon a day like this, when it was known that upwards of 500 petitions were to be considered, what was the situation of the House? Most of the gentlemen had retired to take their dinners very comfortably, and the petitions of the people of England were treated with contempt. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. B. Bathurst said, if gentlemen had retired, it was only because they knew that 400 of the petitions were printed, and, therefore, could not be received. The question of Parliamentary Reform would be fully discussed when the hon. bart. (Sir F. Burdett) should bring forward his motion.

Mr. Abercromby said, there was no part of the Constitution which he valued or cherished so much as the right of petition; but the case was materially changed; not as it might affect that House, but as it might affect the liberties of the people, when the right of petitioning was brought into contempt. What he complained of was, that persons had signed these petitions, well knowing that they could not be received. The House of Commons had great reason to complain of this conduct, not on account of themselves, but as it regarded the welfare of the people.

Mr. Jones could not conceive that any petition ought to be received couched in language the House had already rejected.

Mr. Smyth was against the rejection of the petitions, though he disapproved of the terms in which they were couched.

The question was then put, and the petitions couched in the same language as some that had been negatived by the House, were rejected. On the question being put, that the 468 printed petitions should be read.

Mr. W. Wynn stated, that the question had been agitated in 1656, in 1793, and in 1813: on the latter occasion it had been decided, that printed petitions should not be received; and six days afterwards a petition from Major Cartwright, for leave to present a printed petition, was refused. Nothing could be more publicly known than the decision thus entered on the journals of the House. [At the request of the hon. gent. the clerk then read the entry of 1793, which applied only to private petitions; but that of 1813 related to a public petition from the town of Nottingham.] He thought that these entries established the rule, and believed that these petitions were presented for the purpose of being rejected, and producing exasperation. He thought the rule a reasonable one, calculated to prevent the manufacturing of petitions in London for the purpose of being sent down to be signed, instead of offering a genuine expression of the sentiments of the people. We had lately seen the effect of this manufacture, of which whole reams had been sent down to be signed. On these grounds he thought the petitions ought to be rejected: and that, if the House had before testified its displeasure on such occasions, the hon. bart. would not now have presented them.

Sir W. Geary thought the House should pause before it rejected the petitions. The rule of 1665, on which the others were grounded, did not apply to the question, and at all events the House ought to exercise its judgment on every individual occasion. Though he disapproved of the language, and differed from the sentiments of the petitioners, he thought they had a right to petition in print; and the hon. gent. below (Mr. Wynn) had given no one reason why the order he referred to should have been made. If he (Sir W.) were to present a petition to the people for their signature, he should wish them first to understand it; and he knew no mode so immediately conducive to that object as to shew them the petition in print. (Hear, hear.) He was convinced the petitions ought to be received.

Mr. W. Quin observed, with respect to the resolution that referred to private petitions, that all petitions in a parliamentary sense were private which did not come from a public body.

Sir F. Burdett felt aware, that he should be only wasting time in discussing the question at present, seeing the treasury benches, and those behind them, so full, and those on his own side of the House so empty. But having already delayed the question so long, he thought he might be deemed blameable if he deferred it any longer. It was satisfactory to him, however, that the cause itself stood on so strong grounds that nothing had been said to impugn it; and he thought the hon. gent. (Mr. Wynn) who seemed so conversant with this subject, and so extremely well versed in the journals of the House (though indeed he had unluckily selected an entry that by no means suited his purpose), might have recollected that a private order did not bind the House on all occasions: and more especially did not bind it in the case of petitions of the utmost importance to the subject—petitions against a grievance the most dangerous and inveterate of any, namely, the corrupt state of that House. However, the rule of 1656 could now be of no force whatever; the rule was framed by Cromwell's creatures, placed in that House by himself, and not one of them allowed to enter Parliament till he was furnished with a ticket from the soldiers who surrounded the doors. That was not a period from which a precedent could be drawn for the guidance of future times. (Hear, hear, hear.) The rule in question, too, related only to private petitions; and whether or no the hon. gent. conceived that the clerk ought to have read "printed" for "private," and had made a mistake, from his having been so long accustomed to read written instruments only, it was easy to see, that the rule was aimed against a practice that prevailed at one time, of prejudicing the sentiments of members, by distributing printed petitions on private matters; and it was in order to prevent the printing and circulation of petitions, and the canvassing members with such views, that the rule in question was framed—the rule on which the whole argument against receiving these petitions rested: a foundation more sandy on which to rest an argument against receiving the sentiments of thousands of petitions it was impossible to conceive. The hon. gent. had referred to the discussions that took place in 1793; and how did they apply? Previous to Mr. Grey's motion for a Reform of Parliament, a petition was presented from the town of Norwich, by Mr. Hobart, and he (rather extraordinarily for the presenter of a petition) started a doubt, whether the petition, being printed, could with propriety be received. The doubt was immediately caught at, in the same manner as at present. The Speaker being applied to, referred to this order, as proving that it was against the practice of the House to receive printed petitions. Mr. Fox said, that no such order was directed against public petitions; and that private petitions only were within the construction and spirit of the rule. Of nine members who spoke on the subject, five were for receiving the petition, two were against it, and two doubtful. Mr. Sheridan then requested the honourable member who had presented the petition to withdraw it, for that day at least, in order to allow the more time to the important motion that was coming on to be discussed: the petition was in consequence withdrawn, so that nothing was settled by this entry of 1793. (Hear, hear.) And the discussion itself stood only on the doubtful rule of Cromwell's Parliament. In 1819, reference was made to this supposed rule of 1793, and a division certainly took place, which could be now of no force; as it went on the supposition of a rule that never existed: or existed only in such a manner, that it could not be made the ground of proceeding at the present moment. (Hear, hear.) If, then, no order existed against the practice, we must come to the reason of the thing; which, after all, was of much stronger avail than any order whatever. When we considered this part of the question, no objection whatever could be found against the reception of printed petitions, or none which might not with equal force be urged against the reception of written ones: on the contrary, there were many objections to written petitions which could not be adduced against petitions that were printed. Printed petitions were read and comprehended with much greater facility and accuracy than those which were written; and every man was able to see and understand what he was to sign. Printed petitions were not so liable to be altered as written ones, and every man who signed them must feel greater assurance that nothing but what he had signed would be presented to the House. The Bill of Rights, which ensured the right of petitioning to the subject, did not attempt to shackle it in any way, or to prefer one mode of petitioning to another. It did not require a goose-quill to be made use of rather than a steel pen; or say that one sort of ink should be made use of rather than another. The printed form, he would contend, was the best. The King had no objection to receive a printed petition; the House of Lords had received a printed petition, and had actually made an entry of the receipt of one shortly after the Nottingham petition had been withdrawn in the House of Commons; though they certainly had said that it should not be drawn into a precedent: but why this reservation was made he could not conceive; and should the House of Commons reject petitions after this, and obstruct the right of petitioning in the most dangerous manner? Formerly no objections were made to any paper that was offered; but this course having produced inconveniences, an order was made in 1780 that all petitions should be signed; but no order was made that they should be written by the signer; and all the reasons of the thing were the other way. Indeed, if any such order had been made, there was the strongest reason on the present occasion for suspending such an order, even though it were suspended with a reservation like that of the House of Lords, that the instance should not be drawn into precedent. A case of such magnitude as the prayer of 468 petitions would justify the suspension of any order on a point of practice; but, in reality, the House could not make that order, it could not obstruct the right of petitioning. Even as to irrelevant or casually offensive matter, the House ought not to be too nice on all occasions; that, however, was not the present question. But no reason whatever had been given for the rejection of petitions, merely because they were printed. One hon. gentleman had recommended a very odd way of getting rid of the difficulty. "Can't you (said he,) call the petitions private, and then reject them by the rule of Cromwell's Parliament?" Certainly, the petitions might be got rid of in that manner; but they could not, in any rational sense of the word, be called private petitions. He (Sir F. B.) felt the difficulty of a person, who had to prove a self-evident proposition; like a man who is called on to prove he is innocent, when, in fact, it — the other side who should have shewn him to be guilty. Gentlemen on the opposite benches should shew why these petitions ought not to be received. A lecture had been read to him and he had been told he ought to refuse to present a petition, if it was couched in language the House had before rejected. On this point, however, he had acted on his own judgment, and to the best of his judgment; and he should never present a petition the less because the House rejected its fellow. The laws of that House were not, like those of the Medes and Persians, irrevocable; and it frequently happened that a vote given on one day had been reversed the next, by the complaisant concurrence of gentlemen on the treasury benches. (Hear, hear.) In the affair of Lord Melville, the House had one day, on the instigation of Mr. Pitt, voted that his lordship should be tried by a jury; and the very next day, on the same Minister's representation, revoked the trial by jury, and ordered an impeachment. He, therefore, (Sir F.) might reasonably hope to find the House in better humour on some occasions than on others; and might fairly expect that a petition rejected one day might stand a chance of being received the next; and, certainly, if a petition couched in terms that had been rejected came from a distance, he should feel it his duty not to send it back, but at least to offer it to the discretion of the House. As to what had been urged with so much vehemence concerning petitions that had been sent down into the country for signature, what objection could possibly be made to such a practice? The petitions must be drawn up somewhere, for it never could be supposed that all the thousands who signed could each draw up their own petition; it was sufficiently in their power to dissent from the terms of a petition by refusing to sign it; and what more could be required or expected? It might as well be contended, that a bond already drawn up and presented for signature, was not the bond of the person who signed it, as that these petitions did not contain the sentiments of their subscribers. They were much more easily read when presented in a printed form; and if they were not drawn up ready for signatures, how could their contents be acquiesced in or dissented from? Could it be seriously supposed, that a man without influence could prevail on thousands to sign against their inclinations, for the sake of furthering some project of his own? Besides, how did Ministers act on such occasions themselves; how did they get signatures to their petitions and declarations? Did they not go about to taverns and bankers' shops, thrusting their printed declarations into every hand, and compelling signatures from those who feared their interests might suffer if they refused? (Hear, hear, hear.) With them, indeed, all practices were considered fair; with those who wished to check them in their career of ruin, all was complained against as foul. Upon the whole, a body of public opinion had been raised on facts which admitted of no denial, that the representation in the House of Commons was altogether corrupt. Gentlemen might rail, but they could not erase the signatures from the bond, or stem the torrent of general reprehension. They might contend, that some monster of terror—some magician with his wand (who, in fact, was no other than a very honest-hearted individual, acting in all things for the best), could issue his petitions, north and south, and countervail all the efforts and tricks of Ministers. But, if they wished to consult the dignity of the House (not the dignity of being hated, as Junius calls it), if they wished to preserve the respect and affections of the people, without any hateful admixture of the oderint dum metuant, they would never reject the prayers of the subject, because they were offered in a form of all others the most convenient and the least objectionable. Arguments of this sort, he was aware, would carry little weight in a quarter where the sic volo, sic jubeo, was sure to carry a majority; but he felt it his duty to take a division on the question, however small that division might prove.

Mr. W. Wynn offered a few words in explanation.

Lord Castlereagh contended, that if the House believed that the hon. baronet really wished the petitions to be received, they must perceive that he had not argued the cause in a way to ensure their reception. The hon. baronet had presented them in the face of a rule, the existence of which was publicly known; and he had said nothing to shew that the rule did not form a part of the practice of Parliament. It was indeed a little extraordinary that the hon. baronet should cavil at the expressions of the rule in question, as he himself was one of the tellers on the division that took place shortly after the question came before Parliament, on the Nottingham petition. He (lord C.) would contend, that these were private petitions in the parliamentary acceptance of the word private, and within the obvious construction of the rule; and the hon. baronet could not shew a single usage to the contrary. He had, indeed, shewn the usage of the other House; but that was in a case which was expressly prohibited from being drawn into question, and therefore told against the hon. baronet. Anxious as he (lord C.) was to receive the petitions in question, and to preserve in all its privileges the right of petitioning, yet he thought the systematic trade of framing petitions, and calling meetings for the purpose of breaking the peace of the country, ought by every means to be checked in its growth. God forbid that he should impute to any of those who signed these 468 petitions, any settled design against the Government of the country; they were most of them, he believed, misguided and deluded individuals; but he knew that designing men went about the country, availing themselves of the rights of the people, for the purpose of calling meetings, in which they might exert every faculty, and rouse the passions of the people, for putting them in movement towards a general rebellion. Meetings, such as these, must be brought under the eye of the law; and it was necessary that the House should hold fast to the established rule, and not relax it, in order to give facilities to individuals who were employed in this metropolis for the sole purpose of fabricating petitions to excite discontent. There never was a moment in which it was more necessary than at the present to consult the dignity of Parliament; and as it was clear that the rules and practice of the House were against the entertaining of printed petitions, he should vote against the motion.

Mr. Smyth wished to give every latitude to the admission of petitions; but he could not help thinking that the hon. baronet, whatever his intentions might be, was actually following that course which was most calculated to defeat the right of petitioning. When the petitions of the people bore marks of conveying their own sentiments, the House ought to receive with indulgence any expressions they might contain; but the case was very different when they were couched in terms which appeared to have been dictated. It appeared, that in 1813, the House had come to a decision founded on former precedents, against receiving printed petitions, and he saw no reason for now reversing that decision.

Sir Egerton Brydges was satisfied that the petitions proposed to be laid on the table had all proceeded from one source. That circumstance afforded strong presumptive evidence, that they were not the sense of the people.

Mr. Boswell opposed the motion. The House could not be surprised at there being such a similarity in their form and expressions, when they were aware that they had all proceeded from the same hand and mind. The old gentleman who presided over this department, in the course of last summer, left his stationary labours in Palace-yard, and became a wandering star for the illumination of the most remote parts of the United Kingdom. He visited the manufacturing towns of England and Scotland; and there found a market for his own manufacture, among the poorer and more ignorant part of the population. In several of the petitions the signatures were in one handwriting; and one, into which he had accidentally looked, was signed by a woman, of rather, indeed, an imposing name: it was Mrs. Cannon.

Mr. Peter Moore had heard no sufficient reason assigned for not receiving the petitions. The order which had been read against receiving private petitions, printed and circulated, was perfectly intelligible. There were many instances in the courts below of objections to the circulation of printed applications, founded, he supposed, upon the same ground as the order of 1665. They were objected to on the same principle as tampering with a jury would be considered objectionable. A noble lord, who had a seat in the other House of Parliament, had once been sent for six months to Newgate, for an offence connected with the circulation of printed petitions. If there were really fears of the existence of a secret fire, concealment was not the best way of extinguishing it. If any machinations were going on against the State, the best way was to give every encouragement to petitioning, in order that the House might not remain in ignorance of the opinions and feelings of the country at such a crisis: but he was far from placing any confidence in the assertions of the reports which had been presented to Parliament, which he considered as gross libels on the people. His opinion in this respect could not be altered by any ex post facto evidence which might hereafter be brought forward in support of these reports, as had been done in a similar case in Ireland. That country was, in 1793, declared to be full of treasonable practices: and when trials took place two years afterwards, it was strongly enough contended, that those trials proved the truth of the preceding declaration. He saw no just ground, either on precedent or reason, for objecting to printed petitions, and should therefore support the motion.

The House divided—

Ayes 6

Noes 59

Majority against receiving printed petitions } —52

A great number of the petitions for Reform against which there was no objection were then received and ordered to lie on the table.

The Lords' Amendments to the Treasonable Practices Bill, and the Soldiers' and Seamen's Seduction Bill, were taken into consideration and agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, March 13.

[BAYLEY'S DIVORCE.] The Lord Chancellor moved that the consideration of this case be farther postponed till Monday, with a view to examine the witnesses more particularly to the act of adultery as unconnected with the question of legitimacy. The act in that view was not, in his opinion, as yet sufficiently proved, though it might be proved by a more particular examination of the witnesses.

The consideration of the case was accordingly postponed till Monday.

[REFORM, SINECURES, &c.] Earl Grosvenor presented a petition from Shawford in Gloucestershire, praying for a repeal of the corn laws, for an income tax in place of the assessed taxes and taxes on consumption, and for Parliamentary Reform. His lordship also presented a petition from Southwark, praying for Retrenchment and Reform. On presenting these petitions his lordship observed, that he certainly could not agree with the Gloucestershire petitioners in the prayer for the restoration of the income-tax. On the contrary, he was very decidedly of opinion, that nothing could have been more beneficial to the country than the repeal of that tax: but he thought it his duty to present any petition which was couched in respectful terms. As to the Southwark petition, he fully concurred in the prayer of the petitioners; who, in their prayer for economy, included the abolition of sinécures. The public mind was certainly at present in a diseased state; there existed a spirit which was not to be put down by force, but by conciliation. They had heard of meetings of 30,000 men, whose object, as it appeared on the face of the proceeding, was to go to Carlton-House to undeceive the Prince Regent. How they intended to effect that, did not appear; but certainly they would have had in their favour one strong argument, which was wanting to himself and others in that House, who urged the propriety of the abolition of sinécures, and the necessity, in the present circumstances of the country, for economy and retrenchment, and that argument was physical force. But this proved how diseased the state of the public mind was, when five or six itinerant orators could have persuaded such a multitude to set out on such a design—in which, however, their career was stopped. It had been objected, the other night, to his motion, that the places to which he referred were not sinécures nor useless: and it had been said, that when a place was proved to be useless, the recommendation to abolish it would be adopted. He trusted he should be able on some future occasion to point out a number of places which were either entirely useless, or places of such a description that the emoluments might be greatly reduced; and then he hoped that the noble lords who had voted against his motion the other night, would concur with him in the abolition or regulation of these places; for he should be sorry that, in the present state of the public mind, the people should be left to despair. He repeated, that there was a spirit abroad which was not to be repressed by force, but which must be met with conciliation. It might be checked by force for a time, but it would return with greater violence, and produce a political earthquake, which would overturn from the foundation every institution from which this country derived strength, security, and happiness.

The Earl of Lauderdale rose merely for the purpose of stating, that the discussion the other night had been, not whether sinécures and useless places ought to be abolished, but whether the places to which the noble earl alluded were useless or not. The places were, in reality, not sinécures, nor were they useless: many of them were useful for the public service: and as to the emolument, they were not to look merely to the manual labour that might be necessary for the duties of any particular office, but to the responsibility. He was fully persuaded, that, if the noble earl's system were carried into effect, the consequences would not only not be beneficial, but extremely pernicious to the public. These were the grounds on which those noble lords had proceeded who had voted against the noble earl's resolutions: yet they had at the same time stated, that if particular offices or places were pointed out and proved to be useless, they would vote for the abolition of these places. He did not wish to renew the discussion. His object was by this explanation to prevent the notion from being carried abroad, that the House had refused to abolish sinécures and useless places. The resolutions had been negatived because there was no evidence that the places were sinécures, or useless.

Lord Holland observed, that he must say, in support of the resolutions for which he had voted the other night, that those resolutions went to this merely—that the places should be abolished if entirely useless; or, if useful in some degree, that the emoluments should be reduced to the level of the services performed. The term sinécure might perhaps be an inaccurate one; and, in order to gratify his noble friend, he should be very glad if Johnson's Dictionary, or some other dictionary, were searched, in order to find a more appropriate one. But many of the offices which had been designated as sinécures and useless places, were such as called for regulation; and it would be difficult for his noble friend to shew, that the services rendered, if any were rendered, were at all adequate to the emoluments paid by the public.

Earl Grosvenor said, that his resolutions were general, and would, if adopted, have pledged the House to no more than this—that such offices as were mere sinécures should be abolished; and that such places as were nearly sinécures, though not absolutely so, should be reduced in point of emolument to the level of the services performed. This was all that he required: and yet to these resolutions their lordships had been pleased to give a negative.

Lord Holland wished to know from his noble friend (Lauderdale) whether he really considered the House as having voted that useless places ought not to be abolished?

Earl of Lauderdale said, that the only question was, whether the places were useless; and he was anxious that the notion should not go abroad that the House had refused to abolish useless places. The noble earl had proposed certain abstract resolutions, couched in terms which were in a great measure indefinite, and had called upon the House to vote for those resolutions. The answer was, that there was no proof before the House that the places to which the noble earl referred were sinécures, or were useless; and it was, on the contrary, contended, that they were not sinécures, and that they were not useless: and that the consequences of their abolition would not only be of no public advantage, but would be attended with great disadvantage to the public. The resolutions were therefore negatived—those who opposed them, however, stating, that on proof being produced that any particular offices were useless they would vote for their abolition.

Earl Grosvenor observed, that the explanation of his noble friend was such, that he did not despair of having his vote at some future time for the abolition of these sinecures and useless places.

The petitions were then laid on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, March 13.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Calvert presented a petition from the parish of St. Olave, in the borough of Southwark, for Reform and Retrenchment.

Ordered to lie on the table.

The hon. member presented another petition from the parish of St. Mary Lambeth, with the same prayer. It contained between 900 and 1,000 signatures. The hon. gent. stated the manner in which the meeting had been convened, and the good order with which its proceedings were conducted.

Ordered to lie on the table.

WINDOW DUTY.] Mr. Lushington brought in a bill to amend and explain the window-duty act, with regard to its application to warehouses.

DISRESSED STATE OF TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.] Mr. Brougham, in rising, pursuant to notice, to bring forward this important subject, addressed the House as follows: Sir, when I consider, that the period of the session is well nigh passed, in which it has been the custom of this House, at periods of great public distress, to inquire into the state of the nation, and yet that nothing has been done to bring the subject before us, or to testify, on our part, a becoming anxiety concerning the sufferings of the people, I feel myself supported by this reflection under the magnitude of the vast question, which I have presumed to handle. We have, in truth, allowed the accustomed season of investigation to elapse, without doing any thing except what, with all possible respect for the proceedings of Parliament, I conceive to have been beginning at the wrong end. Mistaking the symptom for the malady, we have attempted to stifle the cries of the people in their extreme distress, instead of seeking the cause of their sufferings, and endeavouring to apply a cure. I am, indeed, aware, that there are many, who differ with me upon this subject; who deemed the late measures of legislation salutary and wise. But whatever variety of opinion might exist upon their merits, I may now appeal to all who hear me, to those who joined me in deprecating and resisting the suspension of the Constitution, and to those who viewed this frightful step as justified by the necessities of the times, and call upon all parties alike to say, whether the moment is not at length come, when it behoves us to mount from the effect to the cause of the mischief; and, having done so much to preserve the public peace, whether it is not our duty to search for the means of alleviating the general misery by which alone that has been endangered. My very sincere anxiety to give the Parliament an opportunity of discharging this duty has made me bold to bring forward the present question; too late, I admit, for attaining all the objects that might once have been within our reach; but early enough, I would still hope, to effect some good purposes. I am aware, that there is nothing so injudicious as to begin a discussion like this by hazarding any large and sanguine predictions of its probable result. Nevertheless, I will venture to say, that whatever difference of opinion may exist upon particular topics, a considerable majority of the House will agree in holding, that the period is now arrived, when, the war being closed, and prodigious changes having taken place almost all over the world, it becomes absolutely necessary to enter upon a careful but fearless revision of our whole commercial system, that we may be enabled safely, yet promptly, to eradicate those vices which the lapse of time has occasioned or displayed; to retrace our steps, where we shall find that they have deviated from the line of true policy; to adjust and accommodate our laws to the alteration of circumstances; to abandon many prejudices, alike antiquated and senseless, unsuited to the advanced age in which we live, and unworthy of the sound judgment of the nation. I shall begin, Sir, by entering upon the fundamental branch of the inquiry, which I am solicitous the House should institute; I mean the present aspect of our affairs. Every one is aware, that there exists in the country a great and universal distress; a distress wholly without parallel in any former period of its history. This, indeed, is unhappily matter of so much notoriety, that I should hardly think it required any particular proof or illustration, were it not that, according to my view of the subject, the extent to which the evil has spread, and the peculiar shapes which it has assumed, must be examined before we can probe its sources or find a remedy. The House will speedily perceive in what way this examination of the fact conduces to the object we all have in view; and will, I am persuaded, give me credit, in the mean time, for not leading them into superfluous details. To demonstrate the general proposition, indeed, I might bid you cast your eyes upon the petitions that load the table, from all parts of the empire, from every description of its inhabitants, from numbers infinitely exceeding those that ever before approached us in the language of complaint. It is in vain to remind us of the manner in which some of them have been prepared for signature. Does any man believe, that a treasury manufactory of petitions, distributing the article through the country with all the influence of government, could procure one column of names to a statement of national prosperity, or a prayer for liberal taxation? Nor does the inaptness of the remedies, which many of the petitioners suggest, impeach the correctness of their tale of distress: they may be very incapable of devising the means of relief; they are abundantly qualified to give evidence of the grievance. I might next appeal to the returns from the Custom House, to shew the declension of trade. I am aware, that these documents give no information respecting the internal commerce of the country, by far its most important branch; and that, even with respect to foreign traffic, nothing can be more fallacious than arguments wholly drawn from such sources. When taken, however, in conjunction with other evidence, they are not altogether to be disregarded. Now it is shewn, by a comparison of the years 1815 and 1816, that there was a falling off, in the shipping employed during the latter year, of 826,000 tons, or nearly 5000 vessels. This fact is the more remarkable, that we were at war during a quarter of 1815, whereas 1816 was the first whole year of peace. These returns speak of the tonnage outwards and inwards; but they tell nothing of the difference between the exports and imports of either year. I will venture to assert, that a much more considerable defalcation will be found in the importation of last year than the mere falling off in the tonnage indicates. I am well aware, that many millions of goods have been sent abroad, for which no returns have been received, and which never will produce sixpence to the exporters. Upon this point no Custom House papers can give any information. They cannot shew what proportion of the cargoes shipped have found a market: what parts have been sold under prime cost; what parts remain upon hand unsaleable at any price; and what parts of the goods imported are in a similar situation. We have known former times of great national suffering; most of us are old enough to remember more than one period of severe public calamity: but no man can find an example of any thing like the present. In 1800 there was a scarcity, much greater than is now felt, but no distress ensued beyond the reach of private charity: and the affliction ended with the bad season; for, though provisions were dear, work was abundant, and the bulk of the poor were enabled to sustain the pressure of the evil. In 1812 there was a much greater distress; the dearth was less, indeed, but the rate of wages was far lower. The House well remembers the painful inquiries in which it was then my fortune to bear a considerable part. We were accustomed to describe the circumstances in which we found the manufacturing population of the country as wretched beyond all former example; and the expression was strictly justified by the fact. Yet, compared with the wide spread misery under which the same classes now labour, the year 1812 rises into a period of actual prosperity. It will be necessary for me, and I hope the House will grant me their indulgence, to go shortly into some particulars touching the great staple manufactures of the kingdom, in order to shew how unparalleled in its amount, and how various in its kinds, the distress is, which now everywhere prevails. I shall begin with the Clothing; a branch of trade, which, from accidental circumstances, is not so depressed as our other great staples; and for this, among other reasons, that the foreign markets do not happen to be overstocked with this manufacture, while some considerable foreign government contracts have given great assistance to several of the clothing districts. I hold in my hand the result of statements, which I have received from the principal clothing countries of Yorkshire—Leeds, Huddersfield, Wakefield, and Halifax. Taking the number of men engaged in the branch which suffers most, the cloth dressing, at 3360 in August last, there were then 927 in full, 1385 in partial employment, and 1048 wholly out of work. Calculating upon the same number, there are now only 757 in full, and 1439 in partial work; while 1164 are entirely idle. That is to say, a third of the whole are idle; and of those who have any work, only one third, that is, two-ninths of the whole, or two men in nine, have full employment. The distress of the other clothiers in this county is far from being so considerable; but in the West of England I am informed, by the most unexceptionable evidence, that it exceeds any thing which can easily be conceived. If we now carry our view towards the Iron Trade, a most gloomy picture is presented; and I may take the state of Birmingham as a fair symptom of this commerce in general, intimately connected as that great town is with the neighbouring counties in all the branches of their industry and commerce. In a population of 84,000 souls, about 27,500 receive parish relief. Of the work people, one third are wholly out of employ, and the rest are at half work. The poor's rates have risen to between fifty and sixty thousand pounds a year, a sum exceeding, as I am informed, what the inhabitants paid to the income tax. In 1812, when the House was so greatly touched by the state of this place, only a ninth part of the population were paupers, and the rates did not exceed 27,000*l.*, yet we then thought the public distresses had reached their utmost pitch. The people engaged in the Iron Trade may be divided into four great classes, with reference to my present purpose; the miners, and others employed in obtaining the raw material; the persons employed in manufacturing arms; the nailers; and the common artificers. The first of these classes, who in 1810 received from 18*s.* upwards as far as two guineas a week, get now from 10*s.* to 18*s.*; the second, who received still higher, I might say even exorbitant wages, from the demand occasioned by the war, now get only 7*s.* 6*d.*, when they are employed at all: the nailers, who are better off than most classes, yet earn no more than 8*s.* or 9*s.* instead of 12*s.* or 15*s.*; while the common artificers are working at a shilling a day. But in all these classes the women and children, who used to earn so much as nearly to double the gains of the able workmen, are now wholly unemployed. Sir, I do not wish to mingle any allusions of a political nature with the description of these sad scenes; but I feel it due to the character and the sufferings of those unhappy persons to assert (and I do so upon the authority of men who differ with me in political sentiments,) that a more loyal, peaceful, tranquil set of people are not to be found within the limits of his Majesty's dominions. It is truly painful to think, that, severe as the distress is in those parts of the country, which I have been describing, a yet more melancholy picture presents itself when we turn to the great staple of the country, the Cotton Manufacture. This, as the House is well aware, consists of two branches, the spinning and weaving; but, from the introduction of machinery, the numbers employed in weaving are beyond all comparison greater than those employed in spinning. In Lancashire alone, and the borders of the adjoining counties, there are above half a million of persons who derive their support from the former. Taking the average gains of a thousand weavers, of all ages and classes, their rate of wages was 1*s.* 3*d.* a week in May 1800. In 1802, the same persons received the still higher sum of 1*s.* 10*d.* In 1806, it had fallen to 10*s.* 6*d.*; and in 1808, after it had pleased the wisdom of government to "retaliate," as they phrased it, "upon the enemy the evils of his own injustice," and to inflict upon ourselves (as the event proved to such as had not the sense to perceive it) the evils of our own impolicy—when we had succeeded in quarrelling with our best customers—those wages fell as low as 6*s.* 7*d.* In 1812, when the whole virtues of our system had been called into action, and had bestowed the full measure of its beneficence upon our trade, the wages fell to 6*s.* 4*d.* In 1816, the third year of peace, and while we were slowly moving through that transition of which we have heard (though it seems something of rather a permanent than a passing nature,) wages were as low as 5*s.* 2*d.* This was in the month of May; and in January last they had reached the fearful point of depression at which they now stand, of 4*s.* 3½*d.*; from which, when the usual expenses paid by the work people for the loom are deducted, there remains no more than 3*s.* 3*d.* to support human life for seven days. By another calculation it appears, that 497 persons have to provide for themselves, and as many more out of 5*s.* a week; making for the whole subsistence and expenditure of each individual, less than 4½*d.* a day. When I paused over this scene of misery, unequalled in the history of civilized times, I felt naturally impelled to demand, how it was possible to sustain existence in such circumstances, and whether it were not practicable to administer charitable aid? To the first question I received for answer the painful intelligence, that those miserable beings could barely purchase with their hard and scanty earnings, half a pound of oatmeal daily, which, mixed with a little salt and water, constituted their whole food. My other inquiry had been anticipated by that well-known spirit of kindness, not more humane than politic, by which the demeanour of the master manufacturers in this country has ever been regulated towards their workmen in the seasons of their common distress. Projects for affording them relief had been canvassed; but it was found, that to distribute only a slender increase of nourishment, an addition of a little milk, or beer, or a morsel of meat, to the oatmeal and water, no less a sum than 20,000*l.* a week was required, and at a time when the masters were hardly receiving any profits from their trade. To talk of charity, then, is entirely out of the question; the case lies far beyond the reach of private beneficence; and, if it admits of a remedy at all, must look to other sources of relief. Now what is the consequence of all this, and whither does it inevitably lead? These wretched creatures are compelled first to part for their sustenance with all their trifling property, piecemeal, from the little furniture of their cottages to the very bedding and clothes that used to cover them from the weather. They struggle on with hunger, and go to sleep at night-fall, upon the calculation, that, if they worked an hour or two later, they might indeed earn three halfpence more, one of which must be paid for a candle, but then the clear gain of a penny would be too dearly bought, and leave them less able to work the next day. To such a frightful nicety of reckoning are human beings reduced, treating themselves like mere machines, and balancing the produce against the tear and wear, so as to obtain the maximum that their physical powers can be made to yield! At length, however, they must succumb; the workhouse closes their dismal prospect; or, with a reluctance that makes their lot a thousand times more pitiable, they submit to take parish relief; and, to sustain life, part with the independent spirit, the best birthright of an English peasant. If from these details we ascend to considerations of a more general nature, and observe certain symptoms, which, though less striking in themselves, are perhaps the safest guides in such an inquiry, we shall find, that nothing is happening around us on any side, which is not indicated by these signs of the times. The first of the symptoms to which I shall refer is the great diminution that has taken place in the consumption of luxuries all over the country. This is attested by the undeniable fact, that there has been a material and increasing defalcation in the produce of the Customs and Excise, especially of the latter, during the last twelve months. It is well known, too, that those districts suffered first, and most severely, which depended upon the manufacture of luxurious articles. Every one is familiar with the case of Spitalfields. The poor of that neighbourhood, after having exhausted the whole rates, have received from voluntary contributions, reflecting the highest honour upon the charitable and liberal character of the metropolis at large, sums, which, added to the rates, exceed the whole income of the parish at rack-rent. In like manner the levies of Coventry and its neighbourhood have increased beyond all former example. It appeared, when the petition from thence was presented, that one estate of 300 acres paid 400*l.* in rates. A singular instance, illustrative of the same position, with respect to the county generally, was stated by my honourable friend the member for that city (Mr. P. Moore,) and, through his courtesy, I have this evening seen a more minute account of it than he then gave. A person belonging to the place has been accustomed for many years to travel over a great part of England, selling watches. He visits, in his circuits, 283 cities and towns, and he used commonly to dispose of about 600 watches. Last year, making precisely the same round as usual, he only found purchasers for 43. Perhaps, when we consider the variety of classes who use watches, and the extent of the space over which this diminution operated, it would be difficult to imagine stronger symptom of the decrease in demand for luxuries. The watch trade in London has suffered in an equal degree. The statements recently published shew, that there are now 3000 journeymen out of employment: that those who are in work have been earning for the last three months one fourth of their usual gains; and during the last month only one sixth; while their property has been pledged to the amount of 1600*l.* in three quarters of a year. If I am not misinformed, other trades in the metropolis suffer in a like proportion. It is said that 2000 of the 18,000 journeymen tailors in Westminster are wholly destitute of work. I take the great discontent excited throughout the country by the introduction of new machinery to be another symptom, and a most unerring one, of the present distress. Formerly, when the invention of any piece of mechanism for abridging manual labour occasioned an alarm among the working people, it was partial and transient. Those who were thrown out of employment speedily found other channels of profitable occupation, the population disengaged by the new machine were absorbed, with their industry; and in a short time the traces of the change disappeared, except that its beneficial effects upon the capital of the country soon created a greater demand for labour than existed before the invention. But now the case is widely different. The petitions, which night after night are presented to us by thousands and tens of thousands, complaining of machinery, testify, that when workmen are flung out of one employment they can no longer find others ready to receive them; and that the capital saved by the abridgment of labour no longer produces its former healing effect. When Sir R. Arkwright invented the apparatus, which has proved of such benefit to this country, though it deprived many thousands of their livelihood for the moment, yet no particular discontent was excited. I have obtained from two of the greatest cotton spinners, in both parts of this island, an estimate of the saving in manual labour effected by that machinery; and as both concurred in stating, unknown to each other, that by means of it one man can do the work of a hundred, I may assume the calculation as pretty near the truth. So considerable a shock to the labouring population produced scarcely any discontent. The case is so different now, when the smallest improvement is made in the means of economising human power, that I hardly know whether to rejoice or be sorry at any such change. There has of late been a considerable accession of mechanical power in the weaving trade; and though it cannot operate like the spinning mills, it yet bids fair to throw numbers out of work, and destroy even the scanty pittance at present gained by a great number of those wretched individuals, whose hardships I have been describing to-night—I allude to what is called the Power Loom, by which one child is enabled to do the work of two or three men. But the House will hear with surprise and vexation, that mechanical improvement has, as it were, reached its limit; an unexpected impediment has started up to check its farther progress. It is now found, for the first time in the history of mankind, so low are wages fallen, so great is the pressure of distress, that manual labour is making reprisals on machinery, standing a successful competition with it, beating it out of the market, and precluding the use of an engine, far from costly in itself, which saves three labourers in four. The farther introduction of the power loom is actually stopped by the low rate of weavers' wages! There are, however, other branches of industry, as the printing and lace trades, which have been lately threatened, if I may so speak, with the competition of new mechanism, and of such powers as not even the miserable wages of the day can be expected to resist. The last symptom of distress which I shall mention is the state of the money-market. I am aware that there are some, who view this subject in a very different light. I know not if the right honourable gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) concurs in the opinion recently delivered from high authority in another place, no less than that of the first minister of the country, and the person at the head of its finances. That noble lord is reported to have drawn the most favourable augury from the late rise of the funds, which he ascribed, by some process of reasoning not very easily followed, to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. However injurious this measure may prove to the Constitution, it seems we are to regard it as highly favourable to trade. Now suppose I were minded to turn the tables upon the noble lord, and bid him look at the still greater rise of the stocks after the Report of the Committee appointed to examine the contents of the Green Bag. That famous document first unfolded the existence of the Spencean plan, and was calculated directly to bear upon the funds; because, according to the true faith of that great sect, though the landholder is bad and fit to be despoiled, the fundholder is "a monster and must be hunted down." So says the Report; yet the funds rose upon its appearance: from whence I might argue, if I chose to adopt the ground of the first minister of finance, that the fundholders, one and all disbelieved in the existence of the plot. I will not, however, take this advantage of the noble lord, by following his own example. I am satisfied with drawing, from the state of the stocks and the money-market generally, inferences more naturally connected with the subject, and in favour of the view I have already taken of public affairs. It is well known, that there exists at present a facility of obtaining discounts at four and four and a half per cent. on bills of short dates, which even a year ago were not to be procured at a much higher premium: Stocks, too, have risen; they are ten per cent. higher on the nominal capital than they were a few months since. Exchequer bills, after two several reductions of interest, leaving the income upon them at only three and a half per cent., still bear a premium. What does all this prove? If I saw that there was any proportionate facility in obtaining loans upon land at five per cent., that is, upon the best security our law affords, I might be inclined to pause before I ascribed the state of the money-market to a glut of unemployed capital. But hitherto none of this capital has overflowed upon the land; and the fact is unquestionable, that there is much money in the market of stocks, floating debt, and discounts, only because there is little or no employment for it in trade, and because no capitalist chuses to put his money beyond his reach for more than a few months, in the expectation that commerce will revive. The want of employment at home has a tendency to drive capital abroad; and signs of this emigration have already manifested themselves in the negotiation of loans with foreign powers. One transaction of this nature has already been concluded with France; and undoubtedly the greater part of the money to be advanced in the course of it will come from the capitalists of this country. America is said to have two speculations of a similar description going on at the present moment in the city. Respecting one of them I have heard some particulars: and it resolves itself into a stock operation, the object of which is the application of British capital to the support of the American funds. How indeed is it to be supposed, that capital should not find its way abroad, when, on the other side of the channel, it fetches in the public stocks, nearly double the interest given by our funds, and much more than double the interest paid by our floating debt? The state of foreign exchanges with this country, I shall at present only glance at cursorily, because I venture to assure the House, that before I sit down, if I do not altogether fail in stating the views I entertain of another branch of the subject, I shall be able to demonstrate the necessary connection between what is called a favourable rate of exchange, and the depression of foreign commerce. That rate is, in fact, only another proof of the unnatural state of our trade; it is the immediate result of forced exportations, with scarcely any importation in return. Thus it happens, that, when goods have been sent to any part of the continent, from whence nothing can be brought back, in order to remit the produce of the sales, there is a demand for bills; but there being no transactions ending in this country, and no real bills, fictitious drawing is resorted to, until the pound sterling is raised to a height above par, very favourable indeed to those who spend money abroad, but wholly useless to traders, who can buy nothing there to sell again in this country: a height, too, which it cannot retain as long as there is bullion to send over; and which, when properly understood, indicates the existence of a traffic unnatural and necessarily short-lived—exportation without imports. Sir, when such is the unparalleled state of embarrassment under which two of the great branches of national industry, commerce and manufactures, labour, it would be in vain to expect, that any material or permanent improvement should take place in that, which is the ultimate source of all wealth and prosperity, and is intimately connected with every other employment—I mean our agriculture. If we hear less at the present moment of the distresses of the landed interest, it can only be because the consumption of the foreign grain, which last year oppressed the markets, and the measures adopted by the Legislature to shut out this competition, have been aided by a scanty crop, and have raised the price of corn. Those districts, where the harvest has been tolerable, are therefore comparatively well off; whereas last year the suffering was universal; but wherever the crop has been a failing one, that is, in the greater part of the country, the high price is by no means a compensation for the deficiency and the poor's rates. I have therefore no manner of doubt, that the land is, generally speaking, worse off than before. It is indeed a vain and idle thing to take distinctions between the different orders of the country, and to speak of the agricultural and mercantile classes, as if they had opposite or even independent interests. They are all intimately and inseparably connected by the eternal nature of things; they must for ever run together the same course, whether of progress or decline. I will give you, on this matter, the words of a man, who, having, by his honest industry become the greatest ornament of the one order, made himself, by the fruits of his honourable gains, a distinguished member of the other, and afterwards rose, by his sagacity and experience, to adorn also the literature of his age. "Trade and land," says Mr. Child, "are knit each to other, and must wax and wane together; so that it shall never be well with land but trade must feel it, nor ill with trade but land must fall." The House will feel how much less difficult it is to describe the extent and intensity of the prevailing distresses, than to trace the various causes which have concurred in producing them, and to separate those portions of the evil, which arise out of temporary circumstances, from those which have gone on increasing with a slower growth, deeply rooted in the system of policy that has been established amongst us, or at the least closely interwoven with it. But I should not deal fairly with the House, if I did not thus early state my opinion as to the nature of those causes generally: it is founded upon the universal extent and the great variety of the distresses which I have been describing; and my principal reason for entering so largely into that description was, not certainly because it required any such evidence to prove the miserable condition of the country, but because, from the universality in which the pressure prevails, I deemed the inference to be unavoidable, that it springs from causes of no temporary nature. It is quite true, that a transition from war to peace must always affect several branches of public wealth, some connected with foreign, but a greater proportion with domestic trade. Thus two departments of industry have suffered severely by the cessation of hostilities; the provision trade of Ireland; through it also, the cattle market of this country, and the manufacture of arms at Birmingham. The distress arising from the peace in those branches of commerce may be temporary; if all the other channels of trade, unconnected with the war, were open, it certainly would be temporary.—But when we find the depression general in all lines of employment, as well in those uninfluenced by the war-demand, as in those wholly dependent upon it; when we see that hands thrown out of work in one quarter can no longer be absorbed into the other parts of the system; when there plainly appears to be a choking up of all the channels of industry, and an equal exhaustion in all the sources of wealth—we are driven to the conclusion, that the return of peace accounts at the utmost only for a portion of the sad change we everywhere witness, and that even that portion may become permanent from the prevalence of the evil in quarters not liable to be affected by the termination of the war. I have shewn you, that the Cotton Trade, wholly unconnected with the war, is more depressed than the Iron Trade in general, and to the full as much depressed as the very gun manufactory at Birmingham. I am entitled to conclude, first, that the transition from war to peace has not produced all the mischief; and next, that the mischief which it has produced might have been got over, as in former times, if it had been the only one which oppressed us. Sir, we must once for all look our situation in the face, and firmly take a view of the extent of our disease. It is not of a partial description; it is of general prevalence; it is of a searching nature; there is no channel of our whole circulation into which it has not worked its way: no fibre or filament of our whole æconomical system that does not feel its deadening influence; not one limb has been hurt, but the whole body is impaired in the exercise of all its functions. Can we expect it all to heal and revive of itself, and in a short time? I need hardly remind you, that we are now approaching the fourth year of "transition," and still no relief, no mitigation; on the contrary, we experience an increase of our calamity; whilst every one knows, that in less than half the time, from the end of all former wars, a complete recovery was effected. I shall therefore endeavour to describe what, after all the attention that I have been able to give the subject, appear to me the real causes of the unnatural state in which every man must admit the country is placed. I must intreat the House impartially to fix their eye upon the line of policy, which for many years past has been adopted by the public councils of the country. In referring to it, I shall as much as possible avoid the more debatable grounds of the commencement and continuance of war, and keep to points upon which I believe a very little explanation will preclude the possibility of any considerable difference in opinion. It should seem that those who style themselves the practical politicians of this country (because they are the dupes of a theory as visionary as it is absurd) have long been surrounded by a class of men, who, blending with what is termed true mercantile knowledge, much narrow-minded, violent, national, prejudice, or, as they call it, genuine British feeling, assume to themselves the style and title of the Sound Statesmen, and certainly do in good earnest exert a real and practical influence over the affairs of the nation. With these sage instructors of almost every administration (and they are generally found united in place with their pupils, and knit to them by the endearing reciprocity of good offices) it is a maxim equally sacred and profound, that too much can hardly be done to discourage importations of all kinds and from all countries. The old mercantile system has long been exploded; but these wise personages, having been born and bred up in it, seem to have caught hold of its last plank, to which they still cling with all their might, perpetually conning over its grand motto—"All trade and no barter; all selling and no buying: all for money and nothing for goods." To support the remnants of a doctrine, universally abandoned in every enlightened country, all means are resorted to, fair and foul; for, in defence of their favourite creed, these sound advisers betray a morality far from rigid or scrupulous. The theory itself is repudiated, and its very name disowned by all who have received a liberal education. No man is to be found hardy enough, no one so careless of his reputation for common sense, as even to use its language. How long is it since the soundest politician among us has ventured to speak, in public at least, the jargon of the balance of trade! Yet, marvellous to relate, the practical results of this extirpated heresy are interwoven with our whole commercial policy; and, though the nonsense, and even the dialect of its tenets are rejected of all men, they are disguised in legal phraseology, embodied in efficient regulations, and may be traced in broad characters through every volume of the statute book down to the last. Year after year we have proceeded under the auspices of our wholesome, practical, sound, national statesmen, until we now find ourselves, as might naturally be expected, deprived of most of the great staples of foreign commerce. In mentioning a few instances of our obligations to these sagacious counsellors, I must say a single word upon the Corn Bill, which, strictly speaking, comes within the class of measures I am alluding to. To the opinion which I originally entertained upon that law, I still adhere. I feel now, as I did then, that its first effects are injurious, by cutting off a great article of foreign trade; but I look for an ample compensation of that injury in advantages of a higher nature; the ensuring a regular, a safe, and ultimately a cheap supply of the great necessary of life, which no change of foreign policy, no caprice of hostile governments, can impede or disturb. It may also be admitted by those who disapproved of the measure as a permanent branch of our policy, that the circumstances of the times justified its adoption as a temporary resource. At any rate we resorted to it, not as the only prohibitory law in our commercial code, but while almost every branch of trade was struggling in the fetters of the restrictive system. We approved of it for special reasons, many of them temporary in their nature; and regarded it as an exception justified by those reasons, and by the unnatural state of our whole polity. The doctors of the mercantile school jumped at it as a part of their scheme, and as coinciding with the numberless trammels which they had devised for commerce in all its departments, and the removal of which might very possibly alter our whole opinion upon the Corn Bill. Let us only cast our eye over a few of those regulations. I shall first request the attention of the House to the exploits of these sages in the Baltic trade. That branch of commerce has always been deemed highly important, both to our shipping and our mercantile interest; both with a view to defence and to gain. Its short voyages make it an excellent nursery for seamen; its quick returns are highly favourable to profit. Circumstances, which I need not enumerate, render it a peculiarly secure and steady kind of traffic. Yet, of the four great staples of the Baltic trade, two, including the greatest of the whole, have been cut off. We still receive hemp and tallow; but we have prohibited the importation of iron and timber. And to what views have we sacrificed this important market for our own goods? To encourage ruinous speculations in this country, we imposed a duty upon foreign iron amounting to a prohibition; while, to force the importation of inferior timber from our North American colonies, that is, to gratify the Canada and shipping interests, always highly favoured by the school of the practical and right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Rose), we excluded the greatest staple of the Baltic. Instead of leaving the adventurers in mines to their fate, suffering them to thrive if they could by their natural resources, we encouraged them, by extraordinary stimulants, in a pursuit which sound policy would rather have discouraged; a precarious, gambling, and upon the whole a losing concern to the country. Mark the consequences of this system. We used to export 4 or 500,000*l.* of our manufactures annually to Norway; that vent, I understand, has now ceased; Norway having no other means of making payment but the iron and the timber, which our modern practitioners of antiquated wisdom have seen good to exclude altogether. Canada, for whose sake the sacrifice was partly made, no doubt still remains ours, in spite of all the pains we took to lose it; but there is no part of this country at present so distressed as the mining districts of Wales. A similar prohibition of foreign copper has cut us off from one of the principal articles of South American produce. It is not many days since some conversation took place respecting an act of last session, which imposed protecting duties on foreign butter and cheese. I then expressed my repugnance to any extension of that protection; and I will now mention a fact within my knowledge, both to shew how dangerous this sort of legislative interference is in a vast, complicated, and delicate commercial system, and also to demonstrate how little a high rate of exchange indicates a thriving trade. The instant that those duties were imposed, as true as the pulse keeps time with the stroke of the heart, foreign exchange rose, as it is called, in our favour 2 or 3 per cent. A branch of our importation was lopped off; it became more difficult to remit from abroad, in the first instance, and consequently must have become proportionably more difficult to send goods thither immediately after; our whole foreign trade was sensibly diminished, and by the very operation which raised the exchange, and in exact proportion to its rise. So much for the quick effects of the operations in which these sound personages delight; so much for the accuracy of the symptoms which they consult as infallible in pronouncing upon the state of commerce! The same perverse views have long regulated our commercial intercourse with France. Partly from mercantile views, partly from feelings of a political, and almost a religious nature, there are many amongst us who have laid it down as a principle, from whence they hold it nearly impious to depart, that as little wine as possible must be taken from France. Although that fine country is our nearest market, and ought to be our best customer; although the vine is its chief produce, and its wines are allowed by all to be the best, by some considered as the only ones drinkable; yet their importation is to be avoided because France is our natural enemy, and Portugal our dear, and indeed costly friend. In the true spirit of this creed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer some time ago laid a new duty upon claret, not with any view to revenue, but, as he himself declared, in the technical language of his sect, with the hopes of discouraging the use of French wines, upon principles of a political nature. It may, for any thing I know, be, in the contemplation of this class of statesmen, a mark of comprehensive policy in a manufacturing country to refuse those articles, which it wants the most and likes the best, and which alone enable a trade with its best customer to be kept up. But if I may be allowed to speak as a trader, availing myself of the flattering compliment bestowed upon me last night by the worthy alderman (Mr. Alderman Atkins), and to proceed on the suggestions of common sense, I should regard such conduct, not as the result of sound policy, or of any policy at all, but as dictated by prejudices bordering on insanity. But it is somewhat melancholy to think, that worse blunders remain untold. The conduct pursued with regard to the linen trade very considerably surpasses all that I have mentioned; for it has been as directly in hostility to the favourite principles of the mercantile school as to the interests of the country. That school has always patronized the carrying trade in an especial manner; and I believe I may assert, that no branch of it was ever more productive than the transit of foreign linens; yet upon this we began, and never stopped until we had imposed a duty of 15 per cent. upon all linens imported and re-exported. If I am asked to explain why we did so, I cannot; for here the wit of man would in vain search for any thing like a reason. But I can tell what the Ministers thought they were doing all the while. The fact is, that many nations prefer foreign linens to our own: and they used to buy those linens here. We saw this, and said they should not have them: so to legislate we went; resolved, that an Act of Parliament should pass the two Houses, and should then receive the royal assent, as requisite to make it binding upon the taste of foreign countries, which we expected would be changed to please us the instant that the solemnities of legislation were completed, and the accustomed words from the Crown pronounced. What has been the consequence? Those nations, who formerly repaired to British markets, laid in their investment of foreign linens, and at the same time completed their assortment in British goods (the foreign linen operating as a kind of decoy, from the convenience of finding all their cargo in the same place), all at once ceased to visit our ports. They were unmannerly enough to disregard our law, although it had been passed with every one of the accustomed formalities; they took their course to Hamburg, Amsterdam, and Copenhagen, where they could get the foreign linens somewhat cheaper than we ever sold them. This latter advantage they had always disregarded, considering the opportunity of conveniently completing their assortments of British articles as a compensation for it; but the transit duty was much greater than the trade could bear; it proved, as indeed it was meant, a prohibition; only that the contrivers of it, who did not mean to drive the purchaser to a foreign market, forgot that they had no means of keeping him in one where they would not sell him what he wanted. They forgot too that his departure not only destroyed the transit trade, but the trade in British goods connected with it, and now transferred to foreign countries. The House, no doubt, must be prepared to hear, that this scheme of perverse and short-sighted folly, is not of yesterday. It betokens so low a state of information, so gross an ignorance of the subject, so senseless a disregard of the most obvious principles, that every one will readily conjecture its origin to be lost in antiquity. At all events, it must have been invented prior to the date of the mercantile system, itself now exploded; for nothing can more clash with the doctrine of promoting the carrying trade. Then what will the House say, if it is less than a century and a half since this notable law passed? What if, after ages of experience, after the full knowledge imparted by the multiplicity of events and changes crowded into the last twenty years; what if this statute was deliberately passed not longer ago than the year 1810, under the auspices of the present Ministers! What if, no farther back than last year, Parliament was induced by them to decline revising this piece of nonsense, and expunging it from the book! Sir, these are indeed things which it requires the evidence of all our senses to make us believe. But if such be the groundwork of our commercial system, there can be little difficulty in comprehending the mischiefs, that must sooner or later flow from it. There are numberless other instances of the same policy, which I might detail to the House. I might speak of the duty upon the exportation of coal, amounting, at ordinary prices, to 70 per cent.; but for which that article might find a ready market in France, provided we agreed to take French goods in return. Here indeed we may be said to act consistently; for, when we refuse to receive the produce of a country, it seems natural enough, though perhaps it is superfluous, to prevent ours from going thither. We are not, however, so consistent in all the branches of this system. While we protect agriculture in some respects, we allow the importation and prohibit the export of wool. This deviation from the general rule is professedly to encourage manufactures, by denying to foreigners the use of the raw produce, yet cotton twist is allowed to go abroad, though it is in the first stage of manufacture; and one should think it full as easy for the continent to grow long wool as to erect spinning-mills. The arrangement of the silk duties affords matter of similar observation; but I abstain from leading the House into farther details. I think I may venture to assert, that, taking all things into the account, the time is now arrived, when the circumstances of our situation imperiously demand a full and unsparing review of the whole commercial policy of this country: and not only the branch of legislation which bears a more immediate reference to trade, but the navigation law itself requires the same prompt and accurate revision. Whether I consider that system with a view to national defence, or to commercial wealth, I feel persuaded, that no time should be lost in at least relaxing the rigour of its provisions. Many speculative writers have maintained, that it was from the first a sacrifice of wealth to security; but I am disposed to admit, that it was originally calculated to promote both these objects. I think it may fairly be allowed to have hastened, by half a century, an event which must sooner or later have happened, the transference from the United Provinces to this country of a large portion of trade, which, though naturally belonging to us, had been attracted by the peculiar advantages which enabled the Hollanders to possess themselves of the commerce of all other nations. But whatever may have been the good policy of the navigation law, I am quite clear that we have adhered to its strict enactments a century after the circumstances which alone justified its adoption had ceased to exist. What is now passing in the colonies affords a striking illustration of its impolicy in the present times. Whether in consequence of orders from home, or of the views entertained by the local governments, the navigation law is enforced, it seems, with unusual strictness, a stop being put to the licences granted under the intercourse act for importing provisions in foreign bottoms. What course does America pursue to meet this protecting measure? She says, as you will not suffer us to supply your settlements, in any vessels but your own, with those articles of which they stand so much in need, that they may starve for want of them; "we, retaliating on your head the mischiefs of your own policy," forthwith shut our ports against all vessels coming from ports from whence you exclude ours. This is the substance of a bill lately before congress, now passed into a law. I have in my hand a copy of it, which has just arrived; and I know that the greatest alarm has been excited by it in our West Indian colonies, as well as among all who are connected with our North American fisheries. Here is a striking specimen of that obstinate, perverse system, that refuses to vary with the alteration of circumstances; that will not accommodate itself to the progress of events, or follow the course of times and seasons, but clings superstitiously to what is now inapplicable, though it may once have been important; as if time were standing still, and history were not the record of unceasing change. Surveying, then, the derangement which pervades every branch of the public economy; seeing how our trade is cramped by the shortsighted operations of an unenlightened and senseless policy; finding what trifling relief, and that little accompanied with serious obstructions, it has derived from the prosperous condition of our foreign affairs; we may assuredly affirm, that there never was a period in the vicissitudes of our fortunes when British commerce might, with so much truth, be said to labour for its existence. Casting our eye over every point of the compass, and scarce able to descry any from which a solitary ray of comfort or of hope breaks in, it is natural for this House, to whose hands the sum of affairs is committed—for our unfortunate brethren, suffering under distresses that baffle description, after bearing us, by their industry and their patience, through the late eventful struggle—for the whole population of the empire, exhausted by the drains of a protracted warfare, weighed down by the pressure of the intolerable public burthens which it has accumulated, and now cut off from the temporary relief which the unnatural monopoly of that war afforded;—it is, I will say, but natural and reasonable for us all to direct our expectations towards any untried resources, any new opening that may present itself to the industry of the community. There can be no field of enterprise so magnificent in promise, so well calculated to raise sanguine hopes, so congenial to the most generous sympathies, so consistent with the best and the highest interests of England, as the vast continent of South America. He must indeed be more than temperate, he must be a cold reasoner, who can glance at those regions and not grow warm. The illustrious historian (Robertson), who has described the course of their rude invaders, relates, if I mistake not, that when, after unparalleled dangers, amid privations almost insupportable, through a struggle with sufferings beyond endurance—wary, hungry, exhausted with the toil, scared at the perils of their march, they reached at length the lofty summit so long the object of their anxious enterprise, they stood at once motionless, in gratitude for their success, in silent amazement at the boundless ocean stretched out before them, and the immeasurable dominion spread beneath their feet, the scene of all their fond expectations. And now the people of this country, after their long and dreary pilgrimage, after all the dangers they have braved, the difficulties they have overcome, the hardships they have survived, in something like the same state of suffering and exhaustion, have that very prospect opened to their view! If any sense of justice towards them, any regard for the dictates of sound policy, any reverence for the real wh-dom of past ages, has influence over our councils, they must be enabled and invited to approach that hemisphere, and partake in the numberless benefits which flow from such an intercourse. Upon our good pleasure it depends to command the virgin resources of that mighty expanse of territory—variegated with every species of soil—exposed to all the gradations of climate—rich from the fallow of centuries—sufficiently peopled to raise every variety of the produce we want, yet too thinly inhabited to threaten our own industry with any rivalry—watered in all directions by seas rather than rivers—studded with harbours through which to distribute its wealth over the old world—and the native country of that wherewith the sect of practical politicians are best pleased, and their patron saint propitiated, gold and silver mines, already fruitful, but capable of yielding infinitely larger returns under the management of European skill. Such is the prospect which those vast regions unfold; a prospect sufficient to compensate every loss you have sustained; an adequate outlet for your mercantile enterprise, though Europe were once more hermetically sealed against you; though Buonaparte were restored, and his continental system (as indeed it is) revived; even though Europe itself were, for commercial purposes, blotted from the map of the world. Nor let any man suppose, that all this is the indulgence of a heated fancy. I rest my expectations upon a careful examination of facts, derived from authority altogether unquestionable. Some of these I shall state, for the guidance of the hon. gentlemen opposite; because I know that some folks will listen to nothing which does not come in the shape of a detail. The exports of Spanish America cannot amount to less than 18 millions sterling in yearly value. Humboldt, the justly celebrated traveller, states them at 13 millions and a half, from the Custom-house returns in Old Spain: he reckons the exports of Buenos Ayres at 800,000*l.* of that sum; whereas, on the spot, they are reckoned at 1,150,000*l.*: we may therefore assume, that there is a similar deficiency in the other sums indicated by those documents, which would make the whole exportation worth 18 millions, and one-third of it is from Mexico. It appears from official returns, indeed, that Cadiz imported from South America, in the year 1802, to the amount of 18 millions and a quarter, of which 12 millions and a quarter were in bullion, a trade pleasing even to the gentlemen opposite; though I must confess the remaining 6 millions were only composed of goods, and I therefore ought to mention this sum with considerable diffidence. Before the late troubles the annual coinage of Spanish America was nine millions and a half sterling, and it had trebled in half a century. The population of the country is about 17 millions, including all classes; and it is estimated, that only one person in three wears foreign manufactures. This is probably considerably above the truth; for of the seven millions, who inhabit Mexico, only one is understood to wear those goods; the rest using a wretched stuff of home manufacture, only recommended by its cheapness; for, according to the remark of a native writer, England is there held to have taught them by her wars how to make their own clothes. What an opening does such a country afford for our goods! There exists no want of means to buy them, if the trade is so far facilitated as to afford them at reasonable prices; and if any proof were wanting how far the taste for using them might be introduced by opening the ports, the speculation at Buenos Ayres abundantly supplies it; for, though injurious to the projectors, that traffic has certainly had the effect of diffusing among the natives an inclination to use British manufactures. If the southern continent generally were opened, it would infallibly take, not only a larger quantity of them than has ever yet been sent thither, but a swiftly and regularly increasing quantity which would in a short time leave the imagination behind that should try to calculate it. With scenes such as these inviting our approach; with all the prepossessions of the natives in our favour; calling upon us to sacrifice no principle or propriety of conduct, but only to bless them with commerce and with the light of our superior civilization, in return for the treasures which they are ready to pour into our lap; whence comes it to pass, that, in a season of such pressure in all other quarters, this splendid theatre of exertion has been overlooked or avoided? It is the new-fangled, the execrable doctrine of legitimacy, the love of Ferdinand the Seventh, that has cut England off from her natural connection with South America. In the hour of our greatest need we have sacrificed the certainty of relief, nay the brightest prospects of new prosperity, to the antiquated prejudice against colonial independence, the political caprice of making common cause with the mother country in her endeavours to extinguish the new born liberties of settlements, now, thank God, in spite of Old Spain and of ourselves, almost severed from her tyrannical dominion. But for these humours, so senselessly gratified, our flag might have floated in every part of that immense continent. We have chosen to be supplanted by a nearer power, a power as active and skilful in speculations as ourselves, and wholly free from the incumbrance of those political attachments and antipathies, which so lamentably fetter our commercial enterprise. Only see the course into which these doctrines, or prejudices, have driven us. In 1809 we concluded what is commonly termed Admiral Apodaca's Treaty, acknowledging the dominion of Spain over the Indies, in terms which seem even to imply a guarantee of her dominion. An article was added, which bound the parties, as speedily as possible, to conclude a treaty of commerce; but nothing whatever has since been done towards the fulfilment of this stipulation. In 1814, after the conduct of Ferdinand had called forth, not certainly the applause of all enlightened minds in all countries, it pleased our government to make a convention with him, binding this country to every thing short of guarantee, and expressive of deep anxiety for the subjugation of those, whom I call the independents, but whom the treaty stigmatised as revolted subjects of our dear ally. In vain have the various provinces of South America, successively, as they threw off the yoke of Spain, courted our notice, and offered us the highest commercial advantages in return. As often as the popular party obtained the advantage in any place, the ports were thrown open to our trade, the residence of Englishmen protected, all intercourse with them cherished. If ever the patriots were unhappily defeated, if the "anxious wishes" were gratified, which the convention expresses, on the part of this country, for the restoration of the legitimate tyranny, straightway the ports were shut against us, and our countrymen could no longer trade, or remain under the dominion of our favourite ally. We were offered by the revolted, as we call them, in Venezuela and New Granada, an exclusive trade for twenty years; and their congress, believing (I use their own words), "that it is the characteristic disposition of Great Britain to protect and assist oppressed people, for the sake of justice and humanity," vainly fancied their cause might be favourably viewed by us. The legitimate lieutenant of the crown, Montalvo, subdued them for a while, and instantly proclaimed what he called "the wise and salutary regulations of the council of the Indies," recited the services rendered by the Philippine company to trade (of all things), and restored its exclusive monopoly, to be enforced with additional vigour. In 1816, General Bolívar made offers of the most advantageous nature, when on his way to battle for the independence of the Caraccas, which I trust in God he has before this time achieved. All such propositions were rejected; seldom honoured with an answer; always treated with contempt or aversion. We were for the party of the oppressor—we wished ill to freedom for its own sake, and out of the love we bore its enemy, notwithstanding the advantages we might reap from doing our duty, and helping its struggles. But even this bad policy has been pursued in a wavering, irresolute, and inconsistent manner. We have sent a consul to Buenos Ayres, where he did not present his credentials until the patriots had succeeded; he now resides in his public capacity, transacting business with the independent government. But no one other commercial or diplomatic agent has been sent to any part of Spanish America; and even at Buenos Ayres the blockade imposed by the royalists of Monte Video a few years ago, was enforced by a British man of war. The long established contraband trade with the Main is still encouraged, at least protected in Jamaica. In Trinidad every impediment is thrown in its way; the councils of the government are influenced by an assessor, who retired thither after the massacre of the independents in Caraccas, where he had been a principal adviser; proclamations are issued, prohibiting, under the highest penalties, the sending, not only of arms but of money to the continent; and severe measures have been adopted towards the refugees of the independent party. These measures have produced their natural effect; and I understand, that the principal articles of importation from the Spanish Main have almost doubled in price. I intreat the House farther to recollect, that the same treaty, which bound our Government to prevent all succour from being given to the patriots, bound Ferdinand to abolish the Slave Trade. We have more than performed our part of the compact—he neither has taken nor has the slightest intention of taking any one step towards fulfilling his part. I do not contend, that we ought to make war upon him for the failure; but I think we have some right to have it explained; and I am clear, that if he persists in his departure from the stipulation, we are set free from our part of the contract. That we should ever desire to recede from it is more than I can expect; for hitherto we have done much more than we bargained in his behalf and against the patriots. So bigotted are we to his cause, that I have read a memorial presented to his Majesty's Government by three respectable merchants, who, having come to this country from Buenos Ayres upon commercial business, and having finished their arrangements, were ready to sail on their return homeward, when they were stopped by an order from one of the under secretaries of state, refusing them leave to proceed, until they should also obtain the Spanish ambassador's leave! Here is one of the fruits of that blessed measure the Alien Act; and a striking proof how soundly those reasoned against it, who urged, that it would be used as a political engine for gratifying the caprices of foreign courts. The treaty, you will observe, only binds us to give no assistance to the patriots in warlike stores: the Trinidad proclamation threatens with banishment, confiscation, and imprisonment, all who shall send money. The direct stipulations only engage for neutrality: the preamble expresses the warmest good wishes for the success of the tyrant, while it insults the patriots with the name of revolvers. But, as if we were resolved to go beyond both the spirit and the letter of this convention, to testify by every possible means our hostility to the cause of the Spanish colonies, and our anxiety to extinguish their rising liberties, the British Minister to the United States has been charged, in congress, with a formal interference to prevent American citizens from sending arms and ammunition to the patriots; and no denial whatever has been given to the statement. I ask the Commons of England, if they are prepared to patronise councils, so repugnant at once to the character and the interests of their country as those which, having excluded our trade from the marts of the Old World, deny it a vent in the New, for fear such an intercourse might aid the cause of human freedom, and give umbrage to the contemptible tyrant of Spain? It has often been said, and I have hitherto assumed it as unquestionable, that the excessive load of taxation is one chief cause of the depression under which our commerce now labours. The House, I am persuaded, will give me credit for entertaining no disposition to mix this question with popular clamour against burdens which must be borne. But I wish to remove some misconceptions of an opposite nature, which have too frequently influenced such discussions; and to shew in what manner relief might be given to the public without material injury to the revenue. Some persons, whose general opinions I profess to hold in great respect, have lately supported a position, which I take leave to think a mere fallacy; they have maintained, that the amount of the imposts laid upon goods, or upon whatever affects the price of goods, destined for the foreign market, can be no obstacle to their sale; and they attempt to prove this strange paradox by the consideration, that, as we are enabled to give a proportionably higher price for those commodities which we take in return, it comes to the same thing whether the foreigner buys cheap or dear of us. A single word overthrows this reasoning at once. Admitting for a moment that prices are thus regulated; the foreigner who has goods to buy will go to those who sell cheaper than we can do; and the foreigner who has goods to sell will come to us who can give the best prices. To suppose, that those who cannot afford to sell as cheap as others will have the power of regulating the market for their own commodities, is as absurd as to suppose, that those who can afford to buy dearer than others will pay higher than is necessary. There is another fallacy, much more prevalent, as to the effects of taxation within the country. The money thus raised, we are told, is spent by the government; and the same consumption is maintained as if it were expended by the individuals who paid it. Thus, to take the principal example, it is contended, that if we raise 44 millions to pay the interest and charges of the debt, that sum is spent in the country by the stockholders, instead of being spent by the payers of taxes. But first of all it should be recollected, that those sums are levied in one part of the system and generally expended in another; so that the expenditure affords no relief in the quarter where the levy of the impost was principally felt. Thus when the duty on sugar was raised in the course of a few years from 14s. to 27s. a cwt., that sum was neither returned to the planter nor the consumer; it neither went to create a new demand for the article enhanced, nor to aid those who paid dearer for it; it went to support other industry than that of the grower, and other resources than those of the consumer. Next we must bear in mind, that the revenue paid to the stockholder represents capital, which has been sunk and in great part destroyed by war: capital, which has been taken away from profitable to unprofitable employment. Nor is there any fairness in the argument, that the community is not injured by a mere transference of wealth, though none should disappear; for the taking from one class to bestow upon another injures the one more than it benefits the other, even if we had any right to strike such unjust balances; and how much more does this apply to the case of taking from an existing class to supply one which we create, or at least augment for the purpose of impoverishing the other! But the truth is, that all taxes go to support, either those whose labour is so much dead loss to the community, or much less productive than it might have been; whose numbers therefore ought never to exceed the lowest possible amount. The immense sums now raised either feed those employed thus unproductively, or pay those whose capital has been spent in the same way; they are a constant drain upon the fund destined to support productive labour; they not only prevent accumulation, but create a destruction of capital; they necessarily diminish, in exact proportion to their enormous amount, the fund which creates the effective demand for all articles of consumption. The operation, too, of taxes in diving abroad various branches of industry is unquestionable. They give advantages to foreigners in many points of view. Take for instance our duties on silk. The raw pays 5s. 6d., the organised 15s. the pound; while in France there is but one duty on both, and that only 2s. 6d. The French silk weaver, then, gets the article in the first stage of manufacture for less than half what ours pays for the raw material, as far as duty is concerned. Sometimes foreigners are discontented by a tax beyond its mere amount; the increase of, I think, only half a crown upon the Policy stamp, drove them away from Lloyd's, and created several insurance offices at Hamburg and in America. Sometimes a branch of trade is irretrievably destroyed by an injudicious tax, or receives a shock from which, even after the repeal of the duty, it never recovers. I am informed, that this has been the case with the watch trade; and the present appearances are quite consistent with this supposition. I propose now to illustrate what I have said of the effects which taxation produces upon consumption, by a reference to facts; and I shall, at the same time, have an opportunity of shewing, that the revenue does not gain all the trade loses. On the contrary, I suspect we have been in many instances killing the goose that laid the golden eggs; and I greatly deceive myself if the right hon. gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), will not soon be aware, how much truth there is in Dean Swift's remark, that "in the arithmetic of the customs two and two do not always make four." I shall begin with the duties on sugar, one of the widest fields of modern finance. They were in a short time raised from 14s. to 27s.; and if the price reaches 40s. then to 30s. the cwt. In three years, from 1803 to 1806, the former duties were increased about 50 per cent. Now the average produce of the old duties for three years before that rise was 2,778,000*l.* The produce of 1804, after it had been raised 90 per cent., was not 3,330,000*l.*, as they ought to have been had the consumption remained the same, but only 2,537,000*l.*; and the average produce of 1806 and 1807, after the whole 50 per cent. was added, only gave 3,133,000*l.*, instead of 4,167,000*l.*, which they should have yielded had the consumption not fallen off since the first rise of duty began; or 3,805,000*l.*, which they should have yielded had there been no falling off since 1804. Thus both trade and revenue suffered by the great increase of duty in 1803: and trade suffered severely by the subsequent augmentations, while revenue gained in a very small proportion. The duties on glass were nearly doubled in ten years: the produce of those duties has not sensibly increased at all. Here then, is a destruction of the glass trade, to the amount of one half its whole bulk, without any direct gain to the revenue, and with a very certain loss to it in other branches connected with the diminished consumption. In this case two and two were not found to make four. We have recently had before us (see page 305.) the history of the wine trade, in a very excellent petition presented by my hon. friend below me (Mr. Sharpe). The duties on wine have been tied since 1792; the deficiency in the port of London alone was 338,329*l.* last year, as compared with 1815. The average consumption of three years, ending 1814, was above 3,000 pipes less than the average of three years ending 1808. In 1804 the duty on port wine was increased one ninth; the produce of the duty that year fell off nearly one fourth, instead of increasing a ninth; and in 1805 it had by no means increased a ninth above its amount before the rise. Here then was a diminution of trade, an abridgment of the comforts of the people, and an injury to the revenue, first directly and afterwards indirectly. It is not so easy to illustrate by example the converse of the proposition; for, unhappily, the instances are rare in which taxes have been taken off or diminished: yet all the cases where this policy has been pursued demonstrate the truth of the doctrines for which I contend. When Mr. Pitt, by a wise and politic measure, in the year 1784, lowered the duty on Tea from 56 to 12 per cent., the revenue rose considerably. The consumption could hardly have been increased sixfold, but smuggling was prevented to an extent which, with the increased consumption, made the revenue upon the whole a gainer.

When in 1787 the duty on wine and spirits was lowered 50 per cent., the revenue was improved; the trade must therefore have doubled, the comforts of the people been materially increased, and the other sources of revenue have benefited in the same proportion. But the progress of the duties and revenue upon ~~code~~ ^{code} illustrates every part of the question in a manner peculiarly striking. In 1805 they were raised one third, and that year their produce fell off an eighth, instead of increasing a third; in 1806 they had increased, but only a sixteenth; so that the consumption had diminished above a fourth. But it was at length found, that this tax had been overdone, and it was lowered from 2*l.* to 7*d.* the cwt. Mark the immediate effects of this step. The average produce of the high duty, for the three years before it was altered, was 166,000*l.*; the average of the low duty, for three years after the alteration, was 195,000*l.*; so that, as addition has the effect sometimes of diminishing, subtraction seems to increase the sum, in the arithmetic of finance. The augmentation here shewed an increase of consumption between four and fivefold; and in Scotland, I find, that it increased tenfold. It is not, then, on mere speculative grounds that I recommend the Finance Ministers to retrace their steps, and to turn their attention from devising ways of augmenting the taxes (an object by the bye, which they may pore over as long as they please and will never be able to accomplish), to discover the best means of lessening the public burthens. I have shewn from facts, that taxes may be repealed with positive and immediate benefit to the revenue; I think no man will be hardy enough to deny, that the diminution would contribute mainly towards restoring our commerce to its healthy state, and re-establishing general comfort and prosperity. The very collection of our present enormous revenue occasions evils of a serious nature to every class of the people. All of us are acquainted with the inconveniences of ordinary occurrence; but few are aware how severely they press upon trade. To the difficulties of collecting such a revenue are principally owing the monopolies of the Dock Companies, by which the whole of the West Indian commerce, and several of the other great branches of trade are subjected to heavy duties, and irksome delays. Our merchants complain of much dilatory and troublesome proceeding at the Custom House; they must wait for a person who has more to do than he can manage; they must, on every trifling difference, apply to the Board; a variety of annoying steps must be gone through; bonds, with all the costs incident to them, are needlessly multiplied; and, in short, every thing begins in plague and ends in expense. It is very true, that better arrangement might remove some portion of these hardships, but the greater part of them are essential to the system. You cannot multiply indefinitely Officers and Boards, in whom so large a confidence is of necessity reposed; you cannot, in a word, collect such a revenue as ours without infinite vexation and delay, beyond the actual burthen of the impost. Such prodigious levies, with their direct effects, hamper and distress our trade in various ways, which it would be impossible to estimate in money. Sir, I have trespassed beyond all bounds, I fear, upon the patience of the House: but I cannot prevail on myself to sit down without soliciting your attention to that part of the subject which I have as yet only glanced at slightly. The House, I doubt not, have already perceived that I refer to the entire abandonment of all care for the commercial interests of this country in the administration of our foreign affairs. After a war of unexampled suffering and exertion has been crowned with success far beyond the most sanguine expectation, and lifted the name and the influence of the nation to a height without any parallel in the proudest eras of its past history, we naturally ask, how it comes to pass, that the glorious peace which our efforts have purchased comes without restoring foreign trade; that we are still shut out from most parts of the continent as if war was still waged against our commerce; and that day after day fresh obstacles spring up to it in the quarters where it ought to meet the kindest encouragement? It is not in France merely, where we have long been accustomed to expect a return of jealousy, that our intercourse enjoys no facilities. In what corner of Europe does it possess them? Is it not plain, that with those very allies for whom we have fought and conquered—for whose cause we have been lavish of our treasure and prodigal of our best blood—from whom neither dominion nor indemnity have ever been asked in return—even with those allies we have never had influence enough to obtain the advantage or the convenience of one single Custom House regulation in our favour? Has any thing been done by these men, with all their influence over the councils of Europe? Has any thing been attempted by them? I am aware, that Russia has reduced her tariff in many articles since the termination of the war;—but I also know, that, generally speaking, our commerce labours under duties so nearly amounting to a prohibition, as to throw it into the hands of contraband traders, and exclude the fair and honourable dealing of the British merchant. I know, that, from Memel to the southernmost part of Poland, along the whole line of the Russian frontier, the traffic is driven by means of Jews and other smugglers, as it used to be under Buonaparte's continental system; that now, as formerly, they have their great entrepôt at Brody, and were the purchasers of almost all the bills drawn last summer for the sales of wheat exported through Odessa to the Mediterranean. Russia, however, is more favourable to our commerce than any of our other allies, and some improvement might be hoped for in that quarter, were we not exactly in that quarter met most adversely by the other branch of our policy, of which I have already said so much, the prohibitory scheme of our own laws, by which we are prevented from taking in exchange most of the articles of Russian produce. But Prussia, with whom we made common cause—who owes to our efforts, next to those of her gallant people, the restoration of her independence—almost directly excludes us from all intercourse with her dominions. Duties amounting to a prohibition are laid upon the importation of our goods; and for such as are carried through the territory to be sold elsewhere there are only two ports of landing assigned, and a transit payment of 8 and a half per cent. imposed. How then does the matter stand in Spain—in that country which our gigantic exertions have saved—whose defence, in money alone, besides subsidies, and beside expenses incurred elsewhere, has left a sum of accounts still unaudited, amounting, as we heard the other day, to above fifty millions? Why, in return for this it appears, that with the cabinet of Madrid we possess just no interest whatsoever, either commercial or political! This is a picture of ingratitude on the one hand, and imbecility on the other, disgusting as it regards Spain—humiliating to our own government—provoking to the country. The sense of the Spanish nation was, with more or less correctness, represented by the Cortes; while its authority continued, a free intercourse with us was studiously promoted. The Cortes was put down, freedom extinguished, and the beloved usurper restored. Instantly old monopolies were revived and enforced, and enlarged with new powers, all strictly hostile to British interests. Additional obstruction was given to our trade, notwithstanding Apodaca's treaty had, on our part, almost guaranteed the integrity of the Spanish dominions, and, on theirs, promised a speedy commercial arrangement. Nay, after our Ministers had, in support of Ferdinand, gone farther than was lawful for the rulers of a free and honourable nation like England; after they had been guilty of the most indecent subserviency to his criminal views, abandoned the high tone they used to assume with France while fighting his battle, looked on with perfect indifference at his iniquities, stooped to become the parasites of his caprices, and pander for him the degradation of his country and the slavery of his unfortunate subjects, our own gallant companions in arms—how were they required for those labours in the humiliation of the English name?—In “a little month” after the signature of the second treaty, an edict was issued, extending the monopoly of the Philippine company, so as to exclude all British cottons; and we had hardly sent out the order of the garter to our ally, when, in return for the courtesy, this decree was backed and enforced by new regulations; and the commercial privileges of Biscay, so favourable to all foreign trade, were, by an act of mere violence upon its ancient constitution, annulled! Beside the rigorous prohibition of cottons, woollens pay 26 and 43 per cent. for the two finer qualities, and as high as 130 for the second, a burthen which the fair trader cannot bear. It thus happens, that our commerce with Spain is in a worse condition than with almost any other foreign state, and consigned, in a very great measure, to contraband traders. Not fifteen parts in the hundred of our goods consumed in that country are calculated to pay the duties imposed; the remaining seventy-five parts are smuggled; and about 200,000*l.* are paid yearly to Portugal for duties upon the goods sent thither in order to be covertly introduced into Spain. If we turn our attention to Austria, again we meet with nothing but prohibition. Since the peace, which we fought for side by side with her, and conquered more for her than ourselves, she has either excluded, or loaded almost to the point of exclusion, all the articles in which we can trade with her fine dominions. Our manufactures generally are forbidden; so are cotton yarns below a certain fineness; and it is not much above half a year since the duties upon all finer yarns were suddenly doubled. It should seem as if, from all our exertions to serve the continental powers, whether looking after honour or profit, we were fated to reap nothing but loss and disgrace. I would now call the attention of the noble lord in the blue ribbon (Lord Castlereagh) to some things, which, though within his department, it is very possible he may not be aware of; because it is quite possible, that those military gentlemen, whom he has planted as Ministers and Consuls in different places, how skilled soever in their own profession, may have failed to make any reports upon commercial arrangements, as things very much out of their line, if not below their notice. Does the noble lord now hear for the first time, and if he does I am sure it should make a deep impression on his mind, that punishment has so swiftly followed guilt? Does he for the first time hear, that the fruits have already been gathered of the two worst acts in that system of wicked policy, of which the noble lord is the advocate in this House, as he was the adviser elsewhere—that the very persons, in whose behalf those deeds were done, have even now set themselves in direct hostility to the interests of this country? If he has not before heard this, it may prove a useful lesson to him, and at all events I trust it will not be thrown away upon public men generally, if I make known how those very individuals, for whose sake the noble lord sacrificed the honour of his country, and abandoned its soundest policy towards foreign states; those with whom, after pulling down the usurper, he plunged into the deepest of all the public crimes that stained his course, and gave the ground for resisting him; that they now execrate or condemn the man who made himself the accomplice of their infamous projects? I suspect the noble lord's conscience already whispers to what I allude. I guess he is aware, that I am going to name Ragusa and Genoa—Ragusa and Genoa! where the name of England received a stain; that all the victories of Lord Wellington cannot wipe away, nor the services of the longest life of the greatest Minister that ever lived could atone for. I will speak of Ragusa first: it is the smaller state, and for that reason I dwell upon it the most; because, if there be such a thing as political morality, and political justice, if those words have any sense, they can only mean, that the rights and the liberties of the weaker states are to be protected by the more powerful; because, in the nature of things, public crime, the offence of one nation against another, must always consist of the strong trampling down the feeble. Therefore, if the spot in question were San Marino instead of Ragusa, I should the rather cite the example, and deem the oppression of that smaller community a still more flagrant outrage upon justice—a baser dereliction of public principle. Ragusa had flourished for centuries under the protection of the Ottoman Porte, and nominally, at least, under its dominion. The Porte was the ally of England. Often had we blazoned Buonaparte's attack upon Egypt as among the worst of his atrocities, because France was in amity with the Turk, and there could be no motive for the enterprise but the love of gain or the lust of power. Nay, his sending Sebastiani to Egypt after the peace of Amiens was one of the principal grounds alleged by us for so suddenly renewing the war. Then I demand, were we at war with the Ottoman Porte during the black transactions of Vienna? Were we not in friendship and alliance with it? Did we once consult it about the cession of Ragusa to Austria? What is more important, did we ever consult the Ragusans upon that cession? Have we not, without the least regard to the rights of a free people, parcelled out their country at our own discretion; and, from the liberty they were enjoying, and the independence they were proud of, delivered them over to what they deemed subjugation and tyranny? Had they, the Ragusans, the people of Ragusa, the smallest share in the deliberations of the famous congress? They had no Minister there, they had made no communication to the assembled negotiators, they had received none from thence. Their existence was hardly known, except by the gallant example they had set of shaking off, without any aid, the hated empire of France. And how did we requite them for this noble effort, nay, this brilliant service in what we cantingly termed "the common cause of nations?" We, who had sounded to the uttermost corners of the earth the alarm of Buonaparte's ambition; we, who could never be satiated with invective against his despotism and injustice; we, who in the name of freedom and independence, called on the people of the whole globe, and the Ragusans among the rest, and they at le had answered the summons, to rise up against him and overthrow his usurped dominion; we required them by handing them over, in the way of barter, as slaves to a power of which they detested the yoke! But let the noble lord, and let this House, and let the world mark the retribution which has followed this flagitious act. Austria, extending her commercial regulations to all her new acquisitions, has absolutely shut our trade out of that very Ragusa, which we had betrayed into her hands; and thus has the noble lord received his punishment upon the spot on which he had so shamefully sacrificed the honour of his country! Sir, if any page in the history of the late Congress be blacker than another, it is that which records the deeds of the noble lord against Genoa. When I approach this subject, and reflect on the powerful oratory, the force of argument as well as of language, backed by the high authority of virtue, a sanction ever deeply felt in this House, once displayed in the cause of that ill-fated Republic, by tongues now silent, but which used to be ever eloquent where public justice was to be asserted, or useful truth fearlessly inculcated, I feel hardly capable of going on. My lasting sorrow for the loss we have sustained is made deeper by the regret, that those lamented friends (Messrs. Whitbread and Horner) live not to witness the punishment of that foul conduct which they solemnly denounced. The petty tyrant, to whom the noble lord delivered over that ancient and gallant people, almost as soon as they had at his call joined the standard of national independence, has since subjected them to the most rigorous provisions of his absurd code; a code directed especially against the commerce of this country, and actually less unfavourable to France. Thus, then, it appears, that after all, in public as well as in private, in state affairs as in the concerns of the most humble individuals, the old maxim cannot safely be forgotten, that "honesty is the best policy." In vain did the noble lord flatter himself, that his subserviency to the unrighteous system of the Congress would secure him the adherence of the courts whom he made his idols. If he had abandoned that false foreign system—if he had acted upon the principles of the nation whom he represented, and stood forward as the advocate of the rights of the people—the people would have been grateful. He preferred the interests and the wishes of the courts, and by the courts he is treated with their wonted neglect. To his crimes against the people all over Europe—to his invariable surrender of their cause—to his steady refusal of the protection, which they had a right to expect, and which they did expect from the manly and generous character of England—it is owing, that if, at this moment, you traverse the continent in any direction whatever, you may trace the noble lord's career in the curses of the nations whom he has betrayed, and the mockery of the courts who have inveigled him to be their dupe. It is in vain we attempt to deceive ourselves. No truth can be more evident than this, that if, instead of patronizing abuse, tyranny, and plunder, we had exhibited a noble, gallant, English spirit in behalf of popular rights and national independence; if, instead of chiming in with and aping their narrow, wretched principles, we had done our utmost to enlighten the policy of foreign courts—we should have had to treat with a number of constitutional governments, directed by sound views of policy, and disposed to adopt arrangements generally beneficial, instead of the capricious and spiteful regulations, which now annoy us in every quarter. Only compare the conduct of America towards us with that of the King of Sardinia, of the Austrian Emperor, of Ferdinand of Spain. From America we had no right to expect peculiar favour. Her struggle for independence we had treated as a rebellion. It was successful; and we never altogether forgave it, but entertained towards her feelings approaching sometimes to contempt, sometimes to hatred. I am very far from thinking the Americans untainted by similar prejudices. They have perhaps been foolish enough to cherish a little spite in return for ours. Nor do I give their government credit for being wholly above the influence of this animosity; but experience has shewn, that, in all popular governments, the true interest of the community must in the main be consulted, and in the great bulk of cases supersede every lesser consideration. Now, we can never, as a trading nation, desire more than that all other countries should adopt the line of commercial policy best suited to the interests of the body of the people in each. The American Government has, not from regard for us, but for the sake of its own subjects, pursued a course favourable to the mutual intercourse of the two states. It is allowing the manufactories created by our absurd system gradually to decline, because industry can there be more beneficially employed in other pursuits. With a few very trifling exceptions, the market of the United States will, in a few months, again be completely restored to us, as far as the competition of the American manufacture is concerned, and it is plainly the only considerable relief which we can expect for a long time to come. In France we might have obtained something like the same advantages. There was a time when the feelings of the people ran strongly in our favour; but, instead of cultivating such dispositions, we have adopted a policy destructive of every kindly impression, and calculated to alienate the affections of all who retain the slightest regard for national honour. I may appeal to any one who has been in France since the war, I will even ask the gentlemen opposite, if they have not observed a most intimate connexion between the commercial and the political prejudices, which now prevail against us. Talk to them of a commercial treaty, or generally of trade with us, and their answer is, nor can we marvel at it, "While you keep 130,000 men in arms quartered upon our territory, we will not treat with you at all. While you rule us with a rod of iron, you shall get no gold from us by trading. While you exact tribute directly at the point of the bayonet, you must not hope to obtain it circuitously through the channels of traffic." These feelings are not peculiar to France; depend upon it, as long as the same fatal policy is pursued, British commerce will be excluded from the continent, excluded more effectually than by Buonaparte's decrees and his armies, because now, for the first time, its ports are sealed against us by the governments, with the cordial assent of the people. I hope and trust, that this country may, before it is too late, retrace the steps, which it has been taking towards destruction, under the guidance of the noble lord. I pray that we may live to see England once more holding her steady course in the direction of a liberal, a manly, an honest, an English policy. May the salutary change be wrought, because our honour and fame demands it; but, if no higher considerations can influence our councils—if all worthier motives have lost their force—may we at the least consult our safety: adhere to that which is right, because it is shewn to be beneficial; and abandon the path of dishonour, because it is leading us to ruin.—I move you, Sir, to resolve:

1. That the trade and manufactures of the country are reduced to a state of such unexampled difficulty as demands the most serious attention of this House.

2. That those difficulties are materially increased by the policy pursued with respect to our foreign commerce, and that a revision of this system ought forthwith to be undertaken by the House.

3. That the continuance of these difficulties is in a great degree owing to the severe pressure of taxation under which the country labours, and which ought, by every practicable means, to be lightened.

4. That the system of foreign policy pursued by his Majesty's Ministers has not been such as to obtain for the people of this country those commercial advantages, which the influence of Great Britain in foreign courts fairly entitled them to expect.

Mr. F. Robinson in rising to oppose the motion adverted to a speech made by the hon. and learned gentleman on subjects closely connected with the present, last session. He had come to the House, with the conviction, that the hon. and learned member intended to pursue a similar career of moderation and candour: and in the greater part of his speech his expectations had not been disappointed. He readily admitted to him most of his arguments, as practical subjects, which were the most easy for the House to decide upon; but he must express his unfeigned surprise and regret at the latter part of the speech. Nobody who heard that, could avoid supposing that the whole was intended as an instrument of condemnation of the conduct of Government. If the learned member wished the House to look difficulties and embarrassments fairly in the face, he would not have adopted that course which rendered it impossible for all to agree to his conclusions. Though he much lamented the introduction of such extraneous topics, he did not feel himself called upon to enter into them. All the points introduced for the object of criminating the Government, had been already sufficiently provided against by distinct votes of Parliament; which, though they might not convince some of the propriety of the measures of Ministers, yet formed a sufficient reason for the House not agreeing to mix them up with the present question. He should therefore avoid any observations on those subjects. It would in himself be ridiculous presumption to attempt then to follow minutely the vast variety of interesting details into which the learned member had gone at such length. In many things he quite concurred with him; particularly as to our own restrictions, and prohibitory regulations for trade and commerce; but, perhaps, upon particular circumstances, he felt more strongly than the learned gentleman might be enabled to feel, the great difficulties that stood in the way of even salutary alterations on a large scale. It was not the question now to go back to history, and to trace the errors of Ministers of a century ago; but whether we could now entirely escape from their consequences. He had expressed his own opinions last year; but never had been able to find the practicability of applying those opinions to the case. He was even ready to admit, that the system respecting trade and commerce so long acted upon, had a tendency to produce the distresses complained of. It prevented the beneficial effects of commercial arrangements which might be entered into with foreign countries. The hon. and learned gentleman thought, that after the conclusion of the war, for the successful prosecution of which we had advanced such vast supplies, we should have made some sort of compacts favourable to our trade, commerce, and manufactures; but no such commercial arrangements could possibly have been permanent. It was not to be supposed, that in their views of their own interests, foreign nations were dissimilar to ourselves. Good God! could the learned gentleman believe that Holland, with her extended territories in the Netherlands, would long remain quiet, under arrangements exclusively beneficial to us; and while it would be useless to us to attempt to persuade our own manufacturers to a measure which gave facilities to foreign trade? Such conditions could only provoke jealousies, heartburnings and wars. Our language to other nations was, that we fought and gave supplies for the common interest and advantage, and not merely for our gain: but, on the learned gentleman's ideas, we must have declared it to be for our own benefit; and that state of things could not have lasted. As to France, the case would have been still worse. The result of our exertions had been to reduce the resources, to humble the pride, and to strip off the emblems of glory gained through conquests, of that nation. If we had added to this, commercial evils, what hopes could then have existed of the continuance of peace? It was not to be expected that France could have borne it. We should have been driven from the system sooner or later. He was intimately convinced that we never could have availed ourselves of it long; especially while such deep-rooted prejudices prevailed here against the granting of commercial facilities to other countries. He had some doubts, generally, as to the benefits derived from commercial treaties: at all events, they were never likely to prove beneficial, unless when reciprocal. Acknowledging the ill effects of restrictive policy, yet he must look at the difficulties in the way of removing it. There was nothing in the shape of trade, commerce, or manufactures, that he had not been repeatedly urged to protect by high duties: and in some instances he had been driven to adopt some of the recommendations. He considered the Corn Bill as standing upon peculiar grounds of great and overwhelming necessity, which set all general principles at defiance. However, it was not to be wondered at that other branches of trade demanded similar protection. The member for Essex, whose indisposition unfortunately prevented his attendance there (Mr. Western,) proposed to extend the protecting system to every thing connected with agriculture; and by the means he suggested (of which he, Mr. R., did not approve entirely) hides and tallow would have been affected. Had such measures been adopted, he must observe, that there would have been an end to all the learned gentleman's magnificent speculations concerning South America; since such articles might constitute the means whereby they were to repay our manufactures. He agreed with the hon. gentleman, in the existence of great immediate distress, but disagreed with him as to its cause. The hon. and learned gentleman had admitted, that the distresses in the woollen and iron trade had been considerably occasioned by the change from war to peace: but he weakened the effect of his admission by contending that at the end of former wars, this consequence did not immediately follow. It was said, that at the end of other wars such great evils did not occur. But then, consider the duration of the late wars, and their great expense, and the vast amount of population and capital employed in materials necessary to a state of war; and then the withdrawing of the demand in consequence of the return of peace. It would be absurd, after all, to argue that war was desirable. The fair inference was, that war was to be avoided, if possible, when we saw that it tended to create an unnatural species of prosperity; and when we saw the revulsion occasioned at its cessation. This ought to be a most powerful argument against war. So, with respect to what was said about South America, it was not policy to act so as to provoke a war, the calamities of which might go to an extent we could not know. The learned gentleman spoke contemptuously of the conduct of Government in not shewing itself more friendly towards the South American provinces. We might recollect what was thought of the conduct of France and Spain respecting the states of North America. Would not the same things be said of us now, as then of them? Their conduct excited here universal indignation. So it was viewed by Mr. Fox and Mr. Burke, who were opposers of the American war on what he (Mr. R.) conceived wise principles. What would our interference now be called? The learned gentleman attempted to describe the conduct of Government as proceeding from love of tyranny. He was certainly extremely ingenious, and apt to find out the worst motives; but his being so, was certainly no reason for the House necessarily to adopt his opinions. He should advert to a few more other subjects. The learned gentleman, to heighten a melancholy picture, had dwelt on the condition of the miners and the ironworkers of Staffordshire. No doubt there were alarming distresses among them; but they would not have been so great except through the circumstances of the war and the transition to peace. They would not have happened in the natural course of things. He must admit, that in these cases the evils were not temporary; but such as a state of war, perhaps, could only remove by the revival of a demand for their manufactures. There were some points of minor importance, such as the state of the watch trade, which he did not see how the House could greatly improve. There were great facilities found in peace for smuggling such articles of manufacture, which did not exist in time of war; and he believed that better and cheaper watches of some kinds could be made on the Continent. These were now smuggled very much; not by the ordinary smugglers, but by ladies and gentlemen who visited France for their pleasure. Nor could legislation provide for the great number of tailors, said to be out of employment; though that was certainly a proof of distress. Consider, however, the deduction of persons so employed by the great reduction of demand for clothing the army. Agreeing with much of the forcible argument of the learned gentleman, yet it would be found extremely difficult to get persons concerned in manufactures to listen even to any plan of alteration. It was not Government that was to blame respecting the present system. He firmly believed that Government could not overturn it. With respect to foreign commerce, he had been strongly recommended to propose high prohibitory duties upon foreign articles imported. As to the linen duty, he had himself been burnt in effigy in several parts of the north of Ireland for a plan he had proposed. The committee of inquiry proposed by Mr. Finlay last year, was refused. The existence of the system, if wrong, must not be charged on Government. All the manufacturers would be in arms at a proposal to reduce the prohibitory duty on coals. Recollect, the bill of last year to diminish the export duty on the smaller sorts of coal alarmed the glass manufacturers and others, who represented it as pregnant with ruin, by tending to set up rival foreign manufactories. In France and Holland there were high import duties, and particularly in Holland, to protect its own coals. In France the import duty on coals was nearly equal to our export duty; and both France and Holland would pursue the system calculated to preserve their own interests. He wished we had never adopted the restrictive system, though he differed from the learned gentleman as to the extent of alteration to which he would go. Whoever thought we could now replace our continental commerce on the same extraordinary footing in which it had stood for a few years, would find himself mistaken. Then we had in our possession all the valuable foreign colonies, and supplied the nations of Europe with even necessities of life. By referring to the official accounts of exports, it would be seen that the greatest deficiencies were in sugar, coffee, &c. of which, in one year, it was said, we exported eight millions. The magnificent and enviable colony of Java was now returned to Holland. The continental manufactures were, therefore, now liable to improvement from capital, industry, and ingenuity. There was nothing very mysterious in the machinery we used, though at present we might work it better than foreign nations could; but if peace lasted long (and God grant it might!) he could see no clear reason why foreigners might not rival us in many articles; at least in the markets of their own countries. There were hundreds and thousands employed in France in the manufacture of cloth and silk; and cotton too had become there a great object of attention and interest. So he might go on to say of Saxony, of Prussia, and of Austria. The improvements were likely to proceed in every country while peace afforded the means of capital. He should leave the question of duties on our trade to be discussed by others. Had the learned gentleman concluded his speech as he might have easily done, he might have found difficulty in meeting the question with so decided an opinion. He had hoped that the conclusion would have been of a practical nature, but the learned gentleman had quite changed the question. He therefore moved the other orders of the day.

Mr. Brougham explained. He only alluded to the watch trade, and the tailors, as marks of general distress.

Mr. Robinson explained.

Mr. Baring thought the conclusion of Mr. Robinson's speech more surprising than that of Mr. Brougham's: for he had admitted the leading facts of the great distresses of the principal branches of trade, yet would not agree to the motion because Mr. B. had not ended his speech with all the good temper he wished for. He even admitted the necessity of a radical Reform for these branches of our trade: yet proposed to pass to the orders of the day, proposing nothing, after hearing a speech of such variety and great information. This was only because Genoa and Ragusa had been spoken of. If the vice-president of the board of trade admitted the evils of the system, and spoke of the influence of bodies who prevented beneficial changes, ought not Ministers to apply to Parliament on a subject so important; that they might consider who they were that beset the Treasury and the public offices in this manner? The vice-president's speech was confirmatory of his learned friend's. It would be then a waste of time to get into details; but for his part, he could wish that a great deal of the machinery now used had never existed. He would rather have seen cotton spinning only at the cottage doors. But the system arose out of the progress of improvement and invention: and the only result of throwing impediments in their way now would be the setting up the same things on the opposite coasts. The poor deluded people at Nottingham thought they were doing something beneficial to their trade by destroying machinery; but such outrages tended only to drive the manufactory to other places. Distress, in some degree, had followed every extended war. Facts respecting such matters were not always easily got at. Some light was shed on the subject by the recent publication of Dr. Franklin's letters. Distress was occasioned by the length and expense of wars, and the revulsion at peace; but at present there was another peculiar circumstance, arising from the paper currency, which had occasioned, he believed, in its results some little alteration in the value of landed property. The return from war to peace was spoken of as the cause of distress; but the cause was, that all property had been depreciated, which had affected all classes in the country; landed, commercial, or any others; and which was naturally succeeded by a stagnation of trade. The time was now arrived when it became the duty of the House to interpose, more especially as Ministers avowed their intention of attempting nothing for the relief of the country. With respect to a commercial treaty, he would be the last man to recommend any thing like low cunning or artifice in its formation: as, in the dealings between man and man, the best way of doing business was to deal fairly and openly; so, in the great arrangements between nation and nation, it was for the advantage of each party to avoid every thing that bore even the appearance of fraud or deception. The old maxim, so often repeated in questions of this kind, ought never to be deserted, viz. to give the utmost freedom to trade by the removal of every impediment. He wished to say a few words upon the present rate of interest for money. There was no doubt that the present high price of the funds was to be attributed to the employment of capital there which could be applied to no other purpose: though of late it had not accumulated so rapidly as formerly, yet it had accumulated, and it had not yet reached the pockets of those who were desirous of raising money upon land. Why it had not done so was clearly to be traced to the present rate of interest; for while a man could legally obtain more than 5 per cent. in the funds, he would not be satisfied with that interest upon land. If, as he hoped he should witness in a short time, the rate of interest were set free, a regular market for the mortgage of land, as for other things, would be established, and landholders would no longer be driven into the fangs of Jews and money-lenders, who extorted from them the most disadvantageous terms. The law, as it at present stood, produced not a single benefit, and was the real source of considerable distress. He trusted that the House would agree to the motion of his hon. friend, in order to convince the country that it was not altogether forgetful of its duty, however negligent Ministers might be of theirs.

Mr. Rose contended, that the resolutions proposed on the other side could not be adopted until some evidence had been adduced to shew that the statements were true: assertions were made, but nothing was proved; and though many arguments had been employed to shew that all the distresses were imputable to Ministers, the arguments were as destitute of foundation as the assertions. The present was the first occasion within his memory when not a single account had been required from the public offices on which a motion of such importance was to be grounded. The account of tonnage produced by the honourable and learned gentleman proved nothing, unless he could also shew in what way that tonnage was employed, with what goods the ships were laden, or how many of them were in ballast. With respect to the iron trade, it appeared from authentic accounts to be in the following proportions:—in 1814, it was 2,176,000; in 1815, 2,639,000; and in 1816, 3,081,000; so that in the last year the quantity was greater than the average of the two preceding years. No doubt the manufacturers of Birmingham felt a great depression, because they did not depend solely upon exports, and the home demand had been very much diminished. The hon. gent. had said a great deal upon the propriety of forcing a trade to South America; but all persons better acquainted with the subject knew that the project was impracticable. The diminution of the demand for the luxuries of life was principally to be attributed to the temporary emigration of many families to the Continent. The remarks made upon machinery seemed inapplicable to this question. Session after session, during the war, acts were repealed that restricted the use of machinery; and if a different course of policy were now pursued, what would become of the cotton-manufactures of the kingdom? the difference of the circulation now and at a former period might be considered one cause of the present distresses. When the restriction was put upon the cash payments of the Bank of England, no less than 44 millions sterling, in gold, were in circulation: Bank paper at that time did not exceed 18 millions; it had since risen to 27 millions, and the paper of country banks had amounted to 9 or 10 millions; so that, in the whole, the circulation of late had been only 36 millions instead of 44 millions, as in 1797; which of itself would produce much inconvenience. At the same time he was decidedly opposed to a precipitate resumption of cash payments. The poverty of the continent was another great source of distress in this country; but in that respect rapid improvements were making. The hon. and learned gentleman had contended, that the prosperity of the country was not to be calculated from the present state of the exchanges; but in his (Mr. Rose's) opinion, those exchanges and the price of gold afforded the most flattering prospect. It had also been argued, that we had constantly treated France as an inveterate enemy, instead of conciliating her friendship. The fact, however, was otherwise; for after the American war many duties were lowered, and several prohibitions removed; the impost upon French wines was reduced one-half, while that upon the wines of Portugal was only reduced one-third. Mr. Rose then proceeded to notice what had been said by Mr. Brougham upon the different manufactures, but he addressed himself principally to his friends on his right and left, and in so inaudible a voice that his remarks did not reach the gallery. He gave his hearty concurrence to what had fallen from Mr. Baring on the subject of a commercial treaty; and concluded by contending, that though distresses prevailed, he saw no cause for despondency, convinced as he was, that in a short time all things would come round, and prosperity would be restored to all classes.

Sir John Newport denied that no evidence had been produced in support of the resolutions: what were the petitions with which the table was daily crowded, but convincing proofs of the general distress that pervaded the nation? The right hon. gent. who spoke last had uttered, no doubt, the sentiments of his friends; and he sat down with admitting the distresses, but refusing to look them in the face: Ministers were for waiting until things came round, as they expressed it; and to them might be applied the well-known line of Horace—Rusticus expectat dum defuat annis; and unless some measures were adopted, it might be added, of the tide of distress that overflowed the country, Labitur et labitur in omne volubilis ævum. Would the House follow the same pernicious example? The right hon. gent. had spoken of no remedies; one indeed he had hinted at, by the way, in the restoration of cash payments by the Bank: but, as if aware of what he had done, he had immediately contradicted himself, and had insisted that specie should not be too rapidly restored to circulation. (Hear.) On the other side, nothing but hopes founded upon nothing but fears, the fears of Ministers to contemplate the difficulties they had to encounter, had been talked of; but a system of delusion would afford no remedy, and it was not only the consequences of the termination of a war, but the enormous burden of taxation that pressed upon the people. The right hon. gent. had called the emigrations temporary: but he would find them continue until the country was restored to such a state that a gentleman of family could live in the style to which he had been born. He had said also that poverty was coming round: it had come round, and having travelled over the continent, it had centered itself in Great Britain, where it was likely to remain stationary for any exertions Ministers were disposed to make. (Hear, hear.) The rise in the funds was itself a proof of distress. Capitalists could find no other employment for their money; all other sources of profit were destroyed: on this account the funds were so high; and not, as was pretended on the other side, because the Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended, and the people had such confidence in the protection Ministers would afford them from a few insignificant rioters. He concluded by some remarks upon the sinking fund, maintaining that it could not be of any benefit to the stockholder, unless it were a surplus remedy.

Mr. C. Grant objected to the resolutions, not because they referred to distresses of the country, but because they were intended as criminalations of Ministers: and because the tendency of them was to produce through the country regret for the past, and hopelessness for the future. Three principal causes might be assigned for the admitted distresses: 1. the exhausted state of the continent; 2. the glut of foreign markets with British goods; 3. the destruction of the home market. The last was the most important; but they were all temporary, and would ere long effectually cure themselves. The destruction of the home market was mainly to be assigned to the low price of agricultural produce. A few years ago the agricultural produce of the country sold for 216 millions annually; now, scarcely half that sum was obtained; and the farmers, and all persons connected with the tillage of the soil, were consequently unable to purchase articles which before obtained a ready sale. In 1809 and 1810 the continent was closed against us, but the goods that were returned were disposed of in the home market, and the distress was consequently much less than at present, when neither a home nor a foreign market existed. It was fair, however, to look at the other side of the question; and he entertained very sanguine hopes that all the evils at present complained of would be speedily removed. He was happy to say that, from all the information he had been able to obtain, the state of the country was rapidly ameliorating. Among the woolen-manufacturers the opinion was, that a very considerable improvement might soon be expected; and the same favourable prospect, he was assured, prevailed with respect to the cotton-trade. Orders for our manufactures were daily falling in from various quarters; and it was worthy of remark, that they did not come from markets which might be considered as speculative, but appeared to proceed from a solid source of demand. What was most advisable to be done was to give an impulse to that which communicated its impulse to every thing else—he meant our agricultural system. That had in some degree been done by the last Corn Bill, and the corn districts were now reaping the benefit of that measure. The hon. and learned gent. had spoken of the relaxation of our commercial system; and he agreed with him in thinking, that such relaxation would be highly advantageous to the country; but how was it to be brought about? The hon. and learned gent. could not but be aware, that the opinion of the country was decidedly against any relaxation, and nothing could be more unstatesmanlike than to attempt to legislate against public opinion. Many seemed to suppose, that there was some magical secret in the system which had elevated this country to its high pitch of commercial greatness: but if there was any secret, he was sure it was not wrapped up in the paragraphs of these restrictive statutes, but was to be found in the industrious spirit and skill of the people of this country. But he was convinced that the difficulties which our trade had experienced were about to be overcome. With regard to foreign trade, the Mediterranean and American markets were fully open to us. When gentlemen considered the resources the country possesses, the high state of its cultivation, the extent of our empire, our political ascendancy and superiority in arts and in arms, could they believe the predictions they had heard? Were they to believe, that this great nation was now ruined past all hope of recovery? In answering these questions, he should not inquire what markets we had for our manufactures; he would appeal to a higher ground. He relied for our security and prosperity on the energy and strength of character possessed by the people of this country, on the ascendancy of the national genius, which, having carried us with glory through the war, he was confident would procure for us happiness in peace.

Mr. Sharp said, some observations had fallen from the two right hon. gentlemen who had spoken on the other side, to which he thought short but conclusive answers might be given. One of these right hon. gentlemen had attributed the recent rise in the funds to an increasing confidence in his Majesty's Ministers. He did not indeed go so far as a noble person was said to have done in another place, and assert, that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act had occasioned the rise, but still he was equally distant from the mark. He would tell the right hon. gent. what the real cause was: it was a very judicious measure adopted by the Channellor of the Exchequer, namely, the lowering the rate of interest on Exchequer Bills; that interest, which was lately 5 per cent., is now reduced to three-and-a-half, and this difference sufficiently accounted for the preference given by monied men to the funds. The right hon. gent. had made a comparison between the state of the funds at the close of the American war, when there was a fall, and the rise which had taken place now. The cause of that difference he would also explain. At the end of the American war, there was an immediate opening for the commercial enterprise of the country, and that opening produced a transfer of money from the funds to trade; but for such transfer there was now no temptation. In reply to what his hon. and learned friend had said on the impolicy of commercial restrictions, the right hon. gent. who first attempted to answer him said, that Ministers had been obliged to yield to the demands of the manufacturers in imposing these restrictions. Now, this was no answer to his hon. and learned friend's argument, though it was a very candid confession of the deplorable weakness of the Government.

Mr. Thornton said, that he felt obliged to the learned gent. for bringing forward the discussion; and although he did not feel the necessity to change our whole policy of foreign commerce, he still was induced to recommend his Majesty's Ministers to revise many branches of it; and in particular those that had been mentioned, of the duties on foreign timber, especially from Norway and the Baltic; also the high duty on foreign linens, which was the occasion of the transit and profits on them being lost to the country, together with the other articles that might compose an assorted cargo with the linens. He adverted to Mr. Rose's statement, that the circulation of the country was greatly diminished, and his observations on the Bank of England. He said the Directors had a delicate and arduous duty to fulfil. There were persons in that House ready to censure any increased issue of bank-notes; and, on the other hand, the right hon. gent. was of opinion their issue was too small. The Directors ever had, and would continue to fulfil the trust and confidence placed in them in a prudent and considerate manner. The right hon. gent. had stated, that a circulation of 40 millions of gold had existed before the war, and had said so in a pamphlet. He (Mr. Thornton) thought it extremely difficult to say what had been the circulation of gold; and he was certain that the amount coined did not constitute data from which it could be taken. During the American war our troops had been maintained in that country by guineas sent from hence, and 20 years after a large portion of those guineas had returned to this country. The amount of country bank-notes might be diminished, but with returning confidence they would be revived. He approved of the policy, that this country should not interfere in the dispute between Spain and her colonies; but should the trade to them be opened, he hoped active and early measures would be adopted to secure a share of it to Great Britain.

Mr. Finlay did not agree with those who supposed the distress of the country proceeded from a diminished demand for our manufactures. The goods brought to market by the manufacturers were disposed of, but the evil lay in the low state of wages. This, he believed, was an evil experienced over all Europe. An hon. baronet, in a former debate, had represented the situation of this country as worse than any other in Europe; but that he was confident was not the case. In France, in Switzerland, in Austria, Saxony, and every part of Germany, the greatest distress was felt. This state of things, he thought, was occasioned almost solely by the change from war to peace, which sent back to their homes great numbers of men who had been engaged in military pursuits. When the prices of labour became thus reduced, the workman found it necessary to work a greater number of hours to enable him to maintain his family; and this additional work threw a new quantity of labour into the market, and aggravated the distress. An improvement, however, had taken place in all the manufacturing districts; and when that improvement should advance a little farther, the situation of the cotton manufacturers would no longer be a subject of complaint. He objected to the resolutions, but he wished to see some other way of disposing of them resorted to than that of passing to the order of the day.

Mr. Brougham, in reply to an observation which had fallen from a right hon. gent. (Mr. Rose) explained, that he had not stated any thing against the use of machinery; on the contrary, he had observed that the low price of labour had the effect of leading to a competition with machinery.

Lord Castlereagh was happy to think that any impression which could have been made by the tone of gloomy despondency which pervaded the close of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech, must have been long since removed by the facts which had been stated by gentlemen well informed of the real state of the country. To the latter part of the hon. gentleman's speech he certainly did not feel himself called upon to reply, because there was nothing in it really applicable to the question before the House. He could not refrain, however, from observing, that the discussion of a nature similar to the present, which took place last session, had been conducted in a better manner and spirit. On the present occasion it seemed to have been more the aim of the hon. and learned gentleman to wound the Government, than to mend the situation of the country. But with respect to what the hon. and learned gentleman had said of the course of policy which his Majesty's Minister had pursued at the close of the late war, he should only observe, that every point of that great question had, after full deliberation, been approved of by the House. Having obtained the sanction of Parliament, he apprehended that the conduct of Ministers could not now be made the subject of inquiry. He was certainly ready to acknowledge that, as fallible men, they might have committed mistakes; but he was willing to leave to the present generation, and posterity, to judge whether in those great transactions, in the adjustment of which they had to participate, they had not done their best for the interests of their country and of mankind. He, for his part, should never regret that he had been no party in the framing of such treaties as the hon. and learned gentleman thought ought to have been the result of the late peace. Nothing, he thought, could be more criminal than exercising a power over other men, in order to compel them to contribute to our interests. Such a system almost always turned against the country which resorted to it. Where was the country with which there could be any hope of maintaining a treaty imposed upon it contrary to its interests? In what sort of a situation would this country have been placed, had we been obliged after peace to remain armed for the purpose of compelling other nations to submit to treaties which they might think it their interest to break. With regard to the question of distress, he was not disposed to deny its existence to a very considerable extent; but he was well assured that the state of the country was improving. A member from an important district, who spoke last, had acknowledged this improvement; and had farther borne testimony, that the distress did not arise from the smallness of the demand of our manufactures, but from the decreased price of labour. What had passed last session, relative to another branch of public industry, was calculated to afford much consolation in the consideration of the present subject. The House would recollect, that the state of agriculture was then as depressed as that of manufactures is now. In the speech which the member for Essex with great ability addressed to the House, on submitting his resolutions for the advantage of agriculture, he, with all his knowledge of the subject, fell into a manifest error. He regarded the depression of agriculture as permanent. The committee of that House, which took the subject into consideration, on the contrary considered the distress to proceed from temporary causes, capable of removal; and the event proved their opinion to have been well-founded. There was often a strong similarity between the circumstances which tended to depress agriculture and those which operated in the same way on manufactures. An expectation of the introduction of foreign corn, for instance, always produced a rapid decline in the value of agricultural produce. It was much the same with manufactures, when, after a war, a great mass of population was thrown back on the country to seek for civil employments. This could not fail to cause a depression in the price of labour, and, combined with the low price of corn, had the effect of making all descriptions of persons seek to indemnify themselves by a seduced consumption, and other measures of economy. There were some accounts on the table to which he should advert as evidence of the present state of our foreign commerce. They would amply prove that our trade had not suffered in consequence of no commercial treaties having been concluded. Of such treaties it ought always to be remembered, that the Powers of the continent retained the greatest jealousy, and could not now be persuaded to adopt a system which would throw their commerce into one channel for a given series of years. To so great a height was that jealousy carried, that though this country should not have common justice in a commercial convention, it would be thought on the continent that the bargain was entirely to our advantage. The House would, however, see from the accounts he should read, that our trade did not need the assistance of such treaties. The exports of our manufactures for the year 1816, according to the statement of their official value, which the House knew was the fittest for a comparison of this kind, amounted to 36,700,000*l.* and this was the highest value they had ever reached, except in the preceding year, when the amount was 44,000,000*l.* In the year 1814, they amounted to 36,000,000*l.* Upon every fair principle of reasoning, it might be concluded, that the unnatural amount of the exports of 1815 had contributed to the present distress. It was well known, that much speculation had previously taken place, and that very great efforts were made to meet the expected demand of peace. Very considerable exports had been made to America; where, in consequence of a distress similar to that which prevailed in Europe, the power of purchasing had diminished, and our manufactures, after lying for a time in warehouses, were re-exported to this country. This produced a glut in the home market, and a consequent depression of prices. He would shew by the state of our exports that there had not been much falling off. Last year we exported cotton goods to a higher amount than we ever did on any former year, except the preceding. In 1816, the exports of cotton were to the value of 16,300,000*l.*; in 1815, 21,000,000*l.*; in 1814, 16,000,000*l.* Our woollen and linen manufactures were exported in a similar proportion compared with preceding years. In no part of our export trade was there any indication of a great decline. Looking at our intercourse with the continent we should be sensible that it was now greater than at any former period; and from this there was every hope that a revival of our commerce would ensue. Our home consumption of manufactures had certainly been exceedingly diminished in consequence of the great falling off in Government demand; this would be seen by a comparison of the demand of the ordnance, of the navy, and the commissariat, for manufactured articles and produce during the last and preceding years. He had not the Ordnance accounts before him, but it would be seen, what difference existed between the war and peace demand of the navy board and the commissariat from the following statement:—In the year 1812, the navy purchases were to the amount of 2,300,000*l.*; in 1813, 2,800,000*l.*; in 1814, 1,400,000*l.*; in 1815, 505,000*l.*; in 1816, 317,000*l.* The commissariat demand in 1814 was 280,000*l.*; in 1815, 553,000*l.*; and in 1816, 195,000*l.* The withdrawing of this great demand from the home market was the cause of the diminished consumption of manufactures, and of a portion of the distress of the manufacturing interest. The improvement of the exchange, too, which might be advantageous to the country, operated against the merchant who exported our commodities, and tended to diminish his trade. When the exchange was high, the merchant could afford to export articles, and sell them in a foreign country for a small rise, or even for a less price than he bought them, and still be a gainer by the profit on the exchange in making his returns. Now how much must the exchange discourage exports, when, instead of being 25 or 30 per cent. against us, it was 8 per cent. the other way. Even with this disadvantage, our manufactures would, however, find their way to the continent. Notwithstanding the obstructions formerly thrown in the way of a free intercourse with the continent, our manufactures and produce were exported for the supply of our neighbours: and it could not be supposed that greater facilities of intercourse would diminish this tendency. When there was every reason to hope for a beneficial change in the circumstances of the trading and manufacturing interest, he could not help expressing his disapprobation of any thing that tended to inspire gloom and distrust. Nothing could be more cruel than to add to the pressure of distress foreboding predictions of its continuance, and to take away from suffering the prospect of amelioration. There might soon be a demand for the labour and industry of the country, as great nearly as formerly. Wages would in consequence rise; but he did not think they would rise so high as formerly, nor did he believe that such a rise would be desirable. The excessively high rate of wages during some of the flourishing periods of our manufacturing industry, he was convinced neither contributed to the morals, the health, or the happiness of the people. They were apt to engender habits of extravagance, to produce irregularity, and to operate against temperance and economy. If the present calamity did nothing else but correct the disposition thus fostered and strengthened, it would effect an ultimate benefit. He came now to the question, whether the resolutions ought to be supported; and here he concurred cordially with his right hon. friend who had moved the amendment. The hon. and learned gentleman seemed desirous, from the way in which he introduced the subject, and the nature of the resolutions with which he concluded his speech, to leave his Majesty's Ministers no other alternative than to move the orders of the day. The political hostility of the hon. and learned gentleman was so mixed up with his commercial propositions, that he could not expect from Ministers their concurrence in his resolutions. His object seemed to be to attack Ministers, and thus to leave him no other course but to concur in the motion of his right hon. friend for passing to the orders of the day, with whatever reluctance he did it, and however willing he would have been to have entered into the discussion of the commercial question had it not been studiously mixed up with politics.

Lord Cochrane rose amid loud cries of question; and made a few observations on the impossibility of raising the wages of labour, without imposing such a high price on our manufactures as to disable us from entering into competition with foreigners. The great cause of our present distresses and commercial difficulties was taxation. If our taxes were reduced, the people would not only be relieved from their burdens, but we should be enabled to undersell other nations. It had been said that all classes of the community had suffered, and he allowed this proposition to its full extent. The only class that did not suffer was that which lived upon the taxes, and which prospered in the exact ratio of the pressure of public distress. The measure pursued for our relief must have no relation to the issuing of more paper, or a change in the circulation. He did not think, however, that there could be a return to cash payments if the present system of taxes were continued: such a return to cash payments would ruin the agricultural interest, and produce no effect except that of enriching the fundholder. [Here the cries of question became so loud, that the noble lord could be heard no longer.]

Mr. Alderman Atkins could neither support the resolutions or the amendment. He did not concur in the resolutions; but though they did not meet entirely his views, he could not agree to put off the consideration of so important a subject by passing to the orders of the day. He expected that the hon. and learned gentleman would have brought forward propositions in which he could have concurred. He expected that he would have moved for a committee of inquiry, and not have embodied gloom and despondency with a set of resolutions that could have no practical result. At the same time he thought that the amendment was highly objectionable. The right hon. gentleman who moved it, allowed that there were conflicting interests in the way of an improved system of commerce; these conflicting interests should be inquired into, and adjusted. This could only be done by a committee.

Mr. Brougham replied. He had detained the House too long already to think himself entitled to much farther indulgence at this late hour of the night, and therefore would only trespass for a very few minutes on their patience. He would not have risen to have made any remarks on what had passed, had he not been desirous of briefly answering two hon. gentlemen opposite (Mr. Finlay and Alderman Atkins), who seemed to have mistaken his object, and a noble lord (Castlereagh), who replied to some of his statements. The two hon. gentlemen objected to his resolutions, and said, that if he had moved for a committee, they would have supported it. They had entirely mistaken what was the usual course or the meaning of his resolutions. The second resolution distinctly pledged the House to inquiry. It required a revision of our commercial system. How was this inquiry to take place, but in a committee? He did not mean that the House should bring in a bill for altering this or that regulation of trade without inquiry; and how was this inquiry to take place except in a committee? There was nothing more regular and usual than such a course. There was a standing committee of trade and commerce, to which the resolutions would be referred if they were carried; or if this was not thought proper, a special committee might be appointed. With respect to what had fallen from the noble lord, he felt that little reply was necessary. He would not follow the noble lord into all the topics of his speech, short as it was. His few arguments could easily be answered. The noble lord, in shewing the state of our exports, and comparing those of last year with the exports of preceding years, had only stated an argument which he (Mr. B.) anticipated. The prices were taken from the official returns. Although greater last year than on any former year, except 1815, they did not, as the noble lord intended they should, shew a flourishing state of our commerce. He was prepared to prove, that these prices were never realized; that they were invoice prices; that 50 per cent. of those prices was not paid. He would put the question to the hon. gentlemen acquainted with the state of our commerce—Were not the foreign markets glutted with our goods? Could any returns be obtained? And had not the exchange, in consequence of this state of things, risen in an extraordinary manner? His hon. friend, the member for Glasgow (if he would allow him to call him so), had truly stated that our exports were great, that great quantities of goods were sent out of the country by the manufacturers; but these goods were not sold: or, if sold, they brought no price that would repay their expenses. The hon. member knew that he was obliged to export his cotton webs at no profit, and sell them at a price that would not enable him to support his labourers. The noble lord had accounted for the present embarrassments of the trading and manufacturing interests from the diminution of Government demand, in consequence of the peace. The commissariat, and the navy, had formerly consisted to a great amount; and this demand had now been annihilated: but how could this happen? Was not the money in the country, and was it not to be employed in promoting our national commerce? Did the noble lord mean to say, we could not use the money in our pockets except we allowed the longer arm of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be put in along with our own hands to take it out. (Hear, and a laugh.) Could we not, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer allowed us to keep our money, purchase and consume the goods which the Government purchased and consumed? (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. B.) did not remember any other argument the noble lord had used. He had indeed alluded to other parts of his (Mr. B's.) speech, but he must have misunderstood it. The noble lord proceeded on the supposition that he (Mr. B.) had urged the necessity or propriety of interfering in foreign politics for commercial purposes; of planting governments for the interests of our trade; and of doing what was in itself wrong or unjust for the sake of securing commercial advantages to which we were not entitled. (Hear.) He (Mr. B.) had never advanced such propositions. The tenour of his speech was diametrically opposite. He had said, do what is right in itself, pursue measures dictated by justice and a regard to the rights of mankind, and you will at the same time forward your commercial interest, and support your national character. (Hear, hear.) His (Mr. B's.) policy was opposite to that of the noble lord. He deprecated the making of England a party to the support of fraud and superstition; an accomplice in national plunder and spoliation; and the ally of despotism and oppression wherever they were to be found, as had been done by the noble lord (cries of hear): not only because such conduct was against our character but our interest; not only because it made us suffer in reputation, but made us incur losses in money. (Hear, hear.) The people who had shared in the success of our injustice laughed at the distresses to which we had exposed ourselves in promoting their views, without shewing us any gratitude by commercial regulations in our favour: while those who suffered and were degraded execrated us for our disastrous exertions. (Hear.) The noble lord supposed that he advocated commercial treaties: he did no such thing generally; but he thought that we ought to have used our just influence to promote amicable intercourse, and mutual commercial advantage. Instead of doing this, instead of concluding a commercial treaty with France, for instance, for supporting the Government of that country, we had pursued a system hostile to the feelings of that people, and laid the foundation of a lasting commercial jealousy, and an inveterate political animosity. With respect to South America, he was not for going to war to obtain commercial advantages in that country, but he wished our relations with the states on that continent to be placed on some intelligible footing. At present we could not understand how we stood, and there could, of course, be no mutual confidence. We had a consul at one port, and not at another; one governor was hostile, and another friendly; and the whole line of our policy seemed to be inconsistent and uncertain. In wishing, therefore, that there should be some method introduced some explanation made, he was merely following the high authority of the noble lord, who, while he sat on the Opposition benches, in an able speech reprobated the conduct of the then Ministers for leaving our American relations undefined; and called upon them either to do one thing or another: that call he (Mr. B.) now made on the noble lord. The amendment proposed by the right hon. gentleman excited his astonishment and regret. To tell the people suffering under such distress, that they could have no inquiry into its cause, nor any hopes of redress, was alarming; especially when the right hon. gentleman had confessed, that Ministers were not capable of the duties of their office (hear); that they could not settle conflicting interests; that they were not strong enough for adjusting opposing claims. The wood trade, the iron trade, and every different branch of our commerce, were opposing each other; and Ministers could not controul their demands, or place them under regulations for the public welfare. When a Government by its own avowal has been reduced to such a state of deplorable weakness that it cannot perform its functions—when it had not only been reduced to a number of clerks in office, but could not answer the woodmen and ironmen that came to oppose one another in the trade office (hear, hear)—it was high time for Parliament to step in and rescue the country from their hands, and inquire into the best means of redressing the grievances which it suffered from the Administration. He had, on a former night, given offence to a right hon. gentleman (the master of the Mint) by mentioning the opinions of an eminent master of the Mint of a former reign. He might now be excused for going a little farther back, and quoting the advice given by a great statesman, who, as he was a cabinet minister, and a lord chancellor, might expect a more favourable hearing. The great Lord Chancellor Bacon, in speaking of a state of things which might suggest the present times, had said, "that the best means of checking disturbance was to seek into the cause of the distress, which had arisen out of excessive taxation, diminution of trade, strangers in the land, customs and privileges, disbanded soldiers, and whatever tended to knit the discontented together." But he gave a warning against putting down discontent by turning the humours back upon the people, and causing a bleeding inward. (Hear.) He prayed Ministers not to turn back the humours upon the people, and increase the irritation that might be fatal. (Cries of hear.)

The House then divided:—

For the resolutions 69

Against them 118

—55

The House adjourned at one o'clock.

A LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Anson, Sir George	Lyttleton, Hon. W. H.
Atherley, Arthur	Mackintosh, Sir J.
Aubrey, Sir John	Madocks, W. A.
Babington, Tho.	Maitland, Hon. A.
Butterworth, Joseph	Martin, Henry
Bennet, Hon. H. G.	Martin, John
Baillie, James E.	Molyneux, H. H.
Baring, Sir Thomas	Monck, Sir Charles
Baring, Alexander	Morpeth, Viscount
Barnett, James	Moore, Peter
Brand, Hon. Thos.	Newport, Sir John
Brougham, Henry	North, Dudley
Calcraft, John	Ord, William
Calvert, Charles	Osborne, Lord F.
Carter, John	Ossulston, Lord
Cavendish, Lord G.	Ponsonby, Rt. Hon. G.
Cochrane, Lord	Prittie, Hon. F. A.
Duncannon, Viscount	Ridley, Sir M. W.
Ebrington, Viscount	Romilly, Sir Samuel
Fazakerley, J. N.	Rowley, Sir W.
Fergusson, Sir R. C.	Russell, R. G.
Fitzroy, Lord John	Sebright, Sir John
Folkstone, Viscount	Sefton, Earl of
Grenfell, Pascoe	Smith, John
Gosse, Sir W.	Smith, Samuel
Hammerley, H.	Smith, Wm.
Hill, Lord Arthur	Smyth, J. H.
Hughes, W. L.	Stanley, Lord
Hornby, Ed.	Teed, John
Lamb, Hon. W.	Vernon, Gran.
Langton, W. G.	Waldegrave, Hon. W.
Lemon, Sir W.	Wilkins, Walter

Tellers—Macdonald James—Sharp, Richard

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 14.

The Treason Bill, and Army and Navy Seduction Bill, were returned from the Commons with the amendments agreed to.

IRISH DISTILLERIES.] Earl Darnley presented a Petition from Belfast in Ireland, stating the distressed state of parts of that county, the scarcity of grain, and praying the stoppage of the distilleries. He should, perhaps, call the attention of the House to the subject, and specially with reference to the responsibility of Ministers for not having stopped the distilleries before this time. If he should submit any motion, it would probably be to call for the information upon which the Ministers had acted.

The Earl of Liverpool would be ready, when the subject came regularly before them, to explain the reasons which had actuated the conduct of Ministers; but he must now beg leave distinctly to deny the responsibility which the noble earl seemed to imagine attached to the Government, in relation to this subject. The corn trade ought to be free, if possible: that could not well be in the present circumstances of the country; and if it could not be entirely free, it ought to be regulated by wise laws. Nothing could be more pernicious than the policy of calling upon Ministers to examine into the particulars of every harvest, and to act according to their discretion with regard to the distilleries, or to any other branch of business immediately connected with the corn trade. About three years ago, on a bill brought in by a noble lord (not now in the House,) these principles were stated, and in these he perfectly concurred. The legislature had enacted, that when the price of corn rose to a certain pitch, importation was to be permitted. Let the legislature, if it thought proper, adopt some such regulation with reference to the distilleries: but the interference of Ministers on a principle of discretion would most infallibly do more harm than good. Were they, at the close of every harvest, to occupy themselves in calling for communications, and listening to accounts from various quarters, stating, that in the north the crop had been defective; in the east good; and in the south and west indifferent; and then to act according to their own discretion, upon their responsibility? That could never be a good system. At the same time he did not say that a case might not arise in which it would be the duty of Ministers to interfere; but the propriety or necessity of such interference ought first to be very clear. So much as to the principle. If the subject were to be brought forward, he should be ready to state the reasons why Ministers had not interfered on this occasion.

After a few words from Earl Darnley, the petition was laid on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, March 14.

Lord W. Russell presented the report of the Wotton-Basset election committee. The return of the sitting member was confirmed.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply,

Sir C. Warrender proposed, that the sum of 1,140,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty for the ordinary service of the Navy, for six lunar months, from the 1st of January, 1817.

Sir M. Ridley had some objections to granting money on account, as sometimes larger sums might be voted away, without examination, than was intended. He would not, however, oppose the present resolution. The estimates were to be referred to the Finance Committee. He would wait to see what that committee would do with regard to the offices in the Board of Admiralty, to which he had formerly called the attention of the House. If the committee did not abolish them, he would then oppose the supplies on this head. He had risen at present to say a few words about the hardships suffered by those who had been acting pursers of the navy, some of whom had requested him to represent their case to Parliament. They had memorialized Government in 1816, without obtaining any redress. Their case constituted one of great hardship; and deserve the consideration of those connected with the naval administration.

Admiral Hope mentioned, that it was an old established custom in the navy to have only as many pursers as ships. In consequence of the reduction of our naval establishments, more than 400 ships were broken up. This, therefore, created a great number of supernumerary warrant officers of this class. The Government had taken their case into consideration, and allowed half-pay instead of a shilling a day, which was formerly given: but all could not be put on half-pay who had formerly been acting pursers. The persons to whom the hon. baronet alluded, were generally clerks who had been appointed pursers, for performing the duty on certain occasions. It did not follow that their temporary rank or emoluments should be confirmed to them after the specific service was accomplished, any more than that of other officers who held temporary appointments. He could assure the hon. baronet that the case of these persons had been under the serious consideration of the Admiralty, and that if nothing had been done for them it was from no want of inclination in that board.

Sir C. Pole bore testimony to the liberal disposition of the Admiralty, which he heard praised by all who had transactions with it. There were some parts of the estimates which would admit of reduction. He complained of the unequal distribution of pensions to the two services of the army and navy. The pensions to officers' widows in the navy had not been raised since 1794, although last year regulations allowing an increase of pension to the army had been made. Mrs. Harvey, the widow of Captain Harvey, had only 100*l.*, although her husband had died in 1794. In the army the case was otherwise. Last year, officers who had suffered loss of limbs or wounds at York-town, under General Cornwallis, had received the increased allowance. These regulations should be adopted in the navy. Salaries and retired allowances were very unequally distributed, some retiring in affluence, and others scarcely with subsistence. There were other parts of the naval estimates too much curtailed, and by that means, useful works interrupted, or slowly carried forward. He alluded to the small sum proposed for carrying on that great national work, the breakwater at Plymouth. Many unemployed hands might now be got to this work at very low wages, and to carry it forward with vigour would be both politic and economical.

Mr. Croker rose to answer a few of the observations of the hon. bart. The hon. bart. wished to see the offices reduced to the scale of 1792. He (Mr. C.) had no objections to this scale, and would argue the estimates down when they should be laid before the House.

The hon. bart. had said, that the paymaster o. widows' pensions was a new office. This was a mistake: the office was a century old; although this officer being formerly paid from the sale of old stores, his salary did not come annually under the view of Parliament, and therefore might not be noticed by those unacquainted with his mode of payment. The hon. bart. had complained of the unequal distribution of pensions created by the different regulations in the army and naval service. At the proper time he (Mr. C.) would be prepared to shew that the two services were on the same footing. With respect to the breakwater at Plymouth, he could only say that the Admiralty were as anxious to complete that work as those who had the highest ideas of its importance. It could hardly be suspected that the same Board with which the plan originated, which had hitherto encouraged the execution, and had always held out the vast benefit that would result from its completion, would now needlessly obstruct its progress or impair its efficacy.

Mr. Lyttelton wished to make a remark two on the liberality to the navy, as that had been eulogized. He could not concur in those praises, when he saw that officers of the navy on half-pay had to take an oath that they held no office. This was not the case with officers of the army. (Yes, from the Treasury benches.) Then he would say, that it was a regulation which should continue in neither service.

The resolution, that 1,140,000*l.* be voted for the ordinary service of the navy for six months, was then agreed to.

Sir G. Warrender rose to propose a resolution for a grant for the extraordinary service of the navy. He concurred with the hon. bart. (Sir C. Pole) on the importance of the breakwater at Plymouth, and the desirableness of bringing that great work to as speedy a termination as possible. The Admiralty encouraged and carried it forward with as much vigour and expedition as was consistent with a due regard to other undertakings and heads of service, which could not be neglected. When we were reducing our establishments and expenditure in every branch, it alone was not to be exempted from a proportionate reduction. The works at Sheerness were not supported on their former scale, any more than those at Plymouth. The most urgent head of expense was that connected with the repairs of ships, which could not be delayed without great loss. The proportional reduction of the sums expended on the breakwater was not greater than that in other branches. The hon. baronet concluded by proposing a resolution, that 780,715*l.* be granted to his Majesty for the extraordinary service of the navy.

Sir C. Pole repeated his former opinion about the breakwater at Plymouth, and professed himself unsatisfied with the explanations and arguments that had been stated on the subject. Eighty thousand pounds should have been proposed for that work.

Admiral Hope suggested, that more work would be done for 40,000*l.* this year, than on any former year since the commencement of this undertaking.

Sir C. Pole explained. He had heard that applications had been made for a more vigorous execution of the work.

Sir J. Newport thought no saving should be made by interrupting so great a national undertaking as the breakwater, and thus suspending the benefits which its completion was calculated to afford: only 20 or 30,000*l.* would be saved, and for this small saving the execution of a work which was to be of such consequence to our navy was to be neglected. It had been already of great service in a late storm. If only one vessel could be saved by it, we had a motive for hastening its completion.

Sir G. Warrender explained.

The resolution was then put, and carried.

A resolution then passed for 142,500*l.* for the transport service.

GAME LAWS.] The House went into a Committee on the game preservation bill.

Sir E. Knatchbull, in the Committee, proposed a clause to make the bill applicable to Scotland.

Sir C. Monck never heard that there was any difficulty in executing the act of last session. The present bill did not include any clause repealing former acts, which the act of last session had repealed. It was not well drawn up.

Sir E. Knatchbull stated, that it was not his intention to press the final passing of the measure at this period.

The blanks of the bill were then filled up in the committee, and the report ordered to be received that day fortnight.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.] The Solicitor-General having moved the third reading of this bill,

Sir M. W. Ridley observed, that when the House was called upon to vest extraordinary powers in the hands of his Majesty's Ministers, strong and satisfactory reasons should be adduced for such a proceeding. It was to be expected, that the facts on which they relied should be fully set forth in the preamble of the bill, and that no doubt should exist as to their correctness and authenticity. The circumstances recited, however, on this occasion were untrue, and were a libel on the character of the people. He defied the hon. and learned gent. to prove the truth of these allegations. The preamble declared, that divers assemblies, under pretext of petitioning for a Reform of Parliament, had been converted to purposes of sedition, and had produced acts of violence and disorder. He now asked, in what instance, and in what part of the country, this had been the case. When he looked to the numerous meetings held for the purpose of petitioning, in every part of the kingdom, he saw that the utmost regularity uniformly prevailed, and every hon. member who, on either side of the House, had presented these petitions to Parliament, had borne testimony to the orderly and peaceable demeanour, as well as to the unanimity, of the petitioners. He thought it too much, therefore, on account of one or two instances of riot, to pass this sweeping declaration of general disloyalty and disaffection. He did not mean to assert that there was no disaffection in the country; some instances of it had appeared; but he felt convinced that it proceeded from no other cause than the feeling of severe distress. He had heard, however, of only one case, with respect to which they had all heard a great deal, in which, under pretence of assembling to exercise the right of petition, the conduct of the meeting was disgraced by tumult and outrage—he alluded to the meeting in Spafelds. Even in that case, he rejoiced to observe, that the enforcement of the existing laws had proved sufficient to put down the evil. The present Lord Mayor of London and an hon. Alderman had, as it were, by their own personal exertions, stopped the career of riot, and dispersed the authors of the tumult. In so doing they had merited the praise and gratitude of their fellow-citizens, and had practically demonstrated the efficacy of the present laws when duly executed. The melancholy occurrence which took place only two days ago, and with reference to which it was natural to apprehend mischief from the temper of the populace, was an additional proof of that spirit of obedience to the law which he believed to prevail in the public mind. The punishment which was then inflicted would indeed, in his opinion, have been calculated to produce a more salutary effect if it had been sooner carried into effect. Delays of this kind were not only prejudicial to the ends of justice, but injurious to the feelings of humanity, inspiring, as they naturally must, unfounded hopes in the minds both of the prisoner and of his friends. Calling, however, as the spectacle then exhibited must have been to the feelings of the crowd assembled, nothing escaped them beyond the expression of those emotions which it was of a nature to excite. If he referred to the disturbances in the country, he saw no reason for imputing them to meetings professed to be called for the purpose of petitioning. Those which had taken place recently in Somersetshire, originated in distress, and had no other object than to obtain, however irregularly, some relief. When tumult and insurrection had broken out, the laws had afforded an adequate remedy, and rendered it utterly unnecessary to strengthen the hands of Government at the expense of the Constitution. He had heard of the mayor of Liverpool refusing to call a public meeting, notwithstanding a requisition most respectably signed, from an apprehension that disorder might take place: but if the rights of the subject could be already sacrificed to the unfounded opinions or irrational fears of a magistrate, what might not be expected to take place, when he should be armed with these new and extraordinary powers? (Hear, hear, hear.) In the hands of some it might be found a very convenient instrument for the gratification of private feeling, and the accomplishment of private purposes. It appeared to him, that the doors of the House could not be too widely opened to the reception of petitions; and that, at a time of so much suffering, it was particularly unadvisable to throw any additional impediments in the way. Many of the clauses in this bill he thought highly objectionable; but he considered all attempts to modify or alter them hopeless, when he found that his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Brougham), after the full and incontrovertible statement which he had made on the preceding night, had not been able to carry his first resolution. He referred especially to the clause which applied to every meeting at which any matter respecting the Government should be propounded; a clause which appeared to him to be almost tantamount to the depriving people of the use of their faculties and tongues. He observed, too, that the bill was partly permanent and partly temporary: to him it seemed that it would have been better to have divided it into two distinct measures. To the clause respecting the Spenceans he had no objection; but he would take this opportunity of observing, that there was about 20 years ago a club, called the Philosophical Society at Newcastle, of which Mr. Spence was a member, and he there read his pamphlet previous to its publication. Little notice was then taken of it; but on its publication Mr. Spence was expelled from the society, and was subsequently induced to retire altogether from the town. He was desirous of stating these circumstances in consequence of some remarks in an anonymous work (the Quarterly Review), and in justice to a society now existing in the same town, and under the same name, but entirely distinct from that of which Mr. Spence had been a member. It was also proper to state, that their librarian had been dismissed from his situation, in consequence of having published a seditious parody. To return to the bill now before the House, he felt it his duty to oppose its passing into a law, containing, as it did, so many unjustifiable provisions, and so wholly uncalled for by the existing circumstances of the country. He had heard of the rise in the price of the funds being ascribed in another place, to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and he presumed that the improvement was expected to be promoted by the enactment of the present bill: but, even though this should be the fact, he should be sorry for it to take place at the expense of the liberties of the country. On these different grounds he should propose as an amendment, to leave out the word "now," and insert after the words "be read a third time" the words "this day six months."

Sir J. C. Hippisley declared his conviction that the disturbances in Somersetshire had arisen in a great measure from the dissemination of mischievous and wicked principles. The great body of the labourers, however, in that part of the kingdom, he believed to be sound; and that there was not, upon the whole, a more loyal county in England.

Mr. W. Smith contended, that the remedy provided by this bill went far beyond the necessity of the case. The reports of the two Houses he considered as the pillars upon which it rested, and as that of the Committee of the other House had been laid on their table, he might be allowed to refer to it. He observed, that it accused those persons who supported the principle of universal suffrage of a design to subvert the British Constitution. It appeared to him, that this was to charge these persons with a very heinous crime, and that it ought not, therefore, to have been advanced on slight grounds. He believed it to be an accusation, the truth of which it was impossible for the Committee to prove. Several different towns and cities were named, as places in which this design was supposed to be entertained; and amongst others, Norwich, the city which he had the honour to represent, was included. He felt it to be his duty to his constituents, and to the country at large, to repel assertions which were so well calculated to create alarm and confusion, coming as they did from such high authority. It was evident that pains had been taken to connect the two offences of blasphemy and sedition, and to represent them as disguised under the cause and principles of Reform. Upon this subject, therefore, he had a very singular letter in his possession, which he had received from a respectable individual at Norwich, and which might, perhaps, explain the reason of that town having engaged the attention of the Committee. Here the hon. member read the letter, which stated that a hand-bill had been sent to Lord Sidmouth from Norwich, containing a blasphemous parody on the Nicene creed. This parody had been, in point of fact, published 25 years ago, and issued from a jacobinical society, of which the person who sent a copy of it to Lord Sidmouth had been a member. (Hear, hear.) It had been recently republished by a starving printer, who was an old and well-known adherent of the Court party, (hear, hear.) and was hawked about by people in his employment, for the purpose of putting a little money in his pocket. This was the production which had been submitted to Government as a fair specimen of the political and religious state of the people of Norwich. He had stood several contested elections for that city, in which he had had the good fortune to be successful, and had succeeded upon what was called the opposition interest. Having examined the different poll-books since 1802, he had found the name of this printer regularly among the votes for the ministerial or court candidate. He would not give his name to the Attorney-General; but if he should be selected for prosecution, would be perfectly willing to declare, in mitigation of punishment, that he had always voted against him. He did not think it dishonourable for any man to change his early sentiments, when the change arose out of mature reflection, and appeared not be connected with any interested motives; but if there was one thing more disgusting and offensive than another, it was the heat and malignancy of a renegado. (Hear, hear.)

The hon. member then proceeded to read the following passage from the poem called "Wat Tyler:"

"My brethren,—these are truths, and weighty ones:
 "Ye are all equal; nature made you so.
 "Equality is your birth-right. When I gaze
 "On the proud palace, and behold one man,
 "In the blood purpled robes of royalty,
 "Feasting at ease, and lording over millions:
 "Then turn me to the hut of poverty,
 "And see the wretched labourer, worn with toil,
 "Divide his scanty morsel with his infants;
 "I sicken, and, indignant at the sight,
 "Blush for the patience of humanity."

No doubt the author of these lines was very sincere in the sentiments he had thus expressed: but when the House heard the following passages, which occur in the 11th article of the 31st number of the Quarterly Review, who could believe that they were written by the same hand? "When the man of free opinions commences professor of moral and political philosophy for the benefit of the public,—the fables of old credulity are then verified—his very breath becomes venomous, and every page which he sends abroad carries with it poison to the unsuspecting reader. We have shewn, on a former occasion, how men of this description are acting upon the public, and have explained in what manner a large part of the people have been prepared for the virus with which they inoculate them. The dangers arising from such a state of things are now fully apparent, and the designs of the incendiaries, which have for some years been proclaimed so plainly, that they ought, long ere this, to have been prevented, are now manifested by overt acts." He (Mr. Smith) could read many other passages from these works equally strong on both sides; but, if they were written by the same person, he should like to know, from the hon. gent. opposite, why no proceedings had been instituted against the author? The poem "Wat Tyler" appeared to him to be the most seditious book that was ever written: its author did not stop short of general anarchy: he vilified kings, priests, and nobles, and was for universal suffrage and perfect equality. The Spencean plan could not be compared with it: that miserable and ridiculous performance did not attempt to employ any arguments; but the author of "Wat Tyler" constantly appealed to the passions, and in a style which, at that time, he supposed to be eloquence. Why, then, had not those, who thought it necessary to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act taken notice of this poem? Why had not they discovered the author of that seditious publication, and visited him with the penalties of the law? (Hear, hear.) The work was not published secretly, it was not handed about in the darkness of night, but openly and publicly sold in the face of day. It was at this time to be purchased at almost every bookseller's shop in London: it was now exposed for sale in a bookseller's shop in Pall-mall, who pretended to be a bookseller to one or two of the Royal Family. (Hear, hear.) He borrowed the copy, from which he had just read the extract, from an hon. friend of his, who bought it in the usual way; and, therefore, he supposed there could be no difficulty in finding out the party that wrote it. (Hear.) He had heard, that when a man of the name of Winterbottom was confined in Newgate, the manuscript had been sent to him, with liberty to print it for his own advantage, if he thought proper; but that man, it appeared, did not like to risk the publication; and, therefore, it was now first issued into the world. (Hear.) It must remain with the Government, and their legal advisers, to take what steps they deem most advisable to repress this seditious work, and punish its author: in bringing it under the notice of the House, he had merely spoken in defence of his constituents, who had been most grossly calumniated; and he thought that what he had said would go very far to exculpate them. (Hear.) But he wished to take this bull by the horns. (A laugh.) Much had been said on the existence of a Hampden Club in London; but what were the names of some of the persons who belonged to the Hampden Society? One of them was Major Cartwright; another was a very respectable man, an officer in his Majesty's Government, a very near neighbour of his in the country; another, who was also his neighbour, was descended from one of the oldest families in England, and possessed about 10,000*l.* a year landed property. (Hear.) This club, so constituted, was known to many of his Norwich constituents, who sent up two or three delegates to attend a meeting in London; but he had no hesitation in saying, that when those persons came up to the club, and did not find those gentlemen whom they knew and expected, they turned upon their heels and went home. This was the only ground upon which his constituents at Norwich had been mentioned in the Report; and he would now ask the House, whether they had not been most unjustly dealt with? (Hear.) The penalties of this bill were wholly disproportionate to the offences its authors wished to prevent. He had the authority of his hon. and learned friend who sat near him (Mr. Ponsonby) for saying, that all he saw in the Committee did not warrant the measure before the House; and, therefore, he should vote for his hon. friend's motion, for postponing the further consideration of the Bill. (Hear.)

Mr. C. W. Wynn was surprised that the hon. gent. had thought fit to amuse the House with a criticism on two anonymous works. Whether the article in the Quarterly Review, and the poem, were the productions of the same author, he did not know; but what had they to do with the question, or with the hon. gentleman's constituents at Norwich? He had heard, that the poem was written when the author was very young; and should he be bound all his life to hold the same opinions? If his arguments were wrong, they might be met by arguments on the other side; and the controversy would be carried on with better advantage out of doors, than by personal reflections in a place where the author could make no answer.

Mr. W. Smith said, he did not wish any man to be blamed for a change of opinions: what he complained of was, that a man, after he had changed his opinions, should use the most violent and scurrilous language against those who now entertained the same opinions. (Hear, hear.)

Lord W. Russell could not refrain from expressing his astonishment, that his hon. friend below him (Mr. Wynn) should say, that the arguments of his hon. friend (Mr. W. Smith) did not bear upon the question. That hon. friend had very properly argued from the state of the country, and from the grounds which the promoters of the bill had advanced. As for himself, he was not ready to surrender to any man, not even to the dearest friend he ever had, the liberties of the people of England. (Hear, hear.) The Report had been framed upon ex-parte evidence; it was unsupported by any documents whatever; it by no means justified the introduction of this bill; and could not fail to excite the greatest dissatisfaction in all classes of the people. He was not a young member of Parliament; he had sat in that House many years; and he felt great pleasure in declaring, that he had never before seen so desperate a remedy applied to the wretchedness and distress of the country. (Hear, hear.) Where would the friends of this measure—where would those who promoted the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, wish to drive us? Despotic power was now to prevail, and the rights of the people, for whom alone all government existed, were extinguished. (Hear, hear.) "Sir, we are now in such a condition, that we cannot part with any more liberty. Let us look to the circumstances under which, at any former time, the Habeas Corpus Act, and that glorious privilege of Englishmen, the trial by jury, have been suspended: and then let us ask, whether the adoption of similar measures are warranted by the present state of England?" (Hear, hear.) The noble lord then proceeded to review the circumstances of the country in 1689, 1715, 1745, and 1793, and asked, whether any man in his senses, could compare them to the existing state of things? The Lord Advocate had stated, on a former night, that a seditious oath had been taken by several persons at Glasgow. Why, then, had not Parliament been called together sooner? Why did Ministers wait till they could work up a sort of plot? He had heard it stated, that the police officers would sometimes neglect to do their duty, under the expectation of being able to increase their fees: and Ministers, no doubt, had been influenced by a feeling, that, in attempting to call the House together, they should be able to shelter themselves from the imputation which their measures had produced. (Hear, hear.) but their criminal negligence and arro-rance (hear, hear) ought not to pass unnoticed; and, least of all, should the representatives of the people consent to surrender the liberties of the country. (Hear.)

Mr. Finlay said, that the meetings in different parts of the country had produced great mischief; and might, if suffered to be assembled as before, be extremely dangerous to the peace of the community. It was better, he thought, that a part of our liberties should be surrendered for a time, in order that we might guard the whole; and he would rather trust his Majesty's Ministers with this suspension, than those who were endeavouring to set the country in a flame. (Hear, from the Opposition.) He certainly did not agree with the Lord Advocate, that there were any respectable persons concerned in the proceedings at Glasgow; they were the lowest possible characters; and, therefore, what the learned lord had stated, could not have been from good authority. As to a magistrate refusing to call a public meeting, it was a wise and proper part of his duty to do so, when he received information that a meeting would be attended with danger. In this bill, however, there was nothing to prevent meetings from being holden, provided certain regulations, which would operate as a security, were obeyed. He thought the measure wise and necessary, and should therefore give it his support.

Sir Samuel Romilly expected to have heard some gentleman on the other side state the grounds upon which they meant to support the bill; but he found they were content to have it passed in a House much thinner than any in which a measure of such importance ought to be discussed. He should not, however, be deterred by this circumstance, from stating his opinions. He considered the meetings of the people, as one of the most important parts of our Constitution. It was owing to these meetings that Englishmen possessed the high character they had acquired above all other people in the world. It was owing to this privilege that they entertained so warm an affection to the Government and Constitution of the country: and it was impossible to restrain the power of the expression of public opinion, without diminishing that attachment to the Constitution, and taking away that affection to the Government, which was one of the noblest characteristics of the people. These public meetings had often produced the greatest benefits to the country. What, he would ask, had prevented Ministers from renewing the property tax? If it had not been for the public expression without the doors of that House, that most oppressive and vexatious tax would have been superadded to the present great and almost intolerable burdens.—(Hear.) And what had obliged the King of France to discontinue the abominable African slave trade? It was the popular expression out of doors, which extended the laws of humanity to the farthest quarters of the globe. The House recall this glorious circumstance to their recollection; let them remember, that it was not the representatives of the people, but the people themselves, out of doors, who compelled the French Government to give up that odious traffic. (Hear.) The House was not then acting upon the confidence they reposed in the secret committee, whose report was said to be founded on secret evidence. The question before them was, what had been the evil of public meetings, what the danger of private societies; of oaths that had been administered, of writings that had been circulated? Now, in order to form an opinion on this question, they had all the same means of judging as the secret committee. Were not all the proceedings of these meetings published in all the journals, and circulated through the country? Had not every member, therefore, an opportunity of ascertaining what had passed at those meetings, and what resolutions the people had adopted? And what was the danger? Meetings had been held in every part of the country; but no where was there any disturbance, except, in one solitary instance, in the metropolis. It was true, that a disposition to tumult would always exist among the poorer classes whenever they were pressed with any great distress. Their situation was then so bad, that it could not be worse; and they were ignorant enough to think, that by tumult they might render it better. A disposition to tumult also often existed in the heats that were occasioned by misled religious enthusiasm. But though the present distress exceeded all bounds—though in many instances it had driven the sufferers to the commission of felonies, and other breaches of the laws, yet at none of the meetings that had been called had any tumult arisen. Whether this peaceable demeanour was a consequence of the general diffusion of knowledge, or of any other cause, he would not decide; but the fact was, that there had been no tumult at any of the meetings called on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, or other subjects. In the first assembly at Spafields, there had been some acts of violence, such as were often committed in a great metropolis: but it was very doubtful if they were connected with the object of that meeting. At the second meeting, it appeared, that there were persons desirous of exciting tumult, and who had absolutely reckoned on the possibility of disorder: but so falsely had they reasoned—so ill had they calculated, that though the greatest excitements were held out—though flags were displayed and leaders offered, they could only inveigle a few miserable wretches to follow them: and in vain attempted a general insurrection. He did not mean to say that meetings on those occasions were harmless, or that no restraint ought to be laid upon such assemblies; in fact, he thought, that obscure persons should not be permitted to call meetings for the purpose of taking the chance of whatever might result from them. He agreed with the bill in this respect, that seven householders at least should be requisite to call a meeting; he might have thought, that even a greater number might have been named; and if farther it had been ordered, that these meetings should not be adjourned from time to time, to the terror of the peaceably disposed persons, he should have had no objection. But what did this bill effect in the main? Instead of calming, it seemed as if calculated to provoke and inflame the people. It provided, that if seven householders should call a meeting by notice, and inadvertently let it appear that they called it for the purpose of effecting a change in the Government, the magistrates were not to prevent such meeting; they were to suffer the people to come together, and then, after an hour had elapsed, the justice of peace, who before-hand had seen that it was an illegal meeting, was to disperse the assembly, and that with the terrible power of inflicting death, if the dissolution did not take place instantaneously. The second provision enacted, That any one magistrate should attend, and as soon as he heard any thing likely to excite hatred or discontent towards his Majesty's Government, (a learned sergeant had said, as soon as he believed there was an intention of that nature,) he might proceed to take into custody the individual that attracted his notice; and if that person, perhaps some inflamed and misguided individual, made any resistance, (not individual resistance, said Lord Castlereagh) individual resistance according to the words of the act; and if the people did not instantaneously disperse, they were to incur the fearful penalty of death. Now this, he maintained, was a deliberate cruelty, to permit a meeting of this nature, and after the parties were heated past the power of reflection, to consign to the punishment inflicted on the most atrocious and deliberate offences, individuals who were perhaps called together, and met in the vain but anxious hope of procuring by a petition, immediate relief from Parliament for all their distresses: "little thinking, perhaps, (said the learned gentleman) that we should pass on to the order of the day." The noble lord had said that this bill contained no more than what was the law already—that a justice of peace, if he heard any thing seditious uttered, might take the party offending into custody. If this was the law, he could only say, that a similar bill passed when some of the most distinguished men who ever sat in that House were present, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, and lawyers of the highest eminence; and so extensive was the innovation then deemed, that it called forth the most anxious discussion; and was considered one of the most important measures that had ever passed through the House; and was very far from being regarded with the apathy which seemed to attend it at present. The bill itself was most curiously framed; there was one clause which pointed out what the duty of magistrates should be on these occasions, and never had there appeared such a master-piece of legislation! "Every justice of peace is hereby authorized to do all that which he is authorized to do," all that which by law he was otherwise unable to do; so that the unfortunate magistrate who looked to this act for his instructions, would find them rather indefinite—"that he had power to do what he had power to do." It might be said, that a former act contained the same words; but if mischief ensued from this want of precision, it could be no justification that the same expression existed in an act passed 21 years ago. But it was because this act pointed out too clearly what magistrates were encouraged to do, that he might altogether refuse it his support; for although persons assembled together above the number of 12, had been under former acts liable to severe punishment if they failed to disperse on a momentary summons, yet he could not esteem that any foundation on which the present measure could rest with propriety. It had been said on a former occasion, that this act was copied from the riot act, and the riot act had been held up as an established and constitutional law; it was possible that act might have produced good effects, though this was exceedingly doubtful; but the present act did not in any way proceed on the riot act, for that was directed against those who had been already criminal—who, after an actual breach of the peace, were still riotously assembled. That was an offence for which they might have been legally indicted before the act passed: he desired not to be understood as making an attack on the riot act. The Solicitor-General had stated, that that act had been found exceedingly useful, inasmuch as no person had ever been executed under it. Indeed, it might be considered to have had excellent effects, if it had ever prevented riots; but since that act, and as if in defiance of it, we had seen the most dangerous riots that ever had existed since the time of Charles I., and in which the act had been altogether insufficient. In the year 1788, the riot act was not even read—not from any apathy on the part of the magistrates, but because the riots were so formidable that it had been vain to attempt the reading, and even the terror of the act was absolutely null. Indeed, for the most part, people never knew whether the act was read or not, the reader being inaudible in the tumult, whenever the reading was rendered necessary; so that any established signal which could speak to the eyes would be in all cases more effectual.—Again, the riots at Birmingham, in 1793, lasted a fortnight or three weeks, in defiance of the riot act, and with unrestrained control. The reason, therefore, given by the Solicitor-General, to shew that the act had been useful, namely, that no person had been executed under it, was altogether fallacious; for he meant to infer thence, that the act had succeeded in preventing or dispersing meetings in time, and to the occurrence of violence, and the consequent necessity of punishment, which had notoriously not been the case. But, at all events, that act was no authority for inflicting so severe and cruel a punishment on parties engaged in popular assemblies as was now proposed. Besides, the penalties inflicted by the riot act were worse than nugatory; for we knew, that unless juries were constituted very differently from what they were at present, and ferocious prosecutors arose such as never had existed, the punishments menaced would never be carried into execution. As far as the Spenceans were concerned, the bill was all in vain. The poorer orders of the people had, if possible, the greatest interest in the security and inequality of property. However they might partially and for a time be blinded to the knowledge of this incontrovertible truth, by ignorant and presumptuous enthusiasts, the certainty of it must, in the long run, be brought home to their conviction. But they could only be taught this by reason; and the more extensively they came to be educated, the more they would gain a chance of weighing the productions of enlightened men, against the unmeaning nonsense with which it was sometimes attempted to mislead their understanding; but if they did not arrive at the perception of this great truth by reason, they could be no more taught it by force, than a fortified town could be taken by syllogisms. He would say with the noble lord (Russell) whose ancestors had acquired immortal glory by the exertions and fortitude they had displayed in defending the Constitution of the country, that we had parted with enough of our liberties already; and there never was a time when those liberties were more valuable or more necessary. After the lives we had spent, the treasure we had exhausted, and the protracted sufferings we had endured—after we had attained all the objects for which it now appeared this glorious war had been commenced, we had relinquished personal security, in giving up our Habeas Corpus Act, and boasted trial by jury—we found our manufacturers starving, and our revenue unequal to our expenditure—we had forfeited our ancient character for hospitality in a peace alien bill, which subjected every foreigner who might visit the country, from motives of traffic or curiosity, to the caprice of a few individuals—and lastly, we were called on to stop the meetings of the people, and deprive them even of the consolation of complaint.

Mr. B. Bathurst, after enlarging on the circulation of blasphemous and revolutionary pamphlets, and on the danger which the country incurred from their probable effects, proceeded to answer some observations that had been thrown out by an hon. member, touching certain societies at Norwich. He considered the avowed objects of those societies (Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments) as extremely dangerous; but he had never imputed to them doctrines which they did not hold; nor had he or the committee involved them in the culpability of the blasphemous productions that had been forwarded to Ministers from Norwich. He then contended, that the Report was justified in all its expressions, and that the members of the committee had not in any way been imposed on. It appeared to him, that gentlemen on the other side could not have read the Report. (Loud cries of hear from the Opposition.) He did not understand what the applause bestowed on him meant; but still thought, that at least the Report could not have been duly weighed on the other side. With respect to the bill, all meetings called by regularly constituted authorities, were left as free as ever, provided no tumult arose. As to the clause respecting the dangers from societies intending the total subversion of establishments, and the division of property, he must refer to the Report of the Committee. Gentlemen who came from parts of the country where such societies existed, might not know of the secret proceedings and objects, and therefore might think the Report false. He protested against that sort of counter argument. The mass of the people were sound, but there might be a sufficiently numerous class to be worked upon by designing men, and driven, through public distress, to most dangerous agitations. The measure was for the people's protection. The feelings of the respectable people at large were changed, in the sense of security of property, since Parliament had taken the case into their own hands. The principle of the measure was to deter offenders, when crimes involved multitudes in their consequences. Arguments from the riots of 1780 were not applicable. Many meetings lately had proceeded to no outrages; but that was, for the present, a part of the system; but they were to look to what was done by the assemblies in London. Why did the people at Manchester look for intelligence about the attacks on the Tower and the Bank? This gave a character to these meetings, and was a confirmation of the system. The power given to magistrates to resort to the meetings was the power of being present at them. They should, therefore, have power to fix on the individuals exciting disturbances; and they should have a law to back them, if the meeting remained too long, and was tumultuous. They had a full hour to consider that question. Suppose the Spenceans advertised a meeting for their dangerous objects, it was necessary magistrates should know it, and have power to stop it, even if commenced. The bill was not intended to incommode scientific societies; but it was right to know what was to be lectured upon, and not to open out the whole field of history and politics. Therefore, a licence had been rendered necessary. Universities, corporations, and chartered bodies, were all preserved in their rights; but the bill operated against societies practising certain oaths, and practising certain arts and means for forcible attendance, for the subversion of all property, which went to produce confusion, plunder and bloodshed. Something was called for, applicable to such dangers, from societies so pernicious, branching out into all the villages, and operating on those who were either intentionally or unintentionally led to do wrong. To prevent this, the bill was brought in; and to protect others, who would be thankful to Parliament for it.

Sir Samuel Romilly explained, that he did not say the Report was unimportant, but that he alluded to this bill for preventing seditious meetings; on which the committee could have no evidence that was not before the world. As to the Spa-fields meeting, it appeared that, though attended by large numbers, the conspirators did not compose it; but that a conspiracy was formed, looking for daring leaders to avail themselves of that meeting; who were disappointed.

Mr. B. Bathurst explained.

Mr. Ponsonby said, that the declaration of Mr. Finlay, that the men implicated in the disturbances at Glasgow were none of them above the lowest order, gave him much satisfaction, as he had understood the Lord Advocate to intimate that persons above that class were concerned. He denied the opinion of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. B. Bathurst) that the committee had called for this measure. It was expressly and unanimously agreed in the committee to recommend no measure, but to leave it to the Executive Government. Parliament had agreed to three laws, one of which, he thought, ought never to take place but in a case of imminent hazard to the State. As to the nature of the conspiracy, he could not speak freely; for it was impossible, with any regard to public justice, to do so; but he conceived it to exist only among the lowest orders, worked upon through their great distress by some persons, and not participated in by the people at large. Such a conspiracy he believed no government could know of, particularly one so strong as the English Government, without possessing the means of immediately overthrowing it. It was not like one in which persons of power, education, and property were concerned; this was confined to the indigent and lowest. He believed it was desirable at the present moment to put some restraints on these public meetings, of which the greatest mischief arose from the abuse made of them. The chief argument was, that a few men could create the mischief; and it appeared right that those who called these public meetings should be known and responsible, and that the magistrates should be acquainted therewith; nor could he perceive any harm to the subject in preventing the adjournment of such meetings from time to time, and from place to place: nor did he say that magistrates should not have power to enforce the law: but he objected to the discretion given by the bill to one single magistrate. It was too much. It had been proposed to insert "two" for one magistrate, but this was refused. One magistrate's discretion could not be sufficient. It was highly objectionable to give to one magistrate the power of dispersing or of seizing on individuals, and thereby of construing what was the bringing into contempt and hatred the Government and Constitution, and of afterwards acting on his own judgment. Reflect on the powers this would give to one magistrate. Suppose the subject of the meeting to be for Parliamentary Reform, or for dismissing the Ministers of the day, the magistrate of some borough in which he was peculiarly interested, and who was generally friendly to the existing administration, would have a power which he could direct to his own views, by which he could enforce the penal parts of the act. He admitted, that there could be no toleration for societies which administered unlawful or secret oaths: for what need had they to do so if they were proceeding fairly and honestly? To what related to that, he did not object. But indeed this bill should have been divided into two parts, or two bills, in each of which the sense of Parliament could have been distinctly taken; which would have been more advisable both for Parliament and for the country. These were his sentiments. Part of the bill he approved: and part of it he disapproved, particularly the power given to one single magistrate to enforce the penal parts of the law.

Mr. Sergeant Best observed, that the only apparent mode of preventing these mischiefs was to empower some person to do so. As to one magistrate having that power, it might be better that two should be requisite: but meetings might often be held in many places in the country where there would be the greatest difficulty in getting more than one on the immediate occasion. Therefore this provision appeared to be necessary. This power was conferred under peculiar circumstances, to repress or prevent measures tending to subvert the Government and Constitution. He contended that the clauses were not of the absurd nature represented by his hon. friend (Sir S. Romilly): the bill was not to give magistrates powers they before possessed: the difference between the law as it stood, and the law as it was now proposed to be, was, that it gave the magistrate power to attend at meetings where he suspected that seditious language would be employed. He held this to be a most important distinction, as it went to the very root of the recent disturbances; which could not have occurred, had any magistrates possessed the powers now about to be communicated.

Mr. Calcraft observed, that the assertion of the hon. gentleman who spoke last, that in corporate towns it might be very difficult to procure the attendance of two magistrates to prevent sedition, was very unfortunate, since it was precisely in such places, abounding in individuals in the commission of the peace, that their presence could be secured with the greatest facility. He could not consent to communicate these additional powers under any circumstances, but least of all would he leave it to the discretion of a single individual. Did the House forget, that the removal of a pauper or the

of a pot-house could not be effected without the signature of two magistrates? and would it consent that the most important right of the people of England should be placed at the mercy of only one? (Hear, hear.) He maintained, that the patience of the people under their severe deprivations deserved the highest eulogium, instead of being rewarded by a measure most odious in itself, and most repugnant to the spirit of the Constitution. What case had been made out to warrant such a proceeding? The meetings throughout the country had been more frequent and more numerous attended than at any former period, and the topics discussed were of the most irritating nature: but only in one or two instances had the slightest disturbances prevailed; and all gentlemen who had spoken had borne testimony to the tranquillity of their own vicinity: it was only when they indulged in conjectures as to situations of which they could know nothing but by report, that their fears seemed alarmed at the picture their own imagination had drawn. The meeting in Spafields, it was true, had ended in a riot; but its insignificance was proved by the facility with which it was suppressed. Ope flag had been hoisted, one waggon had been hired, and one man had summoned the Tower to surrender. Nay, it was even a disputed point whether the Tower had ever been summoned at all. He appealed to the good sense of the House, whether these proceedings warranted, not only the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, which Ministers had obtained, but the revival of the gagging bill? Surely the first was amply sufficient to meet the danger so much dreaded by Ministers, without the additional aggravation of the miseries of the people, to be told that they were not at liberty to complain. To some of the minor provisions of the bill before the House he did not object; but as Ministers refused to make any separation of the clauses, he should vote against the whole measure.

Mr. P. Moore protested against the bill on the part of the whole nation. He had lived long enough to see three green bags opened with the same pomp as that recently exhibited; and they had all ended in an abridgment of the liberties of the subject. He was proceeding to refer to the loyal conduct of the inhabitants of Coventry in the reign of Charles I., and to remark upon the ridiculous nature of the pretended conspiracy disclosed in the Report of the Committee, which he said was a libel upon the nation, when he was interrupted by the impatience of the House.

Mr. Canning.—Although the clearest exposition of the nature and purpose of the measure had been afforded on its introduction, and although every argument and objection had been refuted and removed as they had been started in the course of debate, he could not allow the question to be put without first explaining the grounds upon which he rested his determination to give it his support. He did not vote in its favour, because it abridged or restrained that invaluable right of the people to petition, upon which one hon. and learned gentleman had pronounced so warm and so laboured a panegyric; on the contrary, it received his heart-felt concurrence, because it afforded the most important protection to that right; and for its legitimate purposes, preserved it from abuse and pollution. That hon. and learned gentleman (Sir S. Romilly) was not to be told that as, by some mysterious operation of Providence, evil was often productive of good: so, on the other hand, from the greatest good sometimes proceeded the most fearful and permanent evil. He had commenced by calling the attention of the House to the success with which the petitions against the property-tax were attended, in the last year, against the pre-existing disposition of Parliament: that, indeed, might fairly be adduced as an instance of the true and just employment of the subjects' right to influence the deliberations of their representatives, and in contradiction to the scandalous calumnies now afloat. It established, beyond question, the existence of a powerful sympathy between the members of that House and the great body of the people. (Hear, hear.) Yet, how had this reference touched the bill now in progress? Could he or any man shew that the process of legitimate remonstrance by the people was not as easy, after this measure should have received the sanction of the House as before it? Pass this bill, and let another subject arise on which the country could properly be required to express its sentiments, and it would be found that the people had not lost one particle of their influence; nor had the constitutional mode of exerting it been in the slightest degree infringed. Instances of possible abuse of this power might be stated, but it would be found much more difficult to prove them; for was it to be believed for a moment, that a magistrate, in the eyes of his neighbourhood and in the face of his country, watched by the most jealous observers, would dare to forsake his duty for the sake of serving a political party? The assertion, that this measure was adopted in order to deprive the nation of the little liberty left to it, had been repeated and refuted so often that the imputation became disgusting from its staleness: he (Mr. Canning) gave it his support on behalf of the people of England—to interpose a barrier between them and their deluders—to erect a temporary guard between them and their bitterest enemies—to check the progress of infection, and by drawing a line of demarkation, to stop the ravages of this most malignant pestilence. (Hear, hear.) Those who had hitherto employed themselves in disseminating poison would now find their purposes defeated, and the people of England, sound at heart, and with all the seeds of virtue and greatness within them, when the disguise was removed, would discover and abhor those, who, taking advantage of temporary difficulties and warm feelings, had used every artifice to stir them up to tumult and rebellion. (Hear, hear.) He admitted, that the instances were few in which these deluders had succeeded; but he was not disposed to allow, that the evil consequences had been so slight, as to render farther precautions unnecessary. The hon. gentleman who spoke last differed from all his friends upon the subject of the Report of the Secret Committee: he was now for rejecting that altogether as a foul libel, which, on all previous occasions, had been deemed a fit basis for Parliamentary proceedings; while the hon. gentleman who preceded him thought that the House had already done so much, that it was unnecessary to do more. He had seemed to think that some advantage had been taken of the House, as it if had been led on step by step in ignorance of what was to succeed: but the House would not fail to recollect that due notice had been given; that all the four measures were proposed at once; and that, in the explanation of their nature and tendency, each was treated with its relations to, and bearings upon, the others. Thus the House had been treated with the utmost fairness; and as undoubtedly the Report did not recommend any particular measures, the choice of them was left to the judgment and responsibility of the Executive Government. Two out of the four bills proposed in consequence had received the general concurrence of both sides of the House, and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus had been carried by a large majority. Here, however, the noble lord (Lord W. Russell) was disposed to stop; contending, that having parted with so much liberty, no farther encroachments ought to be allowed; but the reply of the member for Glasgow was most satisfactory—that he placed a portion of his privileges in the hands of Ministers for a time, for the sake of preserving the whole for ever. Hon. gentlemen on the other side seemed to think that Ministers were anxious to take upon themselves this new burden of responsibility. Good God! was it possible for a moment to imagine that they asked it as a boon? Would any man covet such an arduous trust that could in any way avoid it? (Hear.) In the situations they held, their duties were already sufficiently onerous; and all they rested this and other measures upon was, the conviction that extraordinary evils could not be overcome but by extraordinary powers. It was true, that the suspension bill had been passed; but, unless the noble lord and his friends could prove that it was adequate to all the difficulties of the times, the argument against the bill now upon the table was good for nothing. It certainly enabled Government to check the growth of treason, perhaps to destroy it in its embryo; but did it contain any provisions against the abuse of public meetings, where sedition might be disseminated with impunity? Who, besides the noble lord and the hon. member who spoke last but one, had denied the existence of abuses in public meetings? The hon. and learned gent. (Sir S. Romilly), and the right hon. gent. (Mr. Ponsonby), had fairly and candidly admitted, that they required restraint; whatever odium, therefore, could be thrown upon those who contended that the abuses of public meetings loudly called for regulation, let it be remembered, that in that odium were included the hon. and learned gent., and his right hon. leader. He did not mean to say that they would have applied the remedies now proposed; but in sentiment they avowed their entire concurrence with his Majesty's Ministers, and had even stated it more strongly than any gentleman who usually voted with Government. The rest was mere matter of detail, comparatively of little importance. With two or three exceptions, therefore, all agreed that popular assemblies required additional control; and he hoped that it would go forth to the country, that this opinion had been stated and supported chiefly by those who, on other occasions, were the open antagonists of Ministers, and the declared friends of the liberty of the subject. (Hear, hear, hear.) Why did public meetings require extraordinary control at the present moment?—because the individuals who attended them went with a previous determination to resist all the measures of the Executive?—because they went with a disposition to be led on to acts of outrage? No: but because, under the peculiar circumstances of the country, while the people were suffering under distresses, there was an unusual degree of inflammability in the public mind—because some designing individuals who did not feel any portion of the pressure of the times, who acted not from intemperate or mistaken zeal, but from the native virus in their malignant constitutions, took advantage of a state of things favourable to their purposes—because there were incendiaries abroad, who would avail themselves of the extraordinary inflammability of the public mind to light the fires of rebellion in every corner of the kingdom. This was the true reason why restraints ought to be put upon popular assemblies; and so far both sides of the House travelled together in harmony. To what a narrow point, therefore, was the question reduced—the mere regulations that ought to be adopted. All equally regretted the distresses of the country, and all equally reprobated the delusive and fantastic chimeras by which the people were misled by the artifices of their enemies. It was one of the curses of the times, that all that had been done of late years to enlighten the understandings, and to inform the minds, of the lower orders of the community had been worse than fruitless: it had been converted into a means of instilling and spreading the most baneful poisons. How much the press had contributed to this effect, the House was well able to judge: the acquirements which recently the higher orders had been anxious to share with their brethren in a lower sphere had been grievously misapplied, and education, the greatest of all blessings in a State (because its safety depended upon the morals of its inhabitants, and those morals upon instruction), had been of late converted into one of the blackest curses that could afflict mankind. He knew of no crime of deeper dye than thus taking advantage of the dawn of moral and intellectual improvement for the most flagitious purposes; and it could be likened to nothing more aptly than to some of the stratagems of illegitimate and barbarous warfare, where, instead of employing the fair and acknowledged weapons of hostility, the savage enemy poisoned the very well-springs of life. (Loud cheers.) But in the opinion of the hon. and learned gentleman, the meeting of the 2d of December called for no such measures as had been adopted. That hon. and learned gentleman was not easily satisfied on the score of insurrection. To him it was not sufficient that the Tower had been summoned, it ought to have been taken; the metropolis should not have been merely agitated, but in flames. He was so difficult with regard to proof, that he would continue to doubt until all the certainty of mischief brought him to a conclusion. For his part, however, he was content to see the torch lighted, and did not wish to wait to see the mansion-house in flames. But was it to the metropolis only that the mischief was confined? Certainly not. If any thing in the Report laid before the House was more distinctly proved than another, it was the connexion and correspondence between the agitators in the metropolis and the country. This was demonstrated by that expectation which crouded the highways leading from certain towns to the metropolis, at the time the intelligence of the memorable 2d of December was expected to arrive: that there were ramifications no one who read the Report could doubt, unless distinguished by the most determined incredulity and hardened distrust. He did not oppose the right of petitioning, but he opposed what was not a legitimate use of that right. It was against the insidious course which was pursued, that it was necessary to guard against petitions, which said one thing and meant another, which came in the voice of Jacob from the hand of Esau. In all free countries it was indispensable that there should exist the power of resorting to some such measure as that of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and laws similar to that now proposed. It was thus that in Rome the dictatorship was sometimes added to the consulship. There must be granted to every State a means of conservation. It was in this sense only that he and his colleagues had asked for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. It was in that sense only the House of Commons had granted, or ought to grant, such a power.

Mr. Brougham rose to avail himself of the opportunity the forms of the House would afford him of expressing his decided disapprobation of the bill under consideration; and he should have contented himself with merely protesting against that measure, had not some observations which had fallen from the last speaker rendered it necessary for him to say a few words, with the view of setting the House right as to some of the arguments used by the right hon. gent. He had said, that all who had spoken in opposition to the bill, with three exceptions, concurred in the necessity of some regulations for public meetings. All, however, that he and his hon. friends had admitted was, that the provision for seven householders signing a requisition for any meeting might be very properly enacted, in order to prevent persons not resident in the place from convening meetings for mischievous purposes. Such was the restriction, if such the right hon. gent. wished to call it, to which he was disposed to agree; but had that precautionary measure any thing in common with a regulation which gave the power of preventing a meeting to one magistrate, though as it had been well observed by his hon. friend (the member for Rochester), the authority of two magistrates was necessary even to pass a pauper? a regulation which enabled a magistrate to disperse a meeting at his pleasure, and arrest the persons who spoke. An hon. and learned friend of his had, it is true, asserted that magistrates already possessed the power of arresting, given by this bill: but that assertion, he must say, was founded on a mere quibble. They certainly possessed no such power by law. He could understand the power of the magistrate to arrest for a breach of the King's peace: or even, though on that point there were great doubts, for seditious words tending to an immediate breach of the peace; but these were cases totally distinct from the power which the present bill, by implication, gave of arresting upon words being spoken, tending, in his opinion, to bring the Constitution and the Government into disrepute. With all possible regard and veneration for the character of that respectable body, the justices of peace of the country, he could not, without regret and apprehension, see them invested with the power of torturing to interpretations which views of interest or subserviency might dictate, words spoken in the exercise of the right of petitioning, which the right hon. gentleman admitted to be a most sacred right. While this bill existed, it would depend on the pleasure of the justices whether any meeting should take place; and he well knew how the minds of even honest men might be influenced by a wish to please certain quarters, or to put down by force opinions which they themselves might disapprove. But the right hon. gentleman had that night spoken of the measures to which he and his colleagues had resorted, as alarming them, from the trouble and responsibility they had to encounter. He was glad to hear that such was the feeling of his Majesty's Ministers on the subject; and had only to hope, that their present alarm would not prove as groundless as one they had raised for the purpose of originating these severe measures. He must own, he was not one of those who expected many arrests would take place under these bills; and to explain the ground of that opinion, he must take leave to state what he thought were the two purposes for which Ministers had given themselves all the trouble and anxiety under which the right hon. gentleman said they laboured. In the first place, it was their wish to increase under the sanction of Parliament, that general and active alarm which it was so much the interest of Ministers to propagate, because it diverted the attention of Parliament and the country from those measures of economy which had been so loudly called for by the public voice: they had now no longer to fear a defeat on a question of taxation, or that a victory would be gained on the part of Reform. In the next place, they had gained a complete triumph over the press, and public discussion out of doors. They had obtained their wish in placing every man who now attempted to give his opinions to the public, in such a situation that he must consider himself as witting with a halter about his neck. He must recollect every time he sat down to write, that if he proceeded on that day beyond a certain line, he could not be sure that he would be allowed to exercise his pen on the following day. Thus they have been relieved, not from any conspiracy against the State, but from all fear of any serious opposition to their measures. With regard to the opinions which the right hon. gentleman had pointed out as disapproved by himself (Mr. Brougham), and his right hon. friend, he should only observe, that if the Constitution was attacked in the persons of those who held those opinions, he must defend it. When he considered the great talents possessed by some of those persons, and the considerable portion of the people who participated in their opinions, as was seen by the numerous petitions which had been presented, he could not help regretting, that it was not thought fit to meet them fairly by argument, but by the loose and vague powers given by this bill. Had the measure for putting them down been one of force, the proceeding would at least have been plain and candid: but an indefinite line, which neither the Attorney-General nor the Cabinet could describe, was to be drawn around them. This was not a wholesome exercise of the law. It was unnecessary for the right hon. gentleman to resort to Rome, in order to shew that the British Constitution ought to possess the power of protecting itself. If it could be made out that the Constitution was in danger, he would willingly say, with his worthy friend, the member for Glasgow, that he would willingly give up a part for the preservation of the whole. But what had taken place with regard to former reports ought to render the House cautious as to the evidence on which the present alarm was founded. It might be recollected, that the report of 1812 was like that lately laid before the House,—occupied with statements of conspiracies and affiliations: statements, too, which were founded on less questionable authority. There were, however, many things asserted in that report which subsequent information proved to have been erroneous; and on looking back to which, it was difficult now to comprehend how they could have been credited. It was stated, that in the extensive heaths which divide Lancashire and Yorkshire, men were trained to arms by torch-light, and that posts were established at certain distances, which kept up regular communications with each other. It was said, that men had been seen exercising in a field. When in that part of the country, he heard of information having been given on this subject to a magistrate; and, from the nature of it, he believed it came from the same source as that on which the assertions in the report were founded. A person, who had been riding during night, declared that he heard a sudden clank of metal resembling the sound made in drawing a number of sabres; and that, on turning round, he saw a whole regiment of cavalry performing evolutions. The magistrate to whom this information was communicated, being a man of sense, who was not easily frightened out of his understanding, it occurred to him that a regiment of dragoons had been exercising in the field where the informant said he had seen them, and that they must have left behind them some traces of their manœuvres. He accordingly sent persons to inspect, who, to their surprise, found that the grass in the field was standing erect, and ready to be mowed, precisely in the state in which it had been seen on the preceding day. (A laugh.) But what the Report stated respecting Mr. Horsfall's murder deserved the particular attention of the House. That murder took place about a month before the Report appeared, in which the whole population were charged as tainted with that crime. The Report states that the population flocked round him, when he was wounded, and insulted him; but he having had the honour to be employed as counsel in the case, he could assure the House that there was not one word of truth in what the Report contained on this subject. If any one doubted what he stated, he would refer them to the account of the trial, which had been published under the authority of his Majesty's Government. They would there find, that instead of insulting Mr. Horsfall, the populace, on the contrary, endeavoured to render him every service in their power. They assisted in putting him into a cart, conveyed him to a public-house, and sent for a surgeon to dress his wounds. Now, this was surely sufficient to warrant his doubting the accuracy of the present Report. He would impute no intention to deceive to any persons, but surely the consequence of receiving ex-parte evidence must be to open a wide door to deception. It created a temptation to busy, meddling persons, to come forward with their tales; who, either because they were alarmed themselves, or wished to alarm others, had always some strange and dreadful story to tell. An honourable and learned friend of his, not now in his place, had lately read to the House an oath, said to have been taken in Scotland. It was stated, that this oath had been kept out of the Report, lest the parties concerned should be put on their guard, and escape; but what was his surprise on finding that every hint the parties could have obtained by the insertion of the oath was conveyed by the terms of the Report itself. The exhibition of the oath was therefore made at a time when the bringing of it forward was likely to have an effect on the decision of the House. In the Report of 1812, there was also an oath, which Mr. Perceval read to the House with something of the stage effect which had been given to the Glasgow oath; but he did not propose the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, nor any such measure as that before the House: all that he proposed was, to make the taking such oaths felony, and so the law still remains. To keep up the present alarm as much as possible the agents of Ministers at Edinburgh had made an application to the Court of Session, to remove the persons who had been arrested under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus acts to the Castle of Edinburgh. This was done with the view of producing an impression, as the Castle is the place of confinement for traitors. The Court, however, refused to place men apprehended on suspicion in that situation; and disdaining to have any thing to do with alarm, rejected the application. When he saw all these schemes resorted to for the purpose of taking away men's reason by alarm, he could not help withholding his assent to any measures connected with an object so unjustifiable. The right hon. gentleman had talked of the mischief arising from public instruction. (Cries of no, no.) He was glad to hear that he had misunderstood him, for he should regret much that any such opinion went abroad with the weight that was due to his authority. That public instruction was our bane might be the opinion of some, but he held it to be the antidote for most of the evils in our political situation. He was of opinion, with his right hon. friend, that the universal improvement which had taken place in education was the general cause of that patience and order which, in the midst of great distress, had been manifested by the people at all public meetings. On the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in 1795 we were at war with France, and it was stated that clubs here communicated with others in that country, and that the people had resolved not to apply to Parliament for redress, but to rely upon their own efforts only. On the contrary, at the present moment we are at peace with France; and the only idea of the people, amidst all their difficulties and distresses, is to look to Parliament for relief. Instead, however, of listening to their prayers, instead of giving them relief, they revived bills to gag them.

Mr. Canning explained. He never stated any opinion unfavourable to the general diffusion of instruction.

Mr. Brougham was happy to hear a disavowal of such an opinion from the right honourable gentleman.

Lord Cochrane rose amid coughing and universal cries of question. He was sorry to see so much impatience to come to a decision on so important a subject. The passing of this bill was the last stab given to the Constitution. If this bill passed into a law, it would make every magistrate in the country a petty tyrant. He had received a letter from Glasgow, giving an account of two of the persons who were taken up there for high treason. One of them was a student of divinity, very different from the parsons to whose conduct he alluded on a former evening: (a laugh) for no less than 80 of his fellow students signed a declaration expressive of their high sense of his character and good principles. His name was Mac Tair. He stated, that he was taken up on the 22d of February: that he was apprehended by an officer upon a warrant that had not the insertion of his christian name, that he was carried before the sheriff, and that, though nothing was substantiated against him, he was sent to prison, where he was put in a dreary cell, with a bed in it so damp that he could not with safety rest upon it. He was thus treated at the very time that he had just recovered from indisposition occasioned by an affection of the lungs—that the weather was tomy, and he felt its severity. He complained that, from malice, or some other cause, his food was supplied very irregularly and unseasonably; that his breakfast, though brought early in the morning, was not delivered to him till one or two o'clock in the afternoon, and his dinner was supplied in the same negligent manner. In short, he suffered the utmost degree of harshness and severity, without any thing to justify suspicion or to prove guilt. The other person, whose case was described, was of the name of Weir. He was put in a cell covered with water, without any thing to rest upon. Nothing was found against him; and after suffering for some days he was likewise discharged. (Hear.) Ought not responsibility to light somewhere? Ministers were so weak that they were obliged to throw it off themselves; but should not the House take care that the aggrieved should obtain redress, if not from them, at least from the instruments of their tyranny? The House ought to form a resolution against the passing of any bill to grant indemnity to persons who had abused their power, or to shut out those who had suffered from obtaining their legal remedy. These tyrannical acts would not be abrogated if they passed. They would be like the Bank restriction act, endless in their duration. He would prefer undisguised despotism to the condition of this country, deprived of the bulwark of its free-dora, and exposed to the petty vexations of magistrates; and would think Algiers a good exchange for England. (Cries of question.)

Mr. Finlay was glad he could contradict the information of the noble lord; or at least assure the House, that it was a gross exaggeration. (Hear.) The person first alluded to had been well treated; he had been first put into one room of the gaol on the debtors' side, and then removed to another; but in both of them there was good accommodation. (Hear.) He could appeal to some members of the House acquainted with the Glasgow gaol, and one honourable member opposite who had been in it, whether it was not clean, healthy, and well-arranged. (Hear.) He (Mr. F.) could not speak to the case of the other person; but he was convinced, from the humanity of the magistrates, and his knowledge of the prison, that the statement of the noble lord was either totally unfounded, or grossly exaggerated. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bennet, as he had been alluded to by the honourable member, was ready to bear his testimony to the good state of the gaol; but if the bird was damp and wet, the prisoner might suffer nevertheless. The account given by the noble lord accorded with one that he (Mr. B.) had received; the character given of this person ought to have exempted him from such treatment, or even suspicion.

The House then divided, when the numbers were,

For the third reading 179

Against it 44

Majority 135

Sir J. Newport opposed a clause introduced by the Attorney-General, which enacted, that the provisions of the bill should not extend to Ireland. The hon. baronet said, that in Ireland there were societies called Orange Societies, which were in hostility to three-fourths of their fellow countrymen, and were bound together by secret oaths, and oaths of qualified allegiance; he therefore wished that the provisions of the bill respecting Illegal Societies should extend to Ireland.

Lord Castlereagh said, it had been already distinctly declared, that Ireland was in such a tranquil state as not to require any such unusual restraint; and also that it was quite unnecessary to extend to Ireland any enactment respecting the safety of the King's person. As to Orange Societies, he very much regretted their existence, and felt persuaded, that what was said on a former occasion, would prevent their further extension. On that occasion, it was not thought necessary for Parliament to interfere, and any interference now would only provoke resentment.

The question that it should not extend to Ireland was then put and carried.

Sir M. Ridley moved an amendment to the preamble of the bill, which was as follows:—

VOL. I.

"Whereas assemblies of diverse persons collected for the purpose of exercising their undoubted right of offering petitions, complaints, remonstrances, declarations, or other addresses to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, or to both Houses, or to either House of Parliament, have of late taken place; and whereas they may be apprehended from large meetings of persons suffering under the pressure of distress at the present time."

This amendment was negatived.

Mr. Ponsonby moved, that instead of the words "one or more justice or justices," there should be inserted in the bill "two or more justices."—This motion was negatived.

Mr. Ponsonby then moved, that instead of the words "Constitution and Government," there should be inserted the word "Constitution" only, omitting the words "and Government."—This motion was also negatived.

The bill then passed.

LIST OF THE MINORITY

THAT VOTED AGAINST THE THIRD READING OF THE BILL.

Aubrey, Sir John	Mackintosh, Sir J.
Atherley, Arthur	Martin, Henry
Barnett, James	Martin, John
Bennet, Hon. H. G.	Monck, Sir Charles
Baillie, James F.	Moore, Peter
Bruid, Hon. Thos.	Newport, Sir John
Brougham, Henry	North, Dudley
Calcraft, John	Orl, William
Calvert, Charles	Osborne, Lord F.
Carter, John	Ossulston, Lord
Cochrane, Lord	Pearse, Henry
Curwen, J. C.	Ponsonby, Rt. Hon. G.
Duncannon, Viscount	Pyrie, Hon. F. A.
Fazakerley, Nic.	Romilly, Sir Samuel
Fergusson, Sir R. C.	Rowley, Sir W.
Fitzgerald, Lord W.	Russell, Lord William
Fitzroy, Lord John	Russell, R. G.
Folkstone, Viscount	Sefon, Earl of
Hughes, W. L.	Smith, John
Hornby, Ed.	Smith, William
Jervois, G. P.	Waldegrave, Hon. W.
Johnson, Sir W.	Wilkins, Walter

FRITH—Ridley, Sir M. W.—Sharp, R.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 17.

The royal assent was given, by commission, to the Treason Bill, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Seduction Bill, the King's Bench Proceedings Bill, and several private bills. Commissioners, the Lord Chancellor, Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Redesdale.

BAYLEY'S DIVORCE.] Witnesses were examined relative to the point, whether Mrs. Bayley's pregnancy was visible at the time when Colonel Bayley returned, with reference to the question, whether there was any reason to conclude that there had been a remission or condonation of the offence.

The evidence was ordered to be printed, and the consideration of the subject to be resumed on Monday next.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS.] The Seditious Meetings Bill was brought up from the Commons. On the motion of Lord Sidmouth, it was read a first time, and ordered to be printed and read a second time on Thursday, and the Lords to be summoned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 17.

LOTTERIES.] The Sheriffs of London presented a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Councilmen of London, praying that the House would not sanction, by their votes, the existence of State Lotteries in future.

After a few words from Mr. Lyttleton, expressive of the satisfaction he felt at the presentation of this petition, and of his hopes that it would be followed by similar ones from the other corporate towns of the kingdom, the petition was read, and ordered to lie upon the table; as was also a second, complaining of the evil consequences produced by mock auctions.

The Exchequer Court Bill was read a second time.

ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.] The House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, to which the Ordinance Estimates were ordered to be referred.

Mr. R. Ward said, it was his intention to move a vote on account, as had been done with regard to the Army and Navy Estimates; and that no further supply should be granted at present for the service of the Ordinance Department, than for the six months ending on the 30th June, 1817. He trusted that the accounts were not likely to give rise to much opposition; and he deemed it right to state to the House what had been the extent of the different reductions in this branch of the public expenditure. The charge for the ordinary service was this year 538,000*l.*, which was less than the former estimate by the sum of 135,000*l.* The extraordinaries amounted to 211,000*l.*, leaving a reduction under this head of expense of 104,000*l.* The aggregate charge was 749,000*l.* Credit had been taken for 53,000*l.* from the sale of horses and old stores. Here the hon. gent. entered upon a statement of the reductions in Ireland; but this part of his statement was utterly indistinguishable in the gallery. The total amount of the whole ordinance expense for the year, for Great Britain and Ireland, would be, in round numbers, 948,000*l.* In time of war, the number of men employed was 31,600. In 1815, this number was reduced to the extent of 3,800 men: in 1816, to that of 15,000 more; and the present establishment consisted only of 9,300. He should content himself at present with moving, "That a sum not exceeding 248,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, for the service of the Ordinance Department, till the 30th of June, 1817."

Mr. Bennet considered, that it would be more advantageous to postpone the general discussion upon this subject till the whole of the estimates should be before the House. He rose at present chiefly for the purpose of expressing the surprise with which he had read an advertisement purporting to issue from the Ordinance Board, addressed to the map-sellers, forbidding them to make any use or publish any copies of the trigonometrical surveys of the country, which had been taken at the public expense, under the immediate direction of the Ordinance Board. This appeared to him to be acting in the spirit of a peddling trader, rather than of a public department. Many could not afford to purchase the original chart, and by this prohibition the general object of utility would be defeated. It was not upon this principle that foreign Governments acted. In Paris any one might go to the map-board, and see not only those which were, but those which were not published.

Mr. Ward said, he had not been apprised of the advertisement alluded to, but was nevertheless prepared to defend it. The charge for those surveys appeared neither in the ordinaries nor extraordinaries. It was intended that the sale of them should defray the expense, and in this instance, at least, he apprehended they were better stewards for the public than the hon. gent. with all his desire of public economy. The object of the advertisement was the prevention of piracy; and if that was only worthy the character of petty merchants, he must submit to the taunt, but it would effect a saving of 10,000*l.* annually.

Mr. Bennet observed, that he had been an advocate for abolishing articles of useless, not of useful, expense. The object of the survey was public, viz. the extending the knowledge of the country and its coasts, and it had been carried into effect by means of public money. The Board of Ordnance was in this respect acting on principles much more rigid than the map-sellers themselves, whom he had always found willing to make communications of their copies.

Sir M. W. Ridley was glad, however late, to see Ministers taking credit for economy: but he observed, that the first article in these estimates was the sum of 48,793*l.* to the master-general, principal officers, and others in this department. This was an increase to the heads of the department amounting to 10,000*l.* above the sum voted when the estimates were between three and four millions, although they were now less than one million. It was to a reduction of such salaries that the public looked for effectual retrenchment, and not to savings made by the sacrifice of works of national importance and utility.

Mr. Ward observed, that the hon. baronet was mistaken; if he supposed that the increase on the leading article of the civil establishment was owing to any addition to the salaries of the heads of the department. It was distributed entirely among the subordinate clerks, whose number was 205, and who were employed in 11 different departments. Not one of the principal officers had received a shilling of increased salary since the Union.

Mr. Calcraft said, that even in a state of war, the present establishments would be great; but the House must now look to peace establishments. (Hear, hear.) If Ministers thought themselves obliged to keep up the ordnance, their estimates were extremely large. He admitted that very considerable efforts at reduction had been made, but they might be carried still farther in the army and ordnance. He should by no means press for any farther reductions in the navy: he did not know, indeed, whether the navy was not too much reduced already.

Mr. Ward said, if it should be found that any further reductions could be made, they certainly should be effected. (Hear.)

Mr. Brougham desired to express his approbation of the great reductions in the ordnance, and hoped it would be the model and scale on which other reductions would be made. Something, he hoped, would be proposed by the committee above stairs; but he anticipated, with great satisfaction, that after Easter the House would be able to resume some of those functions which appeared now to be too much in abeyance.

The following sums were then voted: 248,000*l.* for the ordnance of Great Britain, from the 30th December, 1816, to the 30th June, 1817; 25,000*l.* for the ordnance not provided for in 1815; 25,000*l.* for the ordnance not provided for in 1816; 24,000*l.* for reductions in the ordnance from January to June, 1817; 105,000*l.* for the charge of superannuated, retired, and half-pay officers, and pensions to widows, &c. from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1817; 25,031*l.* for the superannuated, &c. in 1816; 15,000*l.* for allowances, compensations, and emoluments, to superannuated civil officers, artificers, and labourers; 72,000*l.* for the ordnance of Ireland from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1817; 7,000*l.* for allowances to retired officers of the late Irish artillery, and engineers, and pensions to widows; 1,740*l.* for allowances to superannuated and half-pay civil officers, artificers, and labourers, and pensions to widows, from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1817.

The Mutiny Bill was read a third time, and passed.

POLICE COMMITTEE.] Mr. Bennet moved, that it be made an instruction to the Police Committee, to inquire, and report generally to the House, on the laws relative to granting licences to victuallers: which was agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, March 18.

The Mutiny Bill was brought up from the Commons and read a first time.

TREATMENT OF BUONAPARTE.] Lord Howland rose, pursuant to notice, to move for papers connected with the treatment of Napoleon Buonaparte at St. Helena. Humanity alone might justify such a motion; but the chief, if not the only, motive for bringing the subject before their lordships, was a regard to the character of the country, of Parliament, and of the Crown. He certainly felt, however, that it might be an injury to the subject itself to be brought forward by him, considering the general tenour of his opinions as to the foreign and domestic policy which had been adopted by the Executive Government. It was well known, that he had differed from the Ministers of Government as to the policy of the detention and exile of Napoleon; and he was aware that this circumstance might do injury to the subject of his motion. He felt it necessary, therefore, distinctly to disclaim all intention of bringing that policy under discussion at this time. However proper it might be on other occasions to have insisted on that topic, it was his wish that it should have no connexion with this motion. It was not with the vain hope that he could produce any alteration in the principles of policy on which Ministers had acted, with reference to the detention of Buonaparte, that he made this motion; and as little was it with any view ofculpating the conduct of a gallant general, with many of whose good qualities he had the good fortune to be acquainted. Though he still retained the opinions which he had before expressed upon that point, he was not such a coxcomb as to suppose, that after Parliament had sanctioned the policy of the Ministers, and the faith of the Crown and of the country was pledged to it—he was not such a coxcomb as to imagine that he could now induce them to alter it, more especially when he considered that the opinion of the country went along with Ministers upon that subject; and he admitted that it did. It was with no such intention that the motion was brought forward; and he disclaimed any such intention: not because there was any thing in it of which one ought to be ashamed, but for the reasons which he had stated. He trusted, that the character which he bore among their lordships would be a pledge for his motives; and if it were not, it would be in vain for him to think that his assertions would avail him. But he again declared, that the policy of detaining Buonaparte had no connexion with the object of the present motion; and any insinuations to his prejudice—if any such there should be, on a subject of which misrepresentation was so apt to go forth—he should treat such insinuations with the contempt which, in his opinion, they merited. He had farther to state, that no hostility to Ministers—not using the word hostility in any invidious sense—but that fair political hostility against Ministers was the cause of his bringing this subject before their lordships. If he had concurred with them in the policy of detaining Buonaparte, instead of disapproving as he did of that policy, it would not only be consistent in him, but it would be the more incumbent on him on that account to bring forward this motion. Having said this much, to guard himself against misrepresentation, he would now proceed to state the relation in which Napoleon Buonaparte stood with respect to this country and the Government, and the ground of the measures adopted with respect to that personage, as Ministers themselves represented them at the time the act was passed, and as they were understood by the people. To use the language of the Legislature itself, then, Buonaparte was so detained, and so exiled, on the principle of necessity; because it was necessary for the tranquillity of Europe, and, through the repose of Europe, for the safety of this country. Owing, it was said, to the character of the man, and to the events which had passed in Europe, it was necessary that this extraordinary person should be restrained in this extraordinary manner; and an act of parliament was passed for the purpose. In justice to the Ministers themselves, and especially to the noble earl at the head of the colonial department, he must admit that they stated the proceeding as a measure of necessity. Then, if it were a measure of necessity, as the noble and learned lord on the woolsack had on another occasion well expressed it, necessity must limit the powers which necessity has created; and it was incumbent on Ministers to shew that the powers had been exercised only so far as necessity required their exertion. That was stated to be the ground of the detention, and the view with which Buonaparte was confined, with this farther observation, that the spot where he was to be detained was chosen for this, among other reasons—that there a greater degree of personal liberty might be allowed him. In other respects the place was ill chosen, as the expense to this country of keeping Buonaparte at St. Helena, amounted, he believed, to 150,000*l.* or 200,000*l.* He might be mistaken as to the sum, but certainly the expense was increased by the nature and distance of the place of detention. These, then, were the principles on which Napoleon Buonaparte was thus confined at all; and such was the particular reason why he was confined at St. Helena. But it ought to be kept in mind, that this was the act, not only of the Executive Government, but also of the Legislature. Parliament was a party to it, and it was the duty of Parliament to interfere, in case the personage so detained met with any harsh treatment in his confinement. And he contended, further, that if rumours and reports were in circulation, attended with any degree of plausibility, and calculated to produce in this country, in Europe, and on the minds of posterity, the impression that unnecessarily harsh and cruel treatment had been used, it then became the duty of Parliament to investigate the facts, and to ascertain whether the reports were, or were not, well founded; in order that, if not true, they might be contradicted; and that, if true, measures might be resorted to, without a moment's delay, to apply the proper remedy: for if such reports and rumours were allowed to remain uncontradicted, when thus plausibly brought to public notice, the opinion of this country, of Europe, and of posterity, would be, that they were not without foundation, and a deep stain would rest on the character of the British nation. What, then, were these reports? And why had he not, till now, brought forward the subject? He admitted, that such reports had reached him in the course of the last three or four months from a variety of quarters. It was a matter of notoriety, that he had opposed the policy of detaining Buonaparte in this manner, and had recorded his opinion on that subject; and for these, and perhaps some personal reasons, it was natural that the report should have reached him sooner than they reached others. No doubt many communications on the subject had been made to him; and from whatever quarters they came, he did not think that in a matter where the justice and character of the country was concerned, he ought to have shut his ears against such communications; but as long as they appeared to him to be founded merely on speculation, without any plausible grounds, he did not think himself called upon to bring them in this way before their lordships. But when, in addition to these rumours, a paper fell into his hands, containing the same complaints, and purporting to have been written by General Count Montholon, and addressed by him to the Governor of St. Helena, by the order and direction of Buonaparte—a paper which, he had reason to believe, would be made public, and which had been since made public—he then thought that the complaints had assumed a shape which rendered it necessary to call their lordships' attention to the subject. He did not say that their lordships ought to give implicit credit to these statements, without due examination. God forbid they should be found to deserve implicit credit! He hoped that they would meet with the fullest and most complete contradiction: but they did appear to him to have assumed a shape which, if they remained uncontradicted, would, in the opinion of the people of this country, in the opinion of Europe, and in that of posterity, afford ground for believing that harsh, cruel, and unjust usage had been experienced by Napoleon Buonaparte in his confinement; and thus a deep and indelible stain might, in history, be fixed upon the character of the British nation. He had now, therefore, brought the matter before their lordships, that such reports, if untrue, might be promptly contradicted; and, if true, that no time might be lost in correcting the abuse. He would now state what the reports were: and if the facts were as represented in these reports, he contended, that they did exceed the limits of that necessity upon which the Legislature was induced to pass the act. First, then, with respect to the liberty allowed to Buonaparte, as to the several parts of the island itself; the letter of Count Montholon stated, that a very considerable restriction had lately taken place. The climate of the island, as had been often asserted when the bill was in progress, was in general, he believed, good: but that was not the case with the higher grounds, to which Buonaparte was said to be confined; and the restriction lately resorted to was, in that respect, a severe hardship: for the hours fit for exercise in such a situation were those during which no ingress nor egress was permitted to or from the house at Longwood. One of two things must, therefore, follow—either that St. Helena was very ill chosen as the place of detention: or that Buonaparte was confined with unnecessary rigour. Another restriction, which was not in contemplation when the act passed, was stated in the letter of Count Montholon, namely, that Napoleon Buonaparte was not permitted to receive such books, journals, newspapers, and public prints, nor to subscribe for such publications, as he thought proper. This, to a person with the prospect of a long life, was a most cruel and unnecessary hardship; and if there had been no other complaint than this, it ought to be contradicted, or the proper remedy applied. Another more important complaint was, however, stated, and one in which the subjects of this country were deeply concerned, especially at the present period, when Ministers had been invested with such extraordinary powers, namely, the intercepting the communications by Buonaparte to the great and illustrious person at the head of the Government, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty. In his view of this proceeding, it was an improper and illegal interference with the royal prerogative. He would not be considered as having any wish to extend the prerogative beyond its due limits; but the prerogative, within its just limits, was granted for the benefit of the public; and in this country, where imprisonment was regarded with such horror, that to a prisoner confined for life without trial, the law never contemplating the case, had afforded no remedy; a prisoner confined in this manner would surely be considered as entitled to every degree of humanity consistent with his situation; and no one had a right to withhold from the Crown any application for mercy or pardon. It might, however, be said, that some rule or point of etiquette was opposed to communications sealed up: but, as to that matter, there was nothing to prevent the Sovereign from exercising his own judgment. If a person in Buonaparte's situation wished to apply to the Sovereign, it might be for the purpose of complaining of the individual under whose charge he was placed: and to say, that he should be compelled to send only an open paper, when the very person to transmit it might perhaps be the person complained of, would be monstrous and unjust: and it ought to be recollected, that the foundation of the detention was necessity and danger to this country. Now, where could be the danger to this country, or the necessity for the purposes of detention, in permitting a sealed letter to be conveyed to the Sovereign? If such were the rule—for it could not be law, that applications by sealed letters could not be made to the Throne—such a letter might, at least, be sent to the Secretary of State unopened and unexamined. This was a most important subject with reference to the subjects of this country. All were entitled to this indulgence, and in no quarter could they receive a more benevolent attention than from the illustrious personage now at the head of the Government. If, then, the Governor at St. Helena was instructed to permit no sealed communication to the Sovereign to pass through his hands, it was an infringement of the royal prerogative. He admitted, however, that an unrestrained and indiscriminate intercourse with other persons was not compatible with the safe custody of a person confined for the reasons given for the detention of Buonaparte: but it appeared to him, that even that principle was carried too far, if the report were true, especially as the restraint went to deprive Buonaparte of the gratification of reading such publications as he thought proper. It was a great hardship also, and one which was not contemplated at the time of passing the act, that Buonaparte was deprived of the means of communicating facts connected with his public life. If he were unrestrained in this respect, he might make communications which would shake some of the grounds on which the act was passed: and it was certainly a great hardship, that in a country where it had been much the fashion to load him with obloquy, he should be deprived of all remedy, and should not be allowed the means even of refuting calumny. This was not necessary for the tranquillity of Europe. He recollected that he recommended, when the bill was in progress, that Buonaparte should have the power of bringing a civil action, but the bill passed without giving him that advantage. If this restraint was intended to prevent his giving an account of the events of his extraordinary life, the restraint was an injury not merely to him, but to the public and to posterity; though, if it should be proved that the restraint was necessary for his safe custody, that inconvenience must be submitted to.—He now came to another subject of complaint, namely, the curtailing the expense of Buonaparte's establishmeht. It might, perhaps, be said, "Do you, who have been preaching up economy and retrenchment, complain of the diminution of expense?" His answer was, that he did not wish that sixpence should be expended in this way. He disapproved of the detention in this way altogether. But the statement was, that the expense was 20,000*l.*, that this country could afford no more than 8,000*l.*, and that Buonaparte himself must find the other 12,000*l.* It might be said, that 8,000*l.* was amply sufficient; and so it probably would be in any other situation: but at St. Helena, if the report was correct, even 20,000*l.* was hardly enough. And here he could not help just remarking, though it was rather out of his way, that even while Buonaparte was at Elba, the question whether he ought not to be sent to St. Helena, was discussed at the Congress of Vienna. He believed, at least, that the point was there mentioned and discussed; and he knew that, out of the Congress, it was stated to have been there mentioned, and discussed even at that time. That, however, was beside his present purpose. But if an extraordinary expense was necessary, it should be kept in view, that it was owing to the place where Buonaparte was confined; and it was unworthy of a great country, first to say, "I will place you in a situation where a great expense is necessary;" and then to come like a beggar, and say, "You must yourself be at the greater part of that expense." He had been astonished when he saw this complaint, and had been inclined to discredit it, as he was now: but it came in such a shape, that it was necessary to mention it; and if it could be contradicted, that was a strong argument for his motion. In bringing these statements before their lordships, he did not mention them as facts within his knowledge, or even as statements which he believed to be true; but they had been laid before the public, and, if not true, it was proper that they should be contradicted; for any harshness or treatment, beyond what was necessary for the safe custody of the person, would be a stain on the character of the country. The best mode of proceeding would be to investigate the facts. When a clamour was raised in 1798 or 1799, respecting our treatment of prisoners of war, Mr. Pitt moved for a committee to investigate the facts, contradicted the statements, and extinguished that calumnious report throughout all Europe. This was what he now recommended. If the reports were untrue, let them be contradicted: if true, their lordships would express their disapprobation of the conduct which had been adopted, and apply the remedy. However they might now flatter themselves by aspersions on Napoleon, the judgment of posterity might not be the same on that subject. There could be no doubt that Mary Queen of Scots was in the time of Elizabeth most dangerous to the country; and yet, who that had a heart alive to the feelings of integrity and humanity did not wish to obliterate from the page of history the cruel and harsh treatment of that queen? Who was there, with a just sense of the glory of the reign of the illustrious Elizabeth, that did not lament, not the unjust, but harsh and ungenerous treatment of Mary? It would not be considered by posterity whether Buonaparte had been justly punished for his crimes, but whether Great Britain had acted in that generous manner which became a great country. These were the views which they took of the past, and such would be the view which history would take of their conduct. Such, then, were the grounds of this motion. It was made for the purpose of ascertaining how the facts really stood—to give an opportunity for contradicting the rumours which had gone abroad, if they were unfounded; and for applying the proper remedy, if they were true. If their lordships would acquiesce in the motion, and the reports should be contradicted, he would rejoice for the sake of the House, for the sake of the country, of Parliament, and even of the noble lords opposite, particularly the noble earl at the head of the Treasury; for, however they might have differed on political questions, the sense of friendship was not by that circumstance so deadened in his breast, that he could see, without pain, an immoral character fixed upon any administration of which he was at the head. He ought to apologize for having taken up so much of their lordships' time; but he trusted that, in speaking upon a subject as to which misrepresentations were so likely to arise, it would not be considered as improper in him to have stated at some length the grounds of his proceedings, and the motives by which he was actuated. He concluded by moving an address to the Prince Regent, that he would be graciously pleased to order to be laid on their lordships' table—1*st.* Copies of all instructions to the Governor or Governors of St. Helena, as to the personal treatment of Napoleon Buonaparte. 2*d.* Extracts of all such parts of the correspondence as had passed between Napoleon Buonaparte and the Secretary of State, relative to the expenses of Buonaparte's establishment. 3*d.* Copies of such letters or applications of Buonaparte to the Governor or Governors of St. Helena, with the answers of the Governor, as had been received by the Secretary of State. 4*th.* Copies of all such dispatches as had been transmitted to the Secretary of State relative to the intercourse claimed by Napoleon Buonaparte to be allowed between his place of residence and other parts of the island, with any remarks by Napoleon on that subject. 5*th.* Copies of any dispatches to the Secretary of State relative to applications by Napoleon Buonaparte to the Prince Regent. Some of those who had chosen to follow the fortunes of Buonaparte had children; and it had been stated, that their parents had manifested an anxiety to have the means of religious instruction for these children, and there was no clergyman of their persuasion in the Island: and, therefore, he moved, ethly, for copies of all dispatches from the Governor of St. Helena to the Secretary of State, respecting any applications by the persons in question, on the subject of religious instruction for themselves or their children.

Earl Bathurst gave full credit to the noble lord, for the motives which had induced him to bring forward the present question. He had justly stated the great principle upon which the exile of Napoleon Buonaparte stood, and which had never been departed from by his Majesty's Government. That it was necessary that some restrictions should be imposed on a person in his situation, could not be denied; and the restrictions applicable were already well understood, and had received the sanction of Parliament; but whether they were executed properly was certainly a matter of fair consideration.—That there had been no improper or unnecessary restriction imposed, and that the Governor had acted according to his instructions, he should shew before he sat down. He was happy to find, that it was not the intention of the noble lord to found any argument on a publication by a person named Santini, which came before the public in no authentic shape, and could in no way be regarded as evidence. He should, therefore, consider that man's statements as entirely given up, and that Montholon's only were relied on by the noble lord. To his letter to Sir Hudson Lowe, which certainly was an authentic document, he should, accordingly, chiefly confine himself; and he was confident he should prove, that all the complaints in that document were either unfounded, or gross misrepresentations of the restrictions, which were well understood by General Buonaparte to be the result of the instructions given to the Governor. The general regulations of the confinement of Buonaparte in St. Helena, on which the instructions to the Governor were founded, were no secret. It happened, soon after General Buonaparte's removal from this country, that a copy of the regulations, generally believed to be authentic, was published in a paper on the Continent. The universal opinion then was in this country and in Europe, that there was nothing improper in these regulations, as they were all founded on the principle laid down by the noble lord, that the prisoner should be subject to no greater restrictions than were necessary for the safe custody of his person; and upon that principle had his Majesty's Government acted up to the present moment.—There certainly had been no substantive alteration. Whatever modifications had taken place had all been made for the benefit of the person who now complained of their severity. He had, in fact, no reason to complain of the Governor, relative to correspondence, for the instructions on that head were fully communicated to him; and he well knew there was no authority on the island that could depart from them. The instructions required, that all letters addressed to General Buonaparte and his suite, must first be delivered to the Governor. All written by him, or the persons attending him, were subject to the same regulation, and, as well as the former, must be open. No letters reaching the island, which may not have been regularly transmitted through the office of the Secretary of State, could be delivered. To impute it to the Governor, therefore, as an act of severity, that he was prevented from corresponding with his wife or his relations, was altogether unfounded; and the same observation applied to any complaint of impediments in the way of any representation he might choose to make respecting his situation or treatment. He had been given to understand, in the most distinct manner, that he was at full liberty to transmit to his Majesty's Government any representation or complaint he might think fit. It was true, it was required that the communication should be open; but the reason of that regulation was, that the Governor might have an opportunity of accompanying the representation with such remarks and explanations, as might be necessary for the information of his Majesty's Government. The rule in this case was one which was common to prisoners of war in general. The same rule applied to letters written to or received from the wives and children of such prisoners, and which formed one of the heads of complaint. If, therefore, General Buonaparte, and the persons in his suit, mean to say, that they cannot write letters without forwarding them open, that was perfectly true; but it was the general practice of all countries, to enforce such a regulation with respect to prisoners of war. General Buonaparte, therefore, knew that it was a rule to which he was liable, both from his particular situation, and from the instruction which had been given to the Governor; but if he said he could not write, that was not true; he only declined writing because he would not submit to the rule. In the same way, his relatives were at perfect liberty to communicate with him, by transmitting their letters through the office of the Secretary of State: but in point of fact, none of them had shewn any inclination to avail themselves of that opportunity, except his brother Joseph; from whom a letter arrived at the Secretary of State's office in October last; and, as it was open, it was transmitted without delay to St. Helena. The next subject of complaint he should notice was the assertion, that General Buonaparte was not allowed to transmit any letter to the Prince Regent. In point of fact, Sir Hudson Lowe had had no opportunity for refusing this permission. The circumstance, if it really could form a complaint at all, occurred during the command of Sir George Cockburn. General Buonaparte asked Sir George, whether, if a letter addressed to the Prince Regent were delivered to him, he would undertake to transmit it unopened. Sir George's reply was, what it was to be expected he would have said on such a proposition: he declared, that he could undertake no commission of the kind: reminding Buonaparte, that, according to the instructions he had communicated to him, no letter whatever could be forwarded unless it was open. Thus it was plain, that the information on which the noble lord rested his argument on this point, was totally unfounded. On this only occasion then, in which Buonaparte expressed a wish to forward a communication respecting his situation, his attention was particularly directed to that part of the instructions which required that any complaint or representation he might have to make, should be immediately forwarded, leaving the Governor no discretion as to withholding it, but requiring that it should be delivered to him open. This rule was proper, as on the one hand it gave the Governor the opportunity of vindicating himself, and if there really was any serious complaint, would afford the Government here the means of forming some judgment of its truth, without waiting to send back to St. Helena for explanation, before any decision whatever could be adopted. The noble earl having read the passage in the instructions which required the Governor to transmit to the Secretary of State, whatever representation any of the persons in custody might deliver to him, observed, that if either Sir George Cockburn or Sir Hudson Lowe had forwarded a sealed letter, addressed to the Prince Regent, he certainly would have opened it before he presented it to his Royal Highness. In this country, where Ministers were responsible, he should regard this course to be his duty. One complaint related to the difficulty of obtaining books. He could assure their lordships, that no improper impediment in that respect had been created. There was no disposition to refuse any reasonable request on this subject; but there had been only one instance of an application for books, and then every thing had been done to obtain those which were required. As they could not be all procured in this country, some were obtained from Paris. A bookseller was also permitted to forward some books which were afterwards required. No notice had hitherto been taken of this by Government; but when so much indulgence had been shewn, it was astonishing that the difficulty of obtaining books should be made matter of complaint. If, however, the noble lord went so far as to say, that General Buonaparte should be at liberty to receive every journal he pleased, he must say, that he could not agree with him. He must object to so extended an indulgence; because he knew that attempts had been made to correspond through the medium of newspapers. It was said that General Buonaparte was not permitted to open a correspondence with a bookseller or a banker. This was untrue; he was, at perfect liberty to carry on such correspondence, only the communications must be open. It was doubtless a great restriction, a very severe tax on correspondence between friends and relatives, to subject it to such a condition;

but what effusions of the heart, which required to be carefully sealed up, were likely to be addressed to a bookseller or a banker? No peculiarly tender or delicate communications were likely to be made to them. The next subject of complaint he should notice, was that of letters to Buonaparte, or the persons attending him, being liable to be read by subaltern officers. This was as groundless as the rest. Sir Hudson Lowe was most careful in preventing any letter which he might receive from being seen, even by those nearest him in office or authority. Immediately on receiving any letter, he never failed to forward it according to the address, or to return it to this country addressed to the Secretary of State, if it had arrived on the island unopened. In some instances the Governor had been very ill required for his civility to the persons in custody. Las Casas had addressed a letter to a lady for some things which he wanted, and sent his son to get the letter forwarded. The letter was sealed, and Sir Hudson Lowe, after opening it, sent it according to the address. The articles applied for were received by Las Casas, the father; who, instead of thanking Sir Hudson Lowe for the trouble he had taken, wrote to him complaining of his presumption in opening a letter addressed to a lady. With regard to the complaint that General Buonaparte was cut off from all communication with individuals who might wish to wait on him, it was most untrue. The chief restriction in that respect depended upon himself. So far from its being the fact that there were great restrictions on visiting him, any person, on obtaining a pass from a proper officer, was at liberty to proceed to Longwood. On arriving there, they had to present themselves to Bertrand, or some other of General Buonaparte's attendants; and it depended upon them whether they could be admitted to his presence. Thus care was taken that there should be no intrusion, and, at the same time, that no person whom the General might wish to see should be kept back. It had been said, that he was restricted from any intercourse with the officers of the garrison, but that was equally untrue. With regard to his movements, it was directed by the instructions, that when he should come to that part of the space where sentinels were placed, he should be accompanied by an officer. It was wished at first to give him the liberty of moving alone through the whole extent of the space allotted for his ride, which is 12 miles; but after some time the restriction he had described was thought necessary, to prevent the possibility of any tampering with the soldiers. With respect to all the rest of the island, he was allowed to ride about it whenever he pleased, if he chose to be accompanied by an officer not lower in rank than a captain; but if he did not think fit to avail himself of this regulation, the Governor was not to blame. The next subject of complaint to which he should call the attention of their lordships, was the assertion that General Buonaparte was not permitted to come out of his house at the proper hours for taking the exercise of walking, in order to preserve his health. In order to explain this matter, he must inform their lordships, that it had been thought necessary to surround the garden, which adjoined the house in which the General lived with sentinels. Now, because these sentinels were in sight, he would not come out to walk and on this, the untrue assertion of his confinement to his house, at the hours when it was proper he should take exercise, was founded; but it was the duty of Sir Hudson Lowe to place the sentinels there: and did their lordships consider what might be the consequence of their removal? Let it be supposed, that Sir Hudson Lowe had now arrived with intelligence of Buonaparte having escaped, and that he was brought to their lordships' bar to account for his neglect. If Sir Hudson Lowe were asked how Buonaparte escaped, and he answered, that he had escaped from his garden in consequence of the sentinels being removed; and if, on your lordships inquiring why those sentinels were removed, the answer should be, because their presence was offensive to General Buonaparte, what would your lordships then think of the conduct of Sir Hudson Lowe? What would be your lordships' opinion of an officer who had so grossly neglected his duty? The very fact of no attempt at escape having been made, is probably owing to the precautions which have been so strongly blamed: for it cannot be doubted that the disposition to undertake such an attempt exists, if any possible chance of success could present itself. The state of the residence of General Buonaparte had been made a main subject of complaint by him, and those who accompanied him; but this complaint was as unjust as all the rest. Every thing consistent with prudence had been done to comply with his wishes, and to render his situation as comfortable as possible. The choosing of a place of residence was, with one exception, left to himself and Sir G. Cockburn. Soon after his arrival he rode with Sir George to Longwood, and on the view of that situation, said he should prefer it to any other on the island; and until the house should be got ready, he begged that a tent might be erected there. His wish in this respect was readily complied with: but in the mean time he wished to occupy a small room in the house of one of the inhabitants rather than go into the town. However, to shew the dissatisfied dispositions of the persons who accompanied him, it was only necessary to state, that two days after he had, by his own desire, been allowed to take up his residence in this room, a letter was received by Sir G. Cockburn, from one of the General's attendants, complaining of the cruel treatment his master had received in confining him to that place. He remained in this room full three months, and was very unwilling to leave the house on account of the communication he had with the family; but when he was at last removed to Longwood, and found that he could not go out to any distance without being accompanied by an officer, then his serious complaints began. He is not pleased with his residence; and he is dissatisfied if any attempt should be made to improve or extend it. The want of convenience, with respect to room, is entirely owing to his own humour. He has observed, that if he were to live long on the island he would have a new house built; but he believed that the administration of this country would be either overturned, or that a change of government would take place in France, and in either case he would be released. He, therefore, did not consider his residence as a matter of any consequence. With regard to the subject of the expense of General Buonaparte's maintenance, he had to state, that what appeared on that subject in Montholon's letter was untrue. No such proposition as that which was there stated had been made. There was, of course, a wish to reduce the expenditure as far as was consistent with propriety; and the impression was, that it might be brought as low as the sum mentioned in the letter, though no attempt had been made to reduce that idea to practice. It was estimated that the household expenses at Longwood might be brought within 4,000*l.* a year; and in that case, a similar sum would surely be sufficient for the personal expenditure of General Buonaparte and his attendants. No one would dispute, that, while he was maintained out of the funds of this country, every practicable economy ought to be introduced into his establishment: but instead of 8000*l.* Government intended to make the allowance for the Longwood establishment altogether 12,000*l.* a year; which surely would be allowed to be amply sufficient, for that sum was equal to the allowance to Sir Hudson Lowe and all his staff. It was true that Buonaparte had offered to take the whole expense of his establishment on himself; but his offer to do this was accompanied with conditions of a most extraordinary nature, and therefore could not be listened to. He required that all his correspondence should pass unopened, and that all the money he received should be at his own disposal. If this had been agreed to, he was ready to draw for any sum; and he appeared perfectly confident that any bill he should draw would be duly honoured. Where the money was to come from he did not know; but there was the most perfect confidence at Longwood, that whatever sum was required would be at General Buonaparte's command. He did not wish Buonaparte to defray his own expenses because he had funds, nor did he mention the magnitude of his resources with any such view; but he was anxious to shew that that person had no reason to complain, inasmuch as he received from this country as much for his maintenance as the Governor of the island, who was exposed to great expenses both in receiving strangers and entertaining the inhabitants of the the island; and that, if he thought such an allowance insufficient, and made a demand for more, he should only receive it out of those large funds which he acknowledged he possessed, and, under certain circumstances, was willing to render available for his support. The noble secretary here apologized to their lordships for detaining the House so long (hear, hear); but there was still one complaint in the memorial published to the world, that he would take the opportunity of answering—he alluded to the lamentation, that General Buonaparte had only one bottle of wine in the day. He could not mean by this statement that one bottle was dealt out to him each day; if he did so, it was a statement which had no foundation in truth. Upon a general calculation of what might be necessary, (and wherever there was a limited expense, such a calculation must be made,) an average was fixed. Some days, therefore, there would be more, and some days less; but if a proper distribution took place, in no day could there be so little as one bottle for the General. Even if there had (we understood the noble secretary to say,) there might be no great hardship, as his Majesty's table had not been more abundantly supplied than in that proportion; and though he had lived long, he had never complained of insufficiency. To shew how groundless this statement was, however, he would only refer to the estimates for the quantity of wine supplied to General Buonaparte and his attendants. There were two kinds of Cape wines supplied, one weaker and another of better sort; the former for the servants, and the other for General Buonaparte and his attendants. Of the weaker sort, in one fortnight there were 64 bottles given; of the other, 336 bottles; 14 bottles of Madeira, 14 of Champagne, 7 of Constantia, 84 of Teneriffe, 140 of claret and other wine, making in all 336 bottles. To save the noble lord opposite a calculation of what this would amount to per day, he would make it for him. The number of persons who were to be supplied included only the General, six officers, two ladies, and two children (who could not be supposed to drink much wine,) making in all, for the purpose of this calculation, only ten persons. Among these ten persons were distributed, according to his former statement of the number of bottles in a fortnight, 19 bottles per day, one day with another; this amounted nearly to two bottles a piece, which he (Lord B.) was sure was as much as would satisfy the noble lord's wishes, either for himself or any person in whom he was interested. Besides the wine, there was distributed 48 bottles of porter, which would be at the rate of three bottles a day to the party. From this statement he was convinced that their lordships would see there was no reason to complain of an inadequate or scanty supply. Indeed, on the consideration of the whole case, he felt convinced, that the House would perceive no severity, no harshness, nothing but the enforcement of restrictions necessary for the safe custody of our prisoner. The Governor could not support his authority, or execute his duty, in keeping these persons in his power, with fewer restrictions than he had enforced, or with greater lenity than he had shewn. It might be made a question, whether this person was to be detained at all; but if he was to be detained, proper means ought to be taken to secure him, and proper vigilance employed to prevent his escape; nor should any mistaken compassion be allowed to influence us to depart from this cautious and prudent course. If, by our negligence, he was allowed to escape, we should not only incur the censure of those who now called for a relaxation of vigilance and restraint, but our conduct would be liable to misrepresentation: it would be asserted, that we intended to allow his enlargement for some purposes of our own; and we should be accused of acting under the most detestable hypocrisy, in first conveying him to that distant station, and in pretending to place him under restrictions, while we really wished his escape. Seeing, therefore, no ground for the motion, he would oppose it.

The Marquis of Buckingham gave his noble friend, who brought forward this motion, the greatest credit for good intentions and upright views. Nobody who knew the pure and honourable mind of his noble friend could for a moment doubt the integrity of his motives, or the laudable nature of the object which he proposed to accomplish; notwithstanding this, he (Lord B.) lamented that his noble friend had taken his present course, because he was afraid that his motives, honourable as they were, might be misrepresented, and his conduct lead to misconception both in this country and over Europe. He confessed that he himself did not come to the consideration of the subject with any of the feelings of his noble friend, or perhaps with those feelings that he ought to entertain. He was willing to allow that he did not possess a mind entirely unbiassed; for, be it error, be it prejudice, or any feeling less defensible, he acknowledged that he could not bring himself to view this person or his fate without considering him as the most bitter and rancorous enemy that this country ever had. The question, in this case, was confined within narrow limits. The policy of his imprisonment was now not before the House: that had already been decided on. If imprisoned, it was plain that he must be under restrictions of some kind or another, sufficient to guard against his escape. Would any person say that these restrictions were more than necessary for their object? (Hear, hear.) Would any one say that he could be kept in safe custody without them? (Hear.) He (Lord B.) did not believe so. For the unnecessary severity of these restrictions, we had the authority of a paper signed Montholon. This paper was filled with complaints and accusations. Against it we now had the evidence of his Majesty's Ministers; who, in a case of this kind, might be expected to be cautious, deliberate, and guarded in their statements. Which was the House to believe—the Ministers of the Crown, with all their responsibility upon them, and speaking from the most minute information; or this prejudiced individual? He could not hesitate for a moment. He did not think that Ministers could be disbelieved; he did not see that it was possible to doubt their statements. (Hear.) He felt, that the paper which they had been called upon to answer was an additional insult to this country (hear, hear); proceeding from a person who had so often tried to insult it. He stated, “that he was not the prisoner of England;” that he had not surrendered to us, but that he repaired voluntarily and freely to England, to place himself under its laws, and to enjoy its liberties. He stated, that he had the option of surrendering himself either to Austria, Russia, or Prussia; and he invidiously insinuated that he would have found in any of those States a more honourable reception, greater kindness, or more justice, than with us. This he asserts with the recollection of his former history before his eyes. Had he tried the experiment he could not have found it successful. In Austria, instead of protection, he must have met with the deep-rooted recollection of broken treaties, and of wanton aggression—the trace of the ruin he had created, and the hatred of the people whom he had insulted. Had he sought an asylum in Russia, he would have found that the injustice of his invasion, and the burning of Moscow, were not forgotten by the inhabitants:—and had he endeavoured to take refuge in Prussia he would have been execrated as the person who had plundered the kingdom, and insulted its beautiful queen. (Hear.) He stated, that if he had surrendered to the House of Lorraine, “the emperor would have recollected the relations which religion and nature have formed between a father and a son; that he would have recollected that he restored him at Luneville, at Vienna, and had received protestations of his good-will at Dresden: that the Emperor Alexander would have recollected the ties of friendship contracted at Tilsit, and during ten years of correspondence: and that upon his surrender to the King of Prussia, he would have recollected the protestations of attachment and sentiments of gratitude that he testified to him in 1812.” But leaving out of his view all those who owed him such obligations, he chose to surrender himself to this country, and his demands on our generosity were certainly great, considering the grounds on which they were made, and the relation in which he stood to us. He had restored, according to his own declaration, their crowns to the Sovereigns of each of the countries which he renounced, giving the preference to this: and what was the price he exacted from them for this kindness? Why, that they should join him in an alliance against that very country in which he took refuge, and which he afterwards abused. He now appealed to our feelings of compassion and justice, by telling us what stock of merits he had laid up with those whom he had prevailed upon to become our enemies, but to whom he did not choose to surrender; and adduced, as claims on our kindness, treaties that enforced the continental system against us, and were intended for our commercial annihilation. Considering that there was no ground for the present motion, considering the production of the papers as perfectly uncalled for and unnecessary, he would join the noble secretary in opposing the motion of his noble friend. He was of opinion that this person should be kept in close confinement, and that every restriction should be enforced, and every degree of vigilance exercised, that should be found necessary for that purpose. It was a piece of political justice that we owed to Europe and the world. It taught a political lesson that should never be forgotten in this country or any other.

Earl Darnley, having no hostility to Buonaparte, yet allowed that his safe custody must be provided for; but having, at the same time, a respect for the honour of the country, he thought no unnecessary severity should be employed. On both these points he was perfectly satisfied by the statement of the noble secretary. The motion of his noble friend had brought forward a sufficient answer to the rumours which were abroad, and a sufficient justification of his Majesty's Ministers. He could not, therefore, agree with a noble marquis (Buckingham), in lamenting that the discussion had taken place; on the contrary, he was obliged to his noble friend for a motion which was necessary to call forth so satisfactory a statement. He thought, however, after what had been said and after so much had been gained, that his noble friend should not press his motion.

Lord Holland thought the charges were of such a kind and of such magnitude, that in opposition to one of his noble friends, he would persist in thinking, that they called for contradiction; and, in opposition to the other, that they were not yet sufficiently contradicted. That contradiction should rest, not on the declaration of a Minister, but on documentary evidence. He (Lord H.) could not accept, therefore, the compliments of the former to his motives, while he lamented his conduct; nor the thanks of the latter, for the statement which he had given the noble secretary an opportunity of making, while he did not think that statement satisfactory. He (Lord H.) was not disposed to pay much attention to the construction that might be put on his motives; both because he was conscious of their rectitude, and because, in obeying them, he was convinced he had done an essential service to his country. No praise on the goodness of the intentions by which he was actuated would make him surrender the impression of the service he had accomplished. He rejoiced that he had made a motion which produced a contradiction of charges that were injurious to the honour of the country. He should rejoice still more that documents were produced to disprove abuses; or if his exertions would tend if they existed, to correct them. He enjoyed the satisfaction of thinking, that there was one individual in the country who could not hear imputations on our national character without calling for inquiry, and giving an opportunity shewing their unfounded nature. (Hear, hear.) The noble secretary had said, that those who were adverse to the confinement of Buonaparte at St. Helena, must necessarily be biased in judging of the degree of restraint necessary for his safe custody. The noble secretary should at least give an opportunity of deciding whether too great severity had been used, by producing the documents he had moved for. He (Lord H.) neither approved of the spirit of that speech, nor was convinced by its arguments. It seemed throughout to support the motion it was intended to oppose. He had contradicted the report on which he proceeded, but would not produce evidence to refute them. He (Lord Bathurst) seemed to think, that the motion was one of censure, and not of inquiry—one that assumed the facts as true, instead of one that called for information. He had, therefore, answered his statements as charges, and not as grounds for examination. He (Lord H.) moved for papers. What did the noble secretary do? Instead of producing them to Parliament, he read his own justification from them by extracts, while he refused to lay the documents themselves on the table of the House. This was the most extraordinary and unjustifiable conduct that ever existed: a mode of proceeding which, till within these ten or twelve years, was completely unknown—that a Minister should make use of documents not before the House, which he had an opportunity of quoting, stretching, or garbling, at his pleasure. How did the noble secretary answer the charges? He refused the papers; and, as a man of wit and pleasantry, instead of allowing the justification of the absent to be heard, he cut jokes upon an individual whose character and person were in his power. If this was his glory, if this was his triumph, he did not envy him, his feelings, or his taste. The noble secretary had denied the papers, on the allegation that it would be six months before they could be obtained from St. Helena; and during all that time the imputations against the Government would remain uncontradicted; but what would he say to Buonaparte's situation, against whom the noble secretary had not only stated things that could not be contradicted, but on whom, in his absence, he had even cut jokes. The whole tenour of the noble earl's speech shewed the propriety of the present motion. He (Lord Holland) never stated that the accounts were true; and, indeed, he knew nothing about the statements that had been published, except that they were confirmed by private accounts from other quarters. He only said, that they required contradiction; and, however much he might admire the speech of the noble earl, he did not think the contradiction contained in it equal to a contradiction by documents. If the charges were light and trivial, why did the noble secretary take such pains to refute them? and if they were serious, why did he not give the means of rendering that refutation most effectual, by producing the papers? The contradiction should not rest on the breath of the noble lord. He (Lord H.) was not entitled, from the source whence he had received his information, to lay his authorities before the House; but notwithstanding the noble lord's assertion, he still believed, that the sending of Buonaparte to St. Helena was a subject of discussion with the Congress of Vienna. He had been told this circumstance before the battle of Waterloo, and he believed Buonaparte himself had heard of it. (A laugh from the Ministerial benches.) Gentlemen might think this very pleasant: they might think, perhaps, that Buonaparte had himself suggested it; but how could he have suggested it, unless he had heard that such an idea had been entertained? This, however, was a point on which he would not enlarge, as it had no reference to his present motion; neither had his motion any reference to the memorial of Monthonol, or the other papers in publication. All that he wanted was, recorded documents against those rumours that affected the character of the country: all that he got was a speech of the noble lord instead of papers. This speech might probably be as convincing to his (Lord Holland's) mind and the House as the papers themselves; but it could not be equally convincing to Europe and posterity. Will posterity and the world look upon statements from the mouth of the noble lord as of equal authority with Parliamentary documents, although substantially they might be the same? The only ground on which papers could be refused was, that the charges were too trivial to deserve inquiry. He was far from thinking them of such a nature: they appeared to him to be of the greatest importance; and he could by no means agree in what seemed to be the sentiments of his noble friend (the Marquis of Buckingham), that now he was sent there, it was of no consequence how he was treated. His noble friend had alluded to Austria, Prussia, and Russia, as states in which he could not find an asylum: but (and it was another ground of the present motion) he should not be surprised if a foreign power, affecting popularity, should make a remonstrance on the subject of his treatment. The speech of the noble earl would not be so good an answer to such a remonstrance as the papers: still less would it be as good, if Buonaparte should happen to expire while these rumours were yet in existence. The noble earl had dwelt with much pleasantry on a person who was absent, and could not defend himself; and had taken up the defence of Sir Hudson Lowe, as one who was exposed to the plots of his prisoner on the island, and to the suspicions of the people at home. Even the strictest confinement of his captive could not, it seems, relieve his fears: indeed he probably would be "afraid of this gunpowder Percy, though he were dead." Looking at it as a point of taste and feeling, he could not admire the attempt to turn into ridicule the effusions even of ill humour; for, God knows, ill humour might be pardoned in a man who had met such dreadful reverses: and, however successful such an attempt might be, he should be sorry to have produced an effect by such means. He still adhered to the propriety of his motion, as he had seen and heard nothing to make it unnecessary.—The motion was then negatived without a division.

PROTEST.

House of Lords, March 18, 1817.

Against not agreeing to an Address for Papers respecting the Personal Treatment of Buonaparte.

Dissentient, VASSALL HOLLAND.
LAUDERDALE.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, March 18.

IRISH POLICE BILL.] Mr. Peel brought in his Bill for the better preservation of the peace in Ireland, and for the regulation of the Police. (See page 504.)

NEW STREET BILL.] Mr. Huskisson rose, to move for leave to bring in a Bill, to alter and enlarge the powers of the 54th of the King. By the act which had been passed for building what was called the New Street, the Commissioners were authorized to raise the sum of 600,000*l.* for the purpose of making purchases, compensating individuals whose property was affected, &c. It was necessary, of course, to look to some of the opulent corporate bodies of this metropolis, for the obtaining of that loan, and the Corporation of the Royal Exchange Assurance had agreed to lend 300,000*l.* with an understanding, that they should be at liberty, when called upon for the other 300,000*l.*, to advance it or not, as they might judge expedient. They were prevented, however, by an act of William and Mary, under which they held their charter, from lending any money to the Crown upon any Crown lands, or upon any security of the Crown, which was not subject to the controul of Parliament; and in consequence of that provision, an exception was introduced into the New Street Act, to enable the Corporation to advance the sum in question. They have been lately called upon to exercise their option with regard to the other 300,000*l.*, and had declined to lend it; but an arrangement had been made with the Bank of England, who had agreed to make the loan. They, however, were tied down by their charter to the same limitations as the Royal Exchange Assurance Company, and the object of the Bill which he intended to bring in, was to secure them from any penalty which they might otherwise be liable to. He could not state, as a matter of certainty, that the 600,000*l.* would be sufficient to complete the projected plan, but according to the information he had received from those who were more competent to judge, he had every reason to believe that it would. The hon. member then made his motion, and leave was given accordingly.

WELSH JUDGES.] Mr. Calcraft moved for a writ for the election of a new member to serve in the present Parliament, for the Borough of Bridport, in the room of Mr. Serjeant Best, who had accepted the office of one of the Justices of the Great Sessions of Wales.

Sir S. Romilly observed, that he could not help taking this opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the distinction made between the English and Welsh Judges with regard to the capacity of sitting in that House. The constituents of the learned gentleman himself had nothing to complain of, as it remained to them to determine whether their representative was likely to be as attentive to their interests after as before his acceptance of this office: but the point was of great constitutional importance; and he had never been able to understand at what period this difference between English and Welsh Judges originated. The latter had duties equally arduous, although not so frequently exercised as those of the former; they had to sit in judgment in cases affecting the property, reputation, and lives of his Majesty's subjects. The due exercise of their functions required the same general qualifications, the same impartiality of character, and the same abstinence from party conflicts. He was, he confessed, at a loss to determine how such an irregularity could have ever crept into the Constitution. The fact, however, unfortunately was, that they were considered not professional, but political offices; and were, he had reason to believe, not in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, but of the First Lord of the Treasury. He spoke from a recollection of information communicated to him many years ago, on the expression of his surprise at some former appointments; and he was inclined to think that this information was correct. These observations were evidently not directed against the recent appointment of the learned serjeant, whose great practice and long experience fully qualified him in those respects for the situation. Whatever regret, however, the House might feel at the absence of his talents, he did not think it could be attended with much surprise. It could not have failed to have attracted notice, that the hon. and learned gent. had some time since changed his original seat on the opposition benches, for one which might be regarded as neutral territory; and that he had subsequently removed to one which was not only nearer to, but was the very threshold of the Treasury. (A laugh.) The House, he thought, were bound to take into its consideration the propriety of suffering any man to unite in himself the characters of a Member of Parliament and of a Judge. In point of practical consequence, it was undeniable that those honourable members always placed implicit confidence in the Ministers of the Crown. He had heard of many visionary projects for Parliamentary Reform, and he was sorry that such ideas had been entertained; but of practical and moderate Reform, he had always been a supporter, both in the House, and before he had the honour to enter it; nor could he imagine any plan of Reform more practical and moderate, nor one calculated to give more general satisfaction, than the rendering ineligible those persons whose offices necessarily made them dependent on the Ministers of the Crown, and more especially all those who held judicial appointments. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Abercromby adverted to the fact, that his Majesty's Attorney-General held the office of Chief Justice of the county Palatine of Chester. He understood that many persons had been arrested for treasonable practices within that hon. and learned gentleman's jurisdiction, probably by his advice and instructions; and if he afterwards should sit to try them in his judicial capacity, the House could not but feel how inconsistent such a course would be with all the notions of justice entertained in this country. On the other hand, if the Attorney-General did not try them, then the Crown would be deprived of the benefit of his talents and assistance. He might mention the conduct of an hon. gent. (Mr. Adam), who, when appointed to a judicial situation in a distant part of the kingdom, immediately resigned the office he held, as Attorney-General to the Duke of Cornwall, purely on the ground that he considered the two functions incompatible. In what he had stated, he was sure he only spoke the sentiments of a numerous class of persons of the profession to which he had the honour of belonging.

The Attorney-General said, the hon. and learned gent. was completely mistaken in supposing, that any thing so indecent would be committed as that, he, the King's Attorney-General, would direct prosecutions which he should afterwards try in his capacity as Chief Justice of Chester. If there were persons in custody in Chester, he was quite certain he should not hear a syllable upon the subject (except what might be matter of public notoriety) till he arrived there. In the last sessions at Chester, several persons were tried for a conspiracy, but of which he knew nothing, until the matter was opened before him by the indictment; and the same course would be pursued on the present occasion, if the fact should be as stated by the hon. and learned gent. He should consider himself, or any other individual, unworthy to hold a situation under the Crown, if he could advise prosecutions, which were subsequently to be tried by him. Were such a necessity inevitable, he should hold himself bound to resign one or other of the offices.

Mr. Ponsonby said, the speech of the hon. and learned gent. had proved beyond the possibility of doubt, that the two offices of Attorney-General and of Chief Justice of Chester were incompatible. He could not, in fact, do his duty in the one capacity, but by neglecting it in the other; he could not execute his functions as Chief Justice of Chester without foregoing his duty as Attorney-General. It was directly contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, whensoever the practice had commenced, that persons holding judicial offices should possess seats in that House; and he now gave notice of a motion after the Easter holidays, for disqualifying them to continue members any longer.—(Hear, hear.)

Sir S. Romilly observed, that since the hon. and learned gentleman had been Chief Justice of Chester, some causes had been tried, in which the Crown had a great interest, relating to De-lamere Forest; the hon. and learned gentleman very properly abstained from sitting, and they were tried by another judge, but the consequence was, the Crown could not have the assistance which it ought to have had from the hon. and learned gentleman's talents.

The Attorney-General explained, and remarked, that if any sin were committed by holding two offices, it was a sin which two of the greatest legal characters in this country had committed, the late Lord Kenyon and Lord Loughborough. The motion was then agreed to.

LOTTERIES.] Mr. Lyttelton rose, in pursuance of notice, to call the attention of the House to the dangerous, immoral, and fraudulent mode of raising money upon the people by way of Lotteries. The prejudices that prevailed against a subject of this kind were very strong at this moment; indeed, he lamented to say, that there was a great inattention on the part of persons both within and without that House, to every thing that related to the raising of money. It was necessary, no doubt, that money should be raised to support the expenses of the State; but the utmost jealousy should be entertained by the people, and particularly by those who represented them in that House, that no taxes should be imposed that could be avoided (hear); and more especially, that no mode of taxation should be adopted which would lead to the destruction of the morals of the community.—(Hear.) It could not have escaped the notice of almost every gentleman, that it was usual to consider this subject as a sort of joke. The right hon. gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) and those who sat beside him, had been used to say, "You only find fault with the lottery-puff;" this excited a laugh, and then the matter dropped. He was fully persuaded, therefore, it must be the effect of evidence that would get the better of the habitual prejudice on this subject. Amongst the different expedients that were resorted to for raising money, it was said, that the Lottery was the only one to which the people cheerfully assented, because it was a voluntary, and not a compulsory tax; but what had the two committees, who were appointed at different periods, to inquire into the consequences of this species of taxation reported to the House?

They had stated, that this system was radically vicious; that it was as improvident as it was immoral; and, in the last place, that the manner of raising money was, on all accounts, objectionable. (Hear, hear.) On an average of the last five years, the sum derived from this source, did not exceed 550,000*l.* He believed, however, that this estimate was a good deal more than it really produced; but, certainly, in the last year, it could not be rated higher than 500,000*l.* This sum was raised on the public at a very enormous expense; indeed, it cost more in collecting than it brought into the Exchequer. The right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had taken some pains in promoting religious societies; he had attended bible meetings, and made some eloquent speeches on religion and morality: he had professed the most lively interest for the comforts of the poor; but what did all this amount to? What would the House of Commons think, what could the people, what could the right hon. gentleman himself think, of these gambling speculations? Did this system accord with his pure notions of morality? He asked the right hon. gentleman, how he could reconcile it to his conscience as a Christian, and a Chancellor of the Exchequer, to raise money in such a manner? As to the Secretary of the Lottery, he defied the right hon. gentleman to find any person of high character at the bar who would accept of that office. The consequence was, that the powers of the office would always be abused. The Lord Mayor, a most active and discerning magistrate, had informed him (Mr. L.) that the evils arising from this species of gambling, were increasing. His authority could not be received otherwise than with the greatest attention, especially as the city of London had petitioned strongly and unanimously against the system; and, indeed, if this public nuisance were ever abated, he believed it would be by the testimony of the whole country, embodied against it in petitions. No Lotteries had been drawn in Ireland for 16 years. However, there needed not this additional argument—the system was radically bad; and he felt convinced, that if he could be instrumental in suppressing the nuisance, he should be doing a service to the country. It was true, that money must be found for the necessities of the State, but he thought the 500,000*l.* now raised by the way of Lotteries, might be taken out of the pockets of the people honestly, and without deception; and sure he was that the State could never be saved by crooked means. (Hear, hear.) He therefore begged to submit to the House resolutions nearly the same as those he had offered last year, but a little softened down in the expression: 1st. That by the system of State Lotteries, a spirit of gambling was promoted destructive to the morals of the people, and detrimental to the revenue of the country. 2d. That this House will no longer authorize the existence of State Lotteries.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, observing that the hon. gentleman had admitted that the House could not easily give up one of the available means of the country towards the support of its revenue, hoped the House would consider that point well; for, unless they weighed the point well before they relinquished any source of revenue, the situation of the country would be most alarming. In the measure itself, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could see no principle wrong, unless we were to maintain, that all the games of chance were inadmissible; a position which had never been maintained by the strictest moralists. If, then, games of chance were defensible on any occasion, it was surely when they contributed to the necessities of the State. Admitting, however, that the existence of the Lottery in some degree encouraged gambling, it was to be considered, whether the suppression of the Lottery would not increase rather than diminish that vice among the people. It was known that, in proportion as Lotteries were withdrawn, the pernicious system of Little-goes increased; and one good effect of the Lottery was, that it kept up a number of persons who were interested in the prevention of these Little-goes. If the Lotteries were themselves suppressed, it was true, we should hear little of gambling among the poorer classes, though it might be carried on to a much greater extent. Already it had been found very difficult to prevent the sale of Foreign Lottery Tickets: and they would be bought by thousands if the Home Lottery were ever to make way for them. The effect of Lotteries in Ireland had been so much more pernicious than in England, that it was found expedient to suppress them there. (Hear, hear.) But the persons formerly employed, had only received the allowances they were entitled to on the Union, and when any vacancy had occurred, it had not been filled up, so that the whole system there would soon be extinct. The city of London had lately petitioned against Lotteries, but their scruples were of a very late date; for it was not long since they had procured an act for effecting some improvements by way of a Lottery, in which the value of the prizes had been infinitely more exaggerated than it ever had been in any State Lottery. One prize in the City Lottery, estimated at 25,000*l.* had sold for no more than 7,000*l.* The practical question for the House to consider was, whether a revenue of 500,000*l.* per annum could be given up without any proposal for a substitute; that revenue, too, at present was paid voluntarily; and it was clear that it could not be added to the taxes, without materially adding to the distress of the country. He trusted, therefore, that the House would concur with him in voting against the resolutions.

Sir S. Romilly had hoped, that instead of ridiculing the changed opinions of the city of London, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would also have changed his own, as to the system of Lotteries, and that he would have abandoned it. All that was said was, that we could not afford to give up this part of the revenue; but least of all, he (Sir S. R.) thought, could we afford to give up what concerned the morals and the honest industry of the people. The argument on the profits of the Lottery was to be placed against the losses of the revenue, occasioned by the deterioration of the habits of numbers of people, who were rendered a burden instead of a benefit to the community, and who thereby added to the enormous amount of the poor-rates. The evils spread through every village in the country, where persons were employed in posting up bills to attract poor miserable creatures, and inflame them with the hope of sudden wealth. He could wish the Report of 1808 had been reprinted. The facts proved to the Committee shewed, that butchers, bakers, and others, found their trades diminish during the Lottery, while that of the pawnbrokers increased. Women were allured, and spent the hard earnings of industrious husbands, and pawned their clothes and those of their children. Some witnesses spoke strongly of the heart-breaking scenes of misery they had seen—of the total loss of all domestic comforts occasioned—of families converted from sociality into strife—of husbands driven to despair, and running away and leaving their families on the parish—of numbers, through this fatal propensity, being driven to mad-houses, and of many suicides committed. The Ordinary of Newgate stated, that, by the confessions of individual criminals, a large proportion of them traced their ill fate to practices in the Lottery. Merchants' clerks and young men of decent habits were seduced frequently into acts of dishonesty, and ruined by it. It was not enough to ascribe the evils to the former insurances: they still continued, from the temptation and seductions to buy shares. Not only other poorer classes, but private soldiers were drawn in and ruined. The nature of these allurements might be seen in the advertisements in the newspapers, which contained the strongest moral poison, and the most diabolical arts to seduce even boys.—Part of some of these he read.—Under the title of Christmas boxes, one of them stated, that a careful lad had not spent his money in amusements, but ventured in the lottery by buying two sixteenths; that thereby he got a capital prize, and had become an opulent merchant in London. Another said, that a poor public-house lad had gained 1,200*l.*, and was living in retirement; but that now 2,500*l.* might be acquired for a similar chance. Another stated, that the milk-woman had come in for a little of the cream of the lottery by a sixteenth share of a prize of 20,000*l.* Another scheme was addressed to the soldiers, respecting a supplementary lottery; and they were told, that officers had got 2,500*l.* and 3000*l.*, and privates 600*l.* The Chancellor of the Exchequer might laugh at all this, and treat the opinions of others con-temptuously. Knowing the private virtues of that right hon. gentleman, he must say, that his conduct excited his astonishment. He could not exactly tell what to make of the seeming incongruity of the right hon. gentleman's appearance on one day, taking the lead in a Bible Society, and on another, meeting a set of Lottery contractors. The matter seemed unaccountable. He wished the right hon. gentleman to listen to what he said. It would be good for persons holding high stations, which gave them so much influence over the condition of their fellow-creatures, to see personally the miseries of others. If the right hon. gentleman entered the poor-houses, he would see the numbers of miserable, diseased, and squalid objects: in the mad-houses he would see the agonizing wretches; and in dungeons he would find honest unfortunate individuals, of whom a great part had been led to wretchedness through the temptation of lotteries. Many, after spending all they had of their own, and all they could borrow, became at last victims to public justice. These results had been proved. Could the right honourable gentleman see these things, it was not in his nature for him to persevere. It was to be hoped that the House would redeem its character. The restrictions on the lottery were quite insufficient. It was easy to understand that there might exist great evils which could not be suppressed. In natural vices we could only correct, but in the lottery we created the vice, which might, as was said, be less now than formerly, though he (Sir S. R.) thought the evil increased; and that, if it should appear less this year, it might arise only from want of means in the public. He should not, however, be surprised if the lottery trade increased, for distressed persons were led to sacrifice what remained to them by vain hopes. He could have nothing new to offer in objection to lotteries: the evils were well known; and he could only repeat objections formerly stated. He trusted his hon. friend would persevere. If he did not, he (Sir S. R.) would; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer should hear all the objections re-stated, whenever he proposed a measure so injurious to the best interests of the country.

Mr. J. W. Ward observed, that it was a serious question how to supply the sum of 500,000*l.* to the revenue, if it were deducted by refusing the lottery. In balancing the evils, it might appear better to continue the system at present than to impose 500,000*l.* of fresh taxes. He was ready, however, to admit that a lottery, as an ordinary resource, was a shameful one for a moral and religious nation. It was injurious to the principles and practice of industry and economy. By approving the Saving Banks, Parliament told the people to be industrious and frugal; but, through the lottery contractors, they told them to come and buy a sixteenth, to sell their clothes, and their little all, and try the chance of becoming rich, and thus be drunk and lazy all the rest of their lives. (Hear.) This was really the spirit of the language. It reminded one of the choice of Hercules. Vice and virtue were both represented. The people were asked for two things quite contrary to each other. He could wish that the end of lotteries was looked to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and thought that their abolition would be found a necessary boon to the honour and morality of the Legislature and the country.

Mr. Wilberforce said, the arguments used for the lottery might be brought to justify any other practices; such as the farming of the public stewards, by which perhaps 500,000*l.* might be obtained. It was surprising to hear virtue praised and recommended, and wickedness allowed and encouraged at the same time; or to hear of the taking a profitable patronage of vice. It was high time to put an end to a system which had so long been a disgrace to Parliament, and tended to the ruin of the country. The lottery annually sowed the seeds of the gambling principle. It was most unjustly called a voluntary contribution. Voluntary! From persons who, in this gambling, were leading themselves perhaps to the gallows! Every real friend the man had in the world was looking at him with concern, and all his dearest relatives and connexions trying, in vain probably, to dissuade him from it: but the poor unfortunate creature was seduced to his ruin; and this was called his voluntary contribution! After the attacks made upon it, it was impossible this system could remain, for it could not be justified. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, his hon. friend with his eloquence, might paint a sad picture of the misery and crimes resulting from revenue drawn from various articles of consumption, not only from lotteries, but such as the sale of intoxicating spirits. How would the principle operate if pushed to extremes? He might call the attention of the House to the cases of drunken frenzy, in which his moral mind and ingenuity would excite their feelings; but they must take a larger view, they must see whether the country could afford the loss of revenue. If the lottery was a malum in se, then the House should be decisive; but if its evils were only to be traced in its effects, he must compare the quantum of good with the quantum of evil, and not be governed merely by feeling. He should like to hear whether the eloquent and astute hon. gentlemen, who would thus abandon one kind of revenue, were ready to substitute corresponding taxes: if such were proposed, the House would hear injurious representations of their hardship and inquisitorial tendency. He readily admitted, that many evils resulted from the effects of lotteries to individuals; but he considered many of the attacks on the system as extreme exaggerations. Lotteries had been common to all countries, and we were not yet so very much wiser or more virtuous than others, as to lay them aside on mere speculative grounds. He did not wish to look at a lottery as a permanent source, and should be gratified to take away all taxation of a doubtful character; but if the House listened to the arguments of gentlemen, and deprived the country of 500,000*l.* of revenue, they would find as many criticisms on any substitutes that could be proposed; and thus they might shake the system of our finances to its very foundation. He concluded by moving the previous question.

Lord A. Hamilton commented on the noble lord's distinction between things evil in themselves and evil in their effects. If our finances were in such a distressed state under the noble lord's and his colleagues' auspices, their conduct must have occasioned it. When millions were squandered away without inquiry, it did not occur to the noble lord that the day would come when he would be compelled to sell the character of the House and the comfort of the country for 500,000*l.* from the lottery.

Mr. Morland believed, that if we abolished lotteries, other countries would be found to follow our example. The mischiefs of lotteries in Paris were greater even than here. An author had stated, that an official person told him that in Paris the lottery had occasioned 100 suicides in one year. A lottery was now set up in Spain, on what was called the English principle. The Spanish King looked to this country, not to copy toleration or trial by jury, but pitched upon our lottery as an example to follow. (Hear, hear.) He had seen lottery invitations stuck up in little villages, directing applications to the postmasters in the neighbourhood. At this moment, pending the assizes, the proclamation against vice and immorality was read at the same time that the King's postmaster was seducing the people to gambling.

Mr. Thompson thought lotteries injurious to the revenue. Even Mr. Bish said, that the six lotteries outran the public, and gave them no time to breathe, though they kept them in perpetual expectation. Mr. Hale had given strong facts of the distresses from the lotteries in Spitalfields. There were no such things as fair lotteries; they were frauds and cheats, which destroyed the moral bonds and ties of society. The Report of the Committee of 1803 gave full information on the subject.

Mr. Bennet alluded to the case of two sisters whom he had seen in the House of Correction or perjury, and who, he had no doubt, had seen the cause of much mischief to many innocent persons.

Mr. Lyttelton briefly replied. He denied both the moral principle and policy of lotteries, which tended to dry up the springs of industry. If the 500,000*l.* must be had, he had rather it should be procured by borrowing than by swindling.

A division then took place, when the numbers were—

For the motion, 26; Against it, 73; Majority, 47.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Abercromby, Hon. J.	Guise, Sir Wm.
Calcraft, J.	Thomson, Thos
Grenfell, P.	Plunkett, Right Hon.
Lambton, J.	W. C.
Barinz, Sir T.	Webb, Thos.
Hamilton, Lord A.	Butterworth, Jos.
Barnet, J.	Babington, Thos.
Brougham, H.	Ponsonby, Rt. Hon. G.
Monck, Sir C.	Pennet, Hon. H. G.
Phillimore, Jos.	Gipps —
Martin, J.	Macdonald, J.
Bernard, S. M.	Upton, Hon. G.
Sharp, Rd.	Rashleigh, C.
Wilderforce, Wm.
TELLERS—Romilly, Sir S.—Lyttelton, Hon. Wm.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, March 19.

Witnesses were examined on Bayley's Divorce Bill; and, on the motion of Lord Rolle, the evidence was ordered to be printed, and taken into further consideration on Tuesday next.

The Mutiny Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, March 19.

NEW STREET BILL.] Mr. Huskisson brought in the New Street Bill, which was read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday next.

DUTIES ON RICE.] Mr. Lushington presented an account of the duties on rice imported for the year ending the 1st of January, 1817; and remarked, that as some misapprehension had gone abroad with respect to the continuance of the suspension of those duties, it might be proper to state, that the suspension, as applied to America, would cease on the 5th of April, 1818, and as applied to the East Indies, at the end of the year 1818.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS.] Lord Binning moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill, to provide for the establishment of Lunatic Asylums in Scotland. It was proposed to extend the advantages of the bill introduced by his right hon. friend (Mr. Rose) to that part of the country; and it would be recollected, that that measure was founded upon the Report of a Committee detailing instances of inhumanity and suffering, on which it must always be painful, and was now unnecessary, to dwell. It was the duty of the House, however, always to bear them in mind, so far as to guard effectually against their recurrence.

The question was then put, and carried.

WELSH JUDGES.] Mr. Ponsonby gave notice, that on the 22nd of April next, he should move for leave to bring in a bill to extend the provisions of the Act of Anne, incapacitating certain officers to sit in that House, to every person holding the situation of a Welsh Judge.

SOUTH AMERICA.] Mr. Brougham rose, in pursuance of notice, to call the attention of the House to the present state of the Spanish and Portuguese governments in South America. The facts which he had heard were these:—About eight months ago an expedition had been sent from Rio-Janeiro to Monte-Video; part of the troops went by land, and part by sea: and, when they joined, they took up a strong position against that city. When the last accounts came away, they were either actually besieging it, or threatening to commence the attack. He had heard, that the Spanish Government had agreed to cede Monte-Video to Portugal, in exchange for Olivenza. Now, he maintained, that Monte-Video did not belong to Spain, but to the independent party; or, as they were sometimes improperly called, the revolted provinces, which had conquered it before the restoration of Ferdinand; and therefore Ferdinand could have no right to dispose of it. Be this as it may, a force of 10,000 Portuguese troops were now under the walls of the place. For the success of the independent part of South America almost all men were now putting up their prayers; but it could hardly be supposed that this expedition was going on against Monte-Video without the sanction of the Spanish Government. This was of the more importance, as the convention between Spain and Portugal was said to have been executed with the connivance of our agents, and that Lord Beresford was generalissimo of the Portuguese army when that expedition sailed. If these facts were true, it was extraordinary that no notice had been taken in the House of this expedition; but, he trusted, that Ministers would be able to give a satisfactory explanation to the country, as to the conduct of our agents, civil and military; and nothing would be more gratifying than to hear, that this country had not, by its agents, been piivy to this convention. He should therefore move, "That an humble address be presented to the Prince Regent, praying that there be laid before the House, copies of any treaties or conventions relative to the cession of Monte-Video to Portugal; and of any correspondence respecting the same, so far as such correspondence could be communicated without injury to the public service."

Lord Castlereagh said, that this Government was in no degree party to any foreign treaty on this subject; but had remained quite neutral. As to Marshal Beresford, his duties ought not to be confounded with those of a British officer. While he was in the service of the Crown of Portugal, he must not be considered as acting for this country. He should consider it a great breach of duty on the part of that gallant officer, while he was acting in the Portuguese service, if he were to communicate their intentions to this Government. However, if we considered the relations between Spain and Portugal, it was not probable that any such treaty could have been made; but, whether this were to be regarded as a South American question, or as one relating to Europe, he should deprecate the discussion in its present shape; and could not think it consistent with his public duty to lay any documents before the House.

Mr. Brougham believed, that, as between the Courts of Lisbon and Madrid, there might be no such treaty; but he meant, that such a treaty had been entered into between the Courts of Madrid and Rio Janeiro.

Lord Castlereagh observed again, that it was not probable any such treaty had been made.

Mr. Brougham was glad to hear that nothing had been done, either directly or indirectly, on the part of this Government, relative to this convention; but what the noble lord had said as to Lord Beresford ought to apply to all other officers. If our officers acting in the service of Old Spain were not to be blamed, he should wish to know, whether officers serving in the revolted provinces, as they were called, were to be blamed? Was it not true, that up to the embarkation of these 10,000 men, Lord Beresford was actively engaged in their organization?

Mr. Lamb said, if a British officer of his distinction had acted in this manner, he must be supposed to have acted in conjunction with the Government.

Lord Castlereagh replied, that, according to the general law of nations, Lord Beresford must be considered as acting in the service of the Crown of Portugal, and was not at liberty to disclose their operations to any other power.

Mr. Ponsonby then asked, whether it were true, that this Government had interfered with the United States, as to the conduct which its citizens ought to pursue towards the Spanish provinces?

Lord Castlereagh said, the measures adopted by North America had been taken solely and exclusively upon her own views, without any communication with his Majesty's Ministers.

Mr. Ponsonby then called the attention of the House to a Treaty signed at Madrid in July 1814, between his Britannic Majesty and Ferdinand VII., in the third article of which it was stated; that "his Britannic Majesty being anxious that the disturbances existing in the Spanish Colonies should cease, and that the subjects should return to their obedience to their lawful Sovereign, engaged to prevent his subjects from furnishing any arms to these rebellious Colonies." Now, if the neutrality was strict, where was the use of this article? If a neutrality was at all stipulated, justice required that that neutrality should be impartially and faithfully observed, and if we, as this article obviously implied, gave, as we did there by our engagement, such encouragement to Spain to persevere in the war with her colonies, he was at a loss to see where was the strictness and impartiality of this neutrality. To tell one that they shall succeed, and to tell the other that they must fail, was not neutrality.

He observed that this Treaty had been signed by Sir H. Wellesley, and he hereby gave notice of his intention on the 23d of April to move for copies of all instructions sent to Sir H. Wellesley, and on which he acted in that Treaty.

Lord Castlereagh was astonished the right hon. gentleman had not noticed this article sooner, as it had lain on the table for above two years. All that was meant by neutrality was, that no force should be used by us on either side, and the object of that article was to express a wish to see unity restored.

Mr. Ponsonby did not know of the existence of this treaty till a day or two ago, as it had never been noticed in the House as other treaties were, by addresses and other measures on it; but this did not prevent the question being as open as if the House had only been told of the treaty being yesterday brought down.

Mr. Brougham said, that the 2d article was equally worthy of notice, in which his Catholic Majesty, aware of the inhumanity and injustice of the Slave Trade, declared he should consider it with due deliberation. But how had that article been fulfilled? Since that, 20,000 slaves had been imported into Cuba, and 40,000 into the dominions of his Portuguese Majesty. He wished to know whether any correspondence had taken place on this article, so important as it was in every point of view to the friends of truth, justice, and humanity, whose anxious wish was that every where that infamous and execrable traffic should be abolished, and no traces of it left on the face of the globe?

Lord Castlereagh could not give any final answer, as the negotiations were still pending.

Here the conversation dropped, and Mr. Brougham withdrew his motion.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, March 20.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS.] The order of the day for the second reading of the Seditious Meetings Bill being read,

Lord Sidmouth rose.—It was not his intention to detain the House long, as he understood that any objections that might be made would go rather to some of the provisions of the bill than to its principle. Since the outrage against the Prince Regent, and the Report of their lordships' Committee, three bills had passed the Legislature—one for giving his Royal Highness the same protection as his Majesty had, and rendering the provisions of a former Act perpetual as to both; another to punish, with greater severity than before, any attempt to seduce soldiers and sailors from their allegiance; and a third, for detaining in custody certain persons suspected of being concerned in treasonable practices. With respect to the first of these acts, it would have been wise and proper to pass it, though the circumstances which had occasioned the passing of the other had not existed. The third bill was founded on the information which the Executive Government had laid before their lordships' Committee; and on which the Committee had reported, that there existed a traitorous conspiracy for the subversion, by means of a general insurrection, of the Government, laws, and Constitution, of this kingdom; and the Committee, at the close of the Report, states, that farther provisions are necessary for the preservation of the public peace. What were the circumstances that led the Committee to that conclusion? They must have been such as convinced the Committee that the existing laws were not sufficient to meet the evil, chiefly because, under the law as it stood, it was in the power of a few persons to bring together, without the sanction of any recognized authority, in the neighbourhood of great towns where distress and discontent prevailed, the turbulent and the factious of every description, to consider and discuss the state of the country. But it did not depend merely on the statement of the Committee, for it was notorious, that at meetings so called, ill-disposed persons took the opportunity, with such dexterity as to evade the law, of inflaming the minds of the people, and leading them from discontent to sedition. This was the danger which the Committee had in contemplation when it stated that further provisions were necessary; and it was principally from the consideration of that evil that the present bill was introduced. The bill was formed upon the plan, and made up chiefly of the provisions, of the Seditious Meetings Acts of the 36th and 39th of the King. His lordship then stated generally, the objects to which the bill was intended to apply, which are already before the public; and stated, that one part of the act was meant to be temporary, while another part, relating, as we understood, to debating clubs or lecture rooms, was intended to be permanent. All public meetings, except called upon notice by the authority of seven householders, or other proper authority, and all adjourned public meetings, were declared to be unlawful. There were clauses subjecting the hundred to the charge of indemnifying persons injured by the destruction of their houses by persons attending such meetings. Property, however, had been taken out of dwelling-houses on such occasions, when it was difficult to prove that there was an intention to destroy the house itself; and there was now, therefore, a clause making the hundred liable for damages when the property was taken out of the house, though there had been no attempt to injure the house itself. These, however, were matters which would be more properly considered in the Committee. The question at present was, whether, contemplating the present state of the country, any provisions in addition to the existing law were necessary. It could not be contended, he imagined, that the law as it stood was sufficient to meet the evil. A noble earl had on a former occasion said, that certain provisions in the act of the 36th of the King were sufficient for the purpose; it was natural for the noble earl to think that these provisions were permanent; but the fact was, that they had expired in 1802. Their lordships would therefore, he trusted, agree with the Committee in the proposition stated at the close of the Report, that such a state of things could not be suffered to continue without hazarding the most imminent dangers and most dreadful evils. Such at least, he hoped, was the opinion of the great majority of their lordships: and he trusted they not only thought that such a state of things ought not to exist, but determined that it should not exist. He moved that the bill be read a second time.

Earl Grosvenor did not know what had led the noble secretary to conclude, that there was no difference of opinion as to the principle of the bill, as he had distinctly intimated his objections to it. He had considerable objections to all the clauses of it, except one, which was very like an objection to the principle. However, he would reserve what he had to say upon the principle of the measure till the third reading, when he should have an opportunity of seeing the bill as it came out of the Committee. In the mean time he could not but state, that he saw no necessity for joining the temporary and permanent provisions in one bill. It was an awkward manner of legislating, and might produce legal difficulties as to the construction of the act. He saw no reason why the bill should not be divided, and would move an instruction to the Committee for that purpose. He could not agree with the noble secretary, that the law as it stood was not sufficient to meet the evil. He had, on the contrary, always said, that he thought the existing law powerful enough, if properly applied, to answer the purpose; or at least that nothing more was necessary than to strengthen it. He and the noble secretary differed widely in their views, both of the danger and the remedy. He conceived that all they were doing was wrong; and that the measures they were adopting were likely to create the danger against which they were intended to guard, to engender a spirit of disaffection where it did not before exist, and to embody resentment where none was before felt.

Lord Holland hoped, that no advantage would be taken of their not having discussed the principle now. There were one or two clauses in which he concurred. He concurred in that clause which, generally speaking, went to give greater weight to public meetings, and likewise in that which went to prevent improper meetings. Of the rest of the bill he disapproved; and it ought to be observed, that they had now, in about three weeks, made more alterations in the law, with reference to the present difficulties, than Mr. Pitt's administration had done in six months, in a period of greater alarm. The Ministers had swept together every thing that had been passed in moments of difficulty, and re-enacted them in a heap, making some of the provisions permanent. He concurred with his noble friend, that what was temporary ought to be separated from what was permanent. These provisions were distinct in their nature, and ought to be included in separate bills.

Lord Erskine.—It was to be understood that they were to be as free in debating the principle on the third reading, as if they were to debate it now.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that from the nature of the bill, it would be much more expedient to debate the principle on the third reading, after the bill should have passed the Committee.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed to-morrow.

Earl Grosvenor then moved, that the Committee be instructed to divide the bill.

The Earl of Liverpool could not concur in that motion. If, indeed, any such legal difficulties as the noble earl had alluded to should arise from that which was temporary being included in the same bill with that which was permanent, then certainly it would be proper to divide the bill; but he could not conceive how any such difficulties could arise; the temporary and the permanent provisions being both distinctly stated. It was also desirable that the bill should proceed with all reasonable dispatch.

Lord Holland thought that the bill ought to be divided, as it was a confused and awkward mode of legislating to unite temporary and permanent provisions in the same bill: and he was happy that the motion was made, as it would at least appear on the journals, that there was one peer who had objected to that course.

The motion was negatived without a division.

SLAVE TRADE.] Lord Grenville rose to call the attention of the House to a subject which had been under its consideration last session: he alluded to the subject of the abolition of the slave trade and the registry of slaves. He had then stated to their lordships the reasons which induced him to refrain from pressing any specific measure to be adopted by the Imperial Parliament with respect to the registration of slaves in the colonies. The reasons were, that he had been informed that it was probable that the local legislatures would adopt such measures as would answer the purpose. He had last year stated his intention of bringing the subject at the earliest opportunity before their lordships in the present session. The reason why he had not done so was, that he understood that the local legislatures had, in fact, had such measures under discussion; and that in the principal colony, an act had been actually passed for the object which he had mentioned. He never could admit, as he had often before stated, that by any act of the Crown a million of British subjects should be withdrawn from the control of Parliament; but at the same time he had admitted, that if the local legislatures would adopt such measures as would effectually accomplish the great object in view, it was much better that this should be done by them than by others. He hoped that his noble friend (Earl Bathurst) would now state what had been done by the local legislatures on this important and interesting subject. He wished to know, 1st, Whether there had been any discussion by the legislature of Jamaica, and by those of the other colonies, on the subject in question? 2d, Whether any bills had been passed; and if passed, whether any of them had been received by the Ministers of the Crown?

Earl Bathurst stated, that when the subject had been discussed in that House, a letter had been addressed to the Governors of the several West India islands, with instructions to make the proper communications to the assemblies, and persuade them to adopt such measures as were best calculated to accomplish the object in view. He was now able to state to their lordships, that intelligence had been received, that in Jamaica a bill for the registration of slaves had been passed; and also another bill for giving greater effect to the object of the abolition of the slave traffic; that in Barbadoes an act had been passed for the registration of the slaves; and that in St. Vincent's, and other islands, the subject had been under discussion; and it was expected that all the other legislatures would follow the example of Jamaica and St. Vincent's. The acts which had been passed would as soon as possible be laid on their lordships' table. With respect to the colonial legislatures he must say, that they had evinced every disposition to attend to the wishes of the legislature and public of Great Britain, and to promote the object in view.

Lord Grenville.—The information now communicated by his noble friend afforded him the greatest and most lively satisfaction; and he was more particularly gratified by the assurance now given, that the colonial legislatures had shewn a sincere desire to contribute to the accomplishment of the great object in view. He hoped the bills would without delay be laid on the table, that they might see how far they were calculated to answer the purpose: and, if there were no objection, he would now submit a motion to that effect.

Earl Bathurst did not think it expedient that such a motion should be made; and perhaps here might be some difficulty in framing a proper one for the purpose; but it was his intention before Easter to lay the acts on the table.

Lord Grenville said he was satisfied, and the conversation ended.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, March 20.

NEW CHURCHES.] Mr. Gipps rose to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether it was his intention, in pursuance of an intimation which he had given last session, to submit any measure to Parliament for the erection of additional churches?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that if he abstained from bringing forward any such measure this session, it would not be from diminished sense of the importance of providing places of worship for the increasing population of the country, but on account of the existing state of our finances.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Brougham presented a petition from the ward of Bishops-gate, praying for Reform in Parliament. He observed, that it had been frequently objected by some gentlemen in the House, that many of the petitions on this subject had been drawn up by others; and, therefore, could not be supposed to speak the real sentiments of the petitioners. He desired to protest against this doctrine; and, if it were thought that he was mistaken, let gentlemen accept the challenge of sending down petitions against Reform and see what number of signatures they could obtain. Mr. Pitt and the late Duke of Richmond were both reformers though certainly the one had carried his view of the elective franchise much farther than the other, he believed that both had been very active, through their agents, in sending down petitions and procuring signatures to them. The practice, he thought, was wrong; but it afforded no proof of the want of sincerity or judgment in the petitioners.

Mr. Banks said, that he had been in the habits of intimacy with Mr. Pitt, and supported his measures of Reform; but Mr. Pitt had never maintained the doctrine of Universal Suffrage, nor been a party to the manufacturing of petitions.

Mr. Brougham explained. Either the hon. gentleman must have greatly misconceived what he had stated, or he was not in the House at the time. He had particularly mentioned that Mr. Pitt did not go all the lengths of the Duke of Richmond as to Universal Suffrage; but it was curious, when the reformers were twitted and taunted with being enemies to their country, or Jacobins, it was studiously kept out of sight, that Mr. Pitt was a most strenuous and active reformer. He had only to refer them to the correspondence of the Rev. Mr. Wyvill, to see the notes that had passed between Mr. Pitt and the active reformers of that day. In the case of the King v. Frost, who was a respectable attorney, but certainly not of equal consequence with Mr. Pitt, it was proved, that Mr. Pitt had addressed him as one of his best friends, on no other account than that of his active co-operation on the subject of Reform.

Mr. Ward begged to state, that it was never denied by the opposers of Reform, that Mr. Pitt was a friend to that measure. The only difference was, that when others appealed to the early authority of Mr. Pitt, they appealed to his more matured opinions, formed after the experience of the French revolution. With respect to manufacturing petitions, it could not be denied that the House, knowing that they were not the voluntary opinions of those who subscribed them, did not treat them with so much respect as they would otherwise do. If a shop was opened for patriotism, the House must view it with a suspicious eye.

Lord A. Hamilton said, after his hon. friend had voted two or three times in favour of Parliamentary Reform, it peculiarly became him to be the apologist for Mr. Pitt's change of opinions. While he was on his legs, he begged to say, that as to the statement made the other evening of a petition from Dumfriesshire having been signed by children, he had that day received a letter from a very respectable gentleman on the spot, who directly contradicted that statement. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Sharpe said, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ward) had, in his mind, misrepresented the nature of Mr. Pitt's support to the cause of Parliamentary Reform. He could assure that hon. gentleman, that so late as the Irish Union, Mr. Pitt, in the arrangement of the representation of that part of the United Kingdom, had taken the utmost pains to secure to the people the power of electing 60 out of the 100 members who were to be returned to Parliament (Hear.)

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 21.

The Royal assent was given by commission to the Mutiny Bill, and several other bills: Commissioners, the Lord Chancellor, Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Redesdale.

The Court of Exchequer Proceedings Bill, and the Mad-houses Bill, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

SCOTCH PRIVATE BILLS.] The Duke of Athol, pursuant to notice, moved an alteration in the order, 158, relative to proceedings with respect to private bills. Certain monies directed to be paid under that order were, as it stood at present, to be paid into the Royal Bank, or Bank of Scotland. The alteration consisted in this—that to these banks be added the bank of the British Linen company in Scotland.

The motion was agreed to, and the addition made accordingly.

SEDITIONOUS MEETINGS BILL.] The House having gone into a Committee on this Bill,

Lord Grenville, with reference to the clauses for punishing with death the unlawful assembling and not dispersing when commanded, observed, that when the subject of the penalty of death had been, on a former occasion, under consideration, there had been an understanding that it ought never to be enacted merely by referring to the provisions of another act; but that it should be clearly and distinctly expressed in every act by which it was imposed. With some little alteration in these clauses, they would be clear of that objection. It was remarkable, however, that there was no power distinctly given to make proclamation, and an addition must be made in these respects.

Lord Holland.—If the punishment of death were to be retained at all, certainly the amendment was a proper one. From page 4 to page 8, these clauses related to unlawful assemblies. Now, these unlawful assemblies were of three sorts: 1st, where there was an assembly without any authority; 2d, where there was an assembly lawfully convened, but for an unlawful purpose; 3d, where the assembly was lawfully convened, and for a lawful purpose; but where something illegal arose in the course of the proceedings. Now with respect to the clause relative to unlawful assembling, he thought it extremely harsh that persons should suffer as felons, without benefit of clergy, for the mere act of not going away upon proclamation made. The words were taken from the riot act; but there the penalty was incurred, not for merely remaining after the act was read, but remaining riotously and tumultuously. The riot act had never been considered as one of a very lenient description, but this went a great deal farther; for it rendered the persons remaining liable to the punishment of death for the mere act of remaining, whether riotously or peaceably. There would be disobedience in remaining to be sure, but the punishment of death was infinitely too severe for the offence. He would, therefore, move for the leaving out the words, "enacting the punishment of death," for the purpose of substituting imprisonment, or seven years' transportation.

Lord St. John.—Under the clause as it stood, if the clerk of the peace neglected to give notice to the justices, the assembly, though notice had been given to the clerk of the peace, would be an unlawful assembly, and the persons not dispersing on proclamation would be liable to the punishment of death. This was infinitely too severe. The clause under consideration was liable to this objection also—that the authority to proclaim, and thus render the persons not dispersing subject to the punishment of death, ought not to be confided to one justice only. The riot act stood on a different ground, for there the punishment was imposed only in case of violent resistance to the law. Here it was imposed for mere passive disobedience; and it ought not to be in the power of one magistrate alone to subject the persons not dispersing to so heavy a penalty. A pauper could not be passed from one parish to another without the order of two magistrates; and the whole magistracy of the county must assemble in other cases before a man was to be put on trial for his life. The magistrates were certainly a most respectable class of persons, but still the law had put guards upon them in the cases which he had mentioned. Here the authority of two justices at least ought to be required. When one magistrate went to a meeting of this sort, heated perhaps by opposition, and influenced by political or other partialities, to which the best of men were liable, he might expose persons to the punishment of death in a hasty manner; his mind and judgment not going along with the act. The punishment of death was, besides, in itself too severe for the offence; and where the punishment infinitely exceeded the nature of the crime, it was seldom inflicted, and generally became no punishment at all. He concurred therefore in the proposed amendment to leave out the penalty of death.

The Lord Chancellor.—The clause was misunderstood; for if notice were given by an advertisement, or by communication to the clerk of the peace, the assembly would be lawful, though the clerk of the peace might be indictable for not giving notice to the magistrate. The assembly, however, would be lawful, and the magistrate would have no authority to proceed to disperse, unless something illegal took place at the meeting. With respect to the penalty of death, under the present circumstances of the country, he thought that even in this clause it was a proper enactment. It was well known, that consequences of a dangerous nature had arisen from such meetings, and the well-disposed ought, for a time, to have the protection of this enactment.

Lord St. John still contended, that the clause, as it stood, was liable to the construction which he had put upon it.

The Earl of Liverpool conceived, that there could be no doubt, that the true construction was as the noble and learned lord had stated.

The Earls of Rosslyn and Lauderdale concurred with Lord St. John.

Lord Ellenborough had no doubt as to the construction which a court of justice would put on the words; yet, in majori cautela, he would have no objection to some words to put the matter beyond dispute.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that though he had been supposed to be given to doubt, he had no doubt whatever that the construction mentioned by the noble lord (St. John) was wrong.

The Earl of Lauderdale and Lord St. John proposed some words to render the construction clear, which were introduced into the clause.

Lord Grenville then proposed his amendment, which was also adopted.

Lord St. John proposed an amendment, that the proclamation to disperse must be made by the authority of two justices, at least.

The Earl of Liverpool thought, that the amendment was altogether unnecessary in this part of the bill, which related to the mere act of assembling without authority. That was a fact which one magistrate was as competent to decide upon as two could be. He did not think that the amendment would be proper with respect to the other clauses; but, certainly, here there was no occasion for it, where all that was to be done was to decide on a mere matter of fact.

The amendment was negatived.

Lord Holland moved his amendment, that the words "imposing the punishment of death," should be left out.

Lord Grenville.—If the act, in respect of which the punishment of death was imposed, had been the mere circumstance of going to an unlawful meeting, as his noble friend seemed to imagine, he admitted, that the punishment would be too severe: but it was not the going to the meeting, but the refusing to disperse, when commanded, that rendered the persons so disobeying liable to the punishment of death.

Lord Holland was perfectly aware that the act by which the penalty was incurred was the not dispersing when commanded: but he repeated what he had before said, that the punishment was infinitely too severe for the mere act of peaceably remaining. In the case of the riot act, the penalty was incurred, not by the mere act of remaining: but by that of remaining riotously and tumultuously, and to the disturbance of the public peace. He thought the punishment of death too severe for any of the offences described in these clauses: but here it was glaringly disproportionate to the crime. It was not analogous to the punishments imposed in other cases. A smuggler unarmed might, without incurring this penalty, do acts which, if done by an armed smuggler, would render him liable to this punishment.

The Lord Chancellor said, there was a distinction certainly between an unlawful assembly and a riotous or routous assembly; but, under the present circumstances, the punishment of death ought to be here retained.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

Some discussions arose about making proclamation with a loud voice, and these words were objected to; but the Lord Chancellor and Lord Ellenborough contended that they ought to be retained; observing, that the persons at the meeting ought, if possible, to hear the command to disperse. The words were retained.

Lord Erskine rose on the clause relative to the holding of any meeting, the notice for which should purport that any matter or thing by law established may be altered otherwise than by the authority of King, Lords, and Commons, in Parliament assembled; or where any thing was propounded that might tend to incite or stir up the people to hatred or contempt of his Majesty, his heirs, or successors, or of the Government and Constitution of the realm, as by law established. He considered this clause as involving two offences of different descriptions. The first which was contained in the notice was punishable as libel on its publication; and with respect to both, to give any justice of the peace the power of determining what is or is not libel. This was a greater power than was given to any judge. It was true, also, with regard to the second branch of the clause, that whatever had a tendency to excite hatred and contempt of his Majesty, his heirs, or successors, was a libel, and punishable by law: but to say when words spoken, or a paper published, may or may not have that tendency, was not left to his noble friend who presided in the Court of King's Bench. It was indeed his duty to state his opinion, as to their being a libel or not; but it was for the Jury finally to decide. If at a meeting it was proposed to alter any thing, otherwise than by the consent of the King, Lords, and Commons, that was a matter of fact of which any magistrate could judge; and the sooner such a meeting was dispersed the better; but whether certain words might have a tendency to incite to hatred and contempt, was matter of opinion; and as the final decision on questions of opinion was not left to judges, it would thus be in the power of a single justice to construe words which might relate merely to the defects in the representation of the other House of Parliament into libel, and to exercise an arbitrary power of punishment. Under such authority no meetings could be safely held except Quaker meetings. No man reprobated more than he did those violent attacks which had been made in certain assemblies on the character of Parliament. He condemned them, both on account of their violence, and of their tendency to place at fearful distance all due consideration of that most serious and important question, Reform. With regard to the wording of the clause, it was absurd to suppose that such a notice could be given for a meeting as to alter any thing otherwise than by the consent of King, Lords, and Commons. Did any person ever hear of such a notice? That where there was disease it was right to apply a cure he was ready to admit; but here the cure was unnecessary, as a remedy was already provided by the due course of law.

Lord Holland objected to the clause on the ground of its inconsistency. It was a libel on the Government of the country to suppose that crimes went unpunished, which it was to be presumed was the case from the wording of this clause. If such a notice as that contemplated in the clause were given, it would be the duty of his Majesty's Government to order a prosecution. Another very serious consideration was, that persons might assemble under a notice, which having passed through all the regular forms required by the law, might appear to them legal, yet those persons thus assembled would be liable to the same punishment as those who framed the notice.

Lord Grenville could not but admit that two very distinct things were mixed up in this clause; but he by no means thought the giving of a notice of the description in question so very improbable a case as his noble friends had supposed. If he was not deceived, he had in his time seen a convention sitting in this country under a notice which had for its object to alter things established by law, otherwise than by the consent of King, Lords, and Commons. He, therefore thought that means should be adopted to counteract notices of the kind referred to in the clause. At the same time he thought it right, that an assembly, which might be so called together, should not be misled as to their situation. With a view to the precautionary purposes of the bill before their lordships, it was a fair question whether it might not be proper to legalize notices which would otherwise be illegal; but, then, it would be proper to provide, that the persons giving such notice should still be liable to be proceeded against by due course of law. On the other hand, the situation of persons who might be misled under the sanction which the law gave, ought not to be overlooked; and it were to be wished that some mode should be devised of cautioning people against attending such illegal assemblies. He had considered this subject, but had not discovered any mode of attaining the object he had stated which was satisfactory to his own mind.

Lord Ellenborough was of opinion, that the authority given to a single justice of the peace was not of the nature his noble and learned friend had described it to be. It did not constitute the magistrate a judge of libel, nor invest him with a power of punishment. It only gave him the power of dispersing the meeting; whether what had been spoken or published was libellous, was a question to be afterwards determined. Under the circumstances of the case some power must be given; and what less power could be given in a crisis of urgency and probable mischief, than that of dispersing a meeting from which danger might be apprehended?

The Earl of Lauderdale objected to the clause. It implied, on the face of it, that the existing laws were not executed; and if the bill passed in its present form, it would amount to a declaration that the Legislature suspected that the magistrates of the country did not do their duty.

The Lord Chancellor did not conceive the clause to be liable to the objections which had been urged against it. If, however, any words could be suggested to make it clearer, or to remove the scruples of the noble lords who had spoken on the subject, either by a provision for making the persons who issued the notice liable to be prosecuted by a due course at law, which they certainly were as the clause now stood; or for preventing persons from being so far misled, as to assemble under the notice, or for both of those objects, such alteration might be made by way of rider, on the third reading of the bill. With respect to the possibility of a notice of the nature referred to in the clause, he agreed with the noble baron who spoke last but one, that it was not so very improbable an occurrence as some noble lords had supposed. Indeed, he had seen a notice for a meeting, in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, previous to the 2d of December, which was of a highly blameable nature. It was true, as his noble and learned friend had said, that the notice might be made the subject of prosecution on its being issued, and the persons signing it brought to punishment; but in the mean time the meeting would be held. Before even instructions could be given to an attorney to proceed, all the mischief, which it was the object of the clause to prevent, might be completed. No more power, then, was therefore given than was absolutely necessary at a time like the present, when wicked and artful men were seeking, by speeches and publications, to undermine the principles of the people; because they knew that, unless they succeeded in shaking the morality and religion of the country, and banishing the best feelings which glowed in British hearts, they could not hope to overthrow the Constitution. With regard to the act for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, which a noble lord opposite had considered as aggravating the enactments of the present bill, he must observe, that that act did not deprive persons of the right of being bailed, except in cases of committal on charges of high treason and treasonable practices. In the present state of things, no precautionary measures had been adopted beyond what was absolutely necessary. If a system was acted upon in the country, tending to make public meetings a means of overturning the Government, the persons having such object in view would laugh at the punishment of their notices by the usual course of law. No feeble measures would do. If their lordships thought it right, that the religion and morality of the country should be destroyed, and the Government disrespected, they would leave the law as it now stood. If, on the contrary, they wished to secure the inestimable blessings the country enjoyed, they would not hesitate to invest the magistrates with the stronger powers proposed to be given by the bill. In so doing, they would only imitate what had often been done by their ancestors, namely, to suspend their liberties for a short time, in order to have the full enjoyment of them for ever after.

Lord Holland did not see how the particular powers given by this clause, and defended by the noble and learned lord (Chancellor), were necessary. He (lord H.) entirely dissented from the clause that gave one magistrate, merely upon his own discretion, authority to disperse a meeting.

Lord Erskine was of the same opinion. When a notice was altogether unexceptionable, the meeting that assembled in the terms of it ought not to be dispersed merely because a magistrate, in his zeal or his ignorance, might think that it entered into discussions which to him might appear dangerous.

Lord Grenville repeated some of his former observations. He wished that the meeting should have notice, that its assembling was illegal. He recommended several verbal alterations to those who took an interest in the progress of the bill. He wished particularly, that it were looked over with the view of ascertaining if the word magistrate was used in different senses when it occurred in different places: and that if so, it should be amended, so as to have one uniform meaning throughout.

The Lord Chancellor promised to give the utmost attention to the suggestions of the noble lord.

The Earl of Lauderdale suggested, that some alteration should be made in the clause that related to the giving of lectures. By the bill as it stood, any person giving lectures on philosophical subjects, without licence, would be liable to a penalty of 20*l.*, and this licence might be refused by the magistrates. In Edinburgh where the magistrates were patrons of the university, and where they might be supposed to view with some jealousy any rival institution for instruction, they might refuse a licence to a lecturer: and, if he proceeded to discuss philosophical subjects afterwards, to give lectures on anatomy, on chymistry, or any other science, both he and his pupils would be subject to the penalties of the act. He would, however, in the present stage propose no amendment.

Lord Holland and Lord Darnley made some similar objections. The latter proposed, as an amendment, that the penalties of the act should not attach, if the meeting dispersed at the command of the magistrate.

Lord Sidmouth answered, that the penalties would not apply till an hour after the order to disperse.

The House then resumed, and the Report of the Committee was ordered to be received on Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, March 21.

The Exchequer Court Bill was read a third time, and passed.

GAME LAWS.] Sir S. Romilly moved the second reading of the Game Law Repeal Bill.

Mr. Banks observed, that as there was another bill before the House, which would obviate the objections complained of by the hon. and learned Member in the Act of last Session, and the committal of which stood for that day se'n night, he should move that the present bill be read a second time on Monday se'n night.

Sir S. Romilly said, that the amendment of the hon. gentleman was one of no small importance, though it might appear, at first sight, of little consequence whether the bill before them was read a second time now, or ten days hence. The object of this bill was to repeal an Act of last Session, which professed to provide a punishment only for such persons as went out to poach at night with arms, and with the intention to make resistance; but, from the manner in which the Act was worded, the penalty extended to those who went out unarmed, with no intention to resist, and who might be found merely with nets, wires, or other instruments for catching game, in their possession. The punishment was transportation for seven years, and it was to do away with that part of the Act that the present bill had been brought in. He should have no objection, however, to abandon it altogether, if the hon. baronet (Sir E. Knatchbull) would press his bill forward, which had been alluded to by the hon. Member who spoke last. But the hon. baronet had declared his intention not to proceed till after the Quarter Sessions, and hence it would be impossible to get it through the other House before the Easter recess. His (Sir S. Romilly's) object was exactly the reverse, and he wished to get his bill forward before the Quarter Sessions throughout the country were terminated. He had no fears as to any thing that might be done under the existing law at the Assizes, because he was certain the Judges, exercising that discretion which was given to them, would not transport any person convicted of merely having nets and wires in his possession at night, but without arms. He was not so sure, however, with regard to the Quarter Sessions, for with every respect for the Magistracy of the country (and he felt the greatest respect for them), it could not be denied that the Game Laws were viewed by Magistrates with a very different kind of feeling. He was much misinformed, indeed, if cases had not already occurred at Quarter Sessions, where persons having no arms, but only nets and wires, had been sentenced to seven years' transportation.—The Act of last Session was most insidiously brought in towards the close, and its existence was hardly known in the country. It had been said, that it received the entire concurrence of his late much lamented friend, Mr. Horner. Any one who knew that most respected and most respectable individual, would bear that assertion with surprise; for among all the eminent qualities he possessed, there was no one more eminent, than his constant and anxious desire to prevent every kind of tyranny and oppression. He happened to know, however, that Mr. Horner strongly objected to the measure, for he told him (Sir S. Romilly) so himself, and he attended with him in the House night after night to oppose its progress: but they were not able, for being mingled with thirty or forty different orders of the day, they found it useless to wait; and at last they ceased, upon its being agreed that an alteration should be introduced into the bill, by the suggestion of his late friend, which made it much less mischievous in its operation. He it was, who first pointed out the monstrous enactment, that any person found at night with arms might be transported by two Magistrates, without any trial by jury. With respect to the subject of the Game Laws generally, he believed their severity tended to multiply crimes, and incite to many acts of cruelty and ferocity. He believed they had a most unfavourable influence upon the character and dispositions, not only of the lower, but the highest orders of society. To that might be traced the constant practice which prevailed of placing spring guns, and other instruments of death upon private grounds, by which dreadful accidents often happened. It had been stated, indeed, in the public prints, as the opinion of an eminent Crown Lawyer, that if any individual were killed by spring guns, steel traps, or similar engines, a charge of murder would lie against the persons who placed them there, or by whose directions they were so placed. He did not say that such would be his opinion, but he certainly thought it would constitute a very aggravated case of manslaughter. He might mention as an instance how the severity of the game laws operated to the production of a crime, the case of some poachers who were apprehended in the North of England. When they were informed that under the Act of last Session they would be transported for seven years, they answered, that had they known of the existence of such a law, they would not have suffered themselves to be so easily taken. He trusted the House would permit the Bill to be read a second time, as its object was merely to repeal a cruel, absurd, and unjust law.

Sir C. Monck entered into the case mentioned by Sir Samuel Romilly, and could assure the House, from his own knowledge of the circumstances, that the case was one of a particularly aggravated nature, and the offenders were justly punished.

Mr. Huskisson would vote for the amendment, and certainly thought it would be better if the member for Kent would make his bill to enact transportation for armed men going together in bodies for mischievous purposes.

After a few words from Sir E. Brydges and General Thornton, the House divided,

For the amendment 30

Against it 14

A bill to continue two former Acts for preventing improper persons in Ireland from having arms, was read a first time and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

The Window Duty Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 24.

The Exchequer Court Proceedings Bill, and Madhouses Bill, were read a second time.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the order of the day for bringing up the report of this bill.

The Lord Chancellor proposed several verbal amendments, which were agreed to. His lordship said, another amendment was also necessary, it being enacted in the bill that it "shall and may be repealed in the course of the present Session of Parliament." He therefore proposed to omit the words "shall and," which was subsequently agreed to.

Lord Holland thought the enlargement of the words with regard to magistrates objectionable, as they would include all the magistrates of corporations; and he thought in some small towns that such magistrates would be altogether disqualified from acting with proper judgment or sound discretion, under the powers given by this act. With respect to the punishment of death, his lordship again moved the amendment which he had brought forward in the Committee, for leaving out the words enacting the infliction of this punishment.

This amendment was negatived, and his lordship declined moving a similar amendment in another part of the bill.

The Earl of Lauderdale proposed to leave out one of the clauses, by which magistrates were to enter any lecturing rooms, &c. licensed or unlicensed, on account of its being inaccurately or not very distinctly expressed, for the purpose of inserting another clause, providing, that a magistrate might, upon information on oath of improper practices, demand admittance into any lecture room, debating room, or place, &c. and, if refused admittance, that the meeting, whether licensed or not, should be held to be unlawful.

The amendment was negatived.

The Earl of Lauderdale then proposed a clause, exempting from the necessity of taking out a licence, lecturers on anatomy, surgery, chymistry, pharmacy, astronomy, natural philosophy, and physics in general. It was impossible that these subjects could lead to any improper political discussions, and there was no occasion to bring meetings for such a purpose under the provisions of the bill. His particular reason for proposing this amendment was this—the magistrates of Edinburgh were the patrons of the University, and it was to them that the granting of these licences for Edinburgh was intrusted. Now, as patrons of the University, it might be considered the interest of the magistrates to suppress all other lecturing places in the city; and yet, with respect to anatomy, and perhaps other medical subjects, it was well known that the students might derive more benefit from the private lectures than from those in the University; it appeared, therefore, to be highly expedient that this clause should be inserted.

The Earl of Liverpool was not so well acquainted with the University of Edinburgh as the noble lord, and could not pretend to judge so accurately on the matter to which the noble earl referred, not having had the advantage, as the noble earl had, of being educated at that certainly highly respectable University: but he could not conceive that the magistrates would refuse, or would be warranted in refusing, licences for such lectures as the noble earl had mentioned; and it would be invidious to be making exceptions of this nature. It did not appear to him that the amendment was necessary.

The Earl of Lauderdale insisted that it was highly proper at least that the amendment should be inserted. The noble earl had said that, not having been educated at the University of Edinburgh, he was not so capable of judging upon this point as he was, who, as the noble earl supposed, had been there educated: but he knew that there were magistrates connected with the University of Oxford, where, probably, the noble earl had been educated, who thought it their duty, and acted upon the principle of suppressing all other lecturing places whatever in that quarter. Now, it was generally imagined, that persons in the northern parts of the island were not less alive to their own interests than their neighbours in the south. He then, knowing that such was the practice in Oxford, and without considering the point of liberality, knowing that the magistrates of Edinburgh were the patrons of the University, conceived it to be highly expedient that such a clause as this should be introduced.

Lord Melville stated, that the power to grant these licences extended to the sheriff and justices of the peace, as well as to the magistrates of Edinburgh. There was no ground, therefore, for the noble earl's alarm.

Lord Grenville said that the powers of the magistrates, to whom the noble earl alluded, as being connected with the University of Oxford, were confided to them for the exclusive purpose of protecting the interests of the University, and that it was their duty to exert those powers for that exclusive purpose: but it was otherwise with the magistrates of Edinburgh, whose duty it was to attend to the interests of the public, as well as those of the University.

The proposed amendment was negatived.

Lord Holland objected to the provisions of the act, so far as they applied to the declarations and regulations of the various convivial clubs in the metropolis and other places. It would be very vexatious to subject these matters of mere amusement to this sort of superintendence. The societies of Free Masons were not included, and there were great numbers of other societies upon the same plan; and where it was clear that the meetings were not of a political nature, they ought not to be interfered with.

The Earl of Liverpool did not well see how an exception could be made. In these cases they were reduced to the necessity of balancing disadvantages. The only inconvenience was, however, that the declarations, &c. must be made matter of notoriety: but he did not think that regulations as to toasts, and such matters, could be fairly understood as coming within the operation of the act.

Lord Erskine was adverse to this kind of interference with these convivial clubs. There were smoking clubs, puffing clubs, quizzing clubs, and a vast variety of others of a similar description. It would have a tendency to excite disgust among the people to have such convivial meetings interfered with by legislative provisions.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that, if there should be any interference with these societies, nobody was more capable of employing the highest ability for their protection than the noble lord.

Lord Holland said, he was not prepared with any amendment on this subject, but he thought it well worthy of consideration.

Lord Sidmouth proposed a clause, that no public meetings should, during the sitting of Parliament, or the Courts of Law and Equity, or any of them at Westminster, be held for the purpose of petitioning, remonstrating, or any political discussion, within the distance of one mile from Westminster-hall.

Lord Holland said, that this was a very important clause, and ought, if introduced at all, to have been inserted in the bill originally, instead of being proposed at this stage.

Lord St. John said, that the effect of it would be to prevent all meetings of this nature in Westminster.

The Earl of Rosslyn observed, that the object would be accomplished without extending the operation of the clause to the distance of a mile from Westminster-hall. The object was to prevent disturbance to the Courts of Justice, and to prevent obstructions in going to and returning from the two houses; and this purpose would be effected by excluding such assemblies from the immediate neighbourhood of Westminster-hall and Whitehall. The clause, as it stood, would in fact prevent any public meetings from being held in Westminster during the period mentioned, and thus fix a stigma on the people of that city.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that the noble secretary, who was High Steward of Westminster, might perhaps be better acquainted with the liberties of Westminster; but it appeared to him, that the effect of the clause, as it stood, would be to prevent any public meetings from being held, and to fix an improper stigma on the inhabitants.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the clause, in principle, was clearly a proper one to be introduced, as their lordships must be convinced from what they had seen during the present session. With respect to any disturbance of the public peace, those whose duty it was to preserve the peace could not, for obvious reasons, desire a more favourable place for meetings from which any thing of that sort might be apprehended than Palace-yard: but to keep the access to the Houses of Parliament, and to prevent their lordships from being, he might say, insulted, in their approach to the House, it was necessary that these meetings should be forbidden within a certain distance from Westminster-hall. He was informed, that a mile would not extend farther than to the top of St. James's-street: but the distance might be farther considered.

Lord Grenville observed, that the object of their lordships appeared to be much the same. It was necessary that the dignity of Parliament should be preserved; but the proposed distance was greater than appeared necessary to answer the purpose. It was in the power of the Sovereign to call his Parliament wherever he thought proper; and he conceived, that it would be better to have a general enactment, that such meetings should not be held within half a mile of the place where the Parliament should be assembled; leaving to the people of Westminster the same rights, as to meetings of this nature, which were enjoyed by the rest of his Majesty's subjects.

Lord Sidmouth stated, in answer to a question from Lord St. John, that the clause was temporary; meetings for the purposes of elections were exempted from its operation.

Lord Erskine thought it not becoming in Parliament to shew so much jealousy on the subject of public meetings. He agreed with his noble friend, that it was proper to protect members of Parliament from any obstruction in attending their duty; but he wished to see that accomplished without any infringement of the rights of the subject.

Lord Ellenborough regarded the clause as necessary, not only for the protection of Parliament, but for securing due decorum in the Courts. He had had some experience of the noise which sometimes occurred in Westminster-hall, to such a degree as to interrupt the business of the Courts. In one instance the noise and clamour had been so great, that he felt himself bound to declare, that he would not sit to administer justice while such indecorum prevailed; and he called upon the sheriff to clear the hall. The clause had his support.

Lord Erskine agreed with his noble friend in the necessity of preserving decorum during the administration of justice; but if any interruption did take place, it was always in the power of the Court to remove it. Westminster-hall could at any time be ordered to be cleared in the manner his noble friend had done in the instance to which he alluded.

The clause was then agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 24.

This being the last day for receiving private bills, the House was occupied the greater portion of its sitting in their disposal.

The Irish Peace Preservation Bill was read a second time.

The New Street Bill went through a Committee.

Adjourned at half past five.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, March 25.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.]—Lord Sidmouth having moved the order of the day for the third reading of this bill,

Lord Erskine rose.—His objections to the principle of this bill might be comprised in a very short compass, and he would state them to the House. He admitted, that there might be circumstances, as there had been, under which it would be wise and expedient to suspend the strongest provisions of those laws which formed the protection of our liberties and Constitution. He farther admitted, that the more excellent the Constitution was, and none could be more excellent than that of this country, the greater sacrifices ought the people willingly to submit to, when sacrifices were necessary, for its preservation. Then the first point for consideration was, whether, on the evidence, it appeared that the evil was such as to call for the interference of the Legislature, by the repeal of old, or the enactment of new laws; and 2dly, supposing the evil to be such as to call for this sort of interference, whether this bill was a proper remedy. With respect to the first point, he was very sorry that the evidence on which the Committee had proceeded was not before their lordships. In 1795 there were details which would have implicated individuals in a manner which it was highly expedient to avoid: but that was not the case in the present instance; nor did it at all distinctly appear, that the circumstances of the country were such as called for an act of this description. No notice was taken of these matters in the speech from the throne; and when he came to town to attend his duty in Parliament, he had heard of no grounds for alarm, except the atrocious outrage on his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and the riots by a part of the assembly in Spafields. As to the attack on the Prince Regent, he did not mean to censure Ministers, but there had been a great neglect in not checking with more vigour the outrages which sometimes took place on the meeting of Parliament. Matters might be so arranged, under the ordinary laws, as to provide sufficiently for the apprehension of rioters, and their due punishment. When there appeared a disposition to riot, any magistrate might read the Riot Act, and disperse the crowd. Where, then, was the reason for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act? With respect to such meetings as that in Spafields, any magistrate, by proceeding under the Riot Act, might disperse the meeting in case there appeared any tendency to riot; for it was not necessary that any act of violence should be committed. The magistrate was entitled to disperse the meeting if it was tumultuous. It was not necessary that any individual should have actually committed some act of violence. If the general complexion of the meeting was tumultuous, and such as to show a tendency to riot, the provisions of that act would attach on it. That law itself was passed in perilous times, and was not, perhaps, very consistent with the liberty of the subject; but it had been made permanent; and with that instrument in their power where was the occasion for this bill? After reading the preamble of the bill, his lordship said that he was not aware that there had been many meetings that came within the description : but if there should be such, the magistrate might proceed according to the Riot Act, and effectually prevent any very dangerous consequences, without this alteration of the law. His great objection to this bill was, that it was founded on a principle of terror, and not of attachment : and he had no hesitation in saying, that, in his opinion, its tendency was to produce the mischief which it was proposed to cure. Nothing was more likely to do mischief, and to drive people to resort to close and secret combinations. Under this bill no meeting could be held to petition Parliament for redress of grievances or reform, in the most decorous manner, except at the will and pleasure of any one magistrate appointed by the Crown. For what was the bill? After the preamble it went on to enact, that no meeting, to the number of 50, should be held without notice by 7 householders, by advertisement, in the newspapers. This requisite being complied with, you had then a legal meeting, sanctioned by your own authority. One would think, that when thus assembled in a peaceable manner, they might be trusted a little ; and that some confidence might then be placed in British subjects : but see how you dealt with them—their lordships would hear nothing inflammatory from him—if any persons at such a meeting propounded, that the Constitution, as formed of King, Lords, and Commons, should be altered, the meeting ought to be suppressed : and so it ought, if it were to be proposed that laws should be altered without consent of Parliament. Little would be left to the discretion of magistrates in such cases. He was now performing what he conceived to be a sacred duty, and requested the particular attention of their lordships. The words of the bill were, that if any man were to say any thing tending to excite hatred and contempt against the King. Why there, too, he thought there was not much left to the discretion of the magistrate. If one were to utter any thing at a public meeting to excite hatred against the first Magistrate of the State, it was proper that the magistrate should act : but then came a most alarming provision—"If any man shall propound ;"—he did not think there was much left to the magistrate's discretion there : but what did they think of what followed : Or shall hold a discourse tending so and so ? (Hear.) Then suppose a case of this kind were to happen. A meeting is called to consider of petitioning Parliament for a reform in the House of Commons. The meeting is held under the sanction of this bill, which extended to all meetings, except Quaker meetings ; and these were excepted, because nothing was said there, unless some of the parties happened to be moved by the spirit ; but, suppose, at a meeting lawfully assembled, a person were to hold this discourse—"I am one of those who gave notice of this meeting ; the country is in great distress ; we hold Parliament in high reverence, but we think that the people are not properly represented in the House of Commons. The House of Commons ought to be a check on the King and the Lords, in order to preserve the balance of the Constitution ; but what is the actual state of the House of Commons at present ? A majority of that House is returned by the influence of the Crown and the Lords, and there is, in point of fact, no representation of the people at all." He (Lord E.) was speaking of what a person might be supposed to say at such a meeting ; but he really did not know that any ground could be laid for the application for a Reform, without bringing the institution proposed to be reformed, in some measure, into contempt as it stood. What was the meaning of contempt ? and in what glossary was it explained to the magistrate ? He would speak of the magistracy with respect : he had once said to the great Lord Mansfield, when he differed from him on a question of this kind. "If the laws were always to be administered by your lordship, I should have no apprehension." So he said to his noble friend on the woolsack ; and so he would say of the magistrates. It was necessary to consider, not merely who were magistrates, but who might be magistrates ; and it was not fitting that a British subject should be shackled in his actions, or restrained in his words, at the discretion of any one man. Suppose, then, that ten magistrates were present at the meeting ; and that one of them, in opposition to the opinions of the other nine, thought that the discourse which he had stated was illegal, he might take the man into custody. But this was not all ; for suppose another person from the crowd were to interfere and say : "Pray, for God's sake, do not be so hasty ; give the man leave to explain himself ;" the magistrate might reply, and reply with truth, upon the authority of this bill, "Sir, you are guilty of felony without benefit of clergy." (Hear, hear.) The bill enacted, that if any one interrupted or hindered the magistrate in taking a person into custody, he should be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. He gave it as his sincere and honest opinion, that the result of this course of proceeding would be mischievous. If the people met openly, they might be thus dispersed : if they met in a house, the magistrate might demand admittance, whether it was licensed or not, and dismiss them ; so that neither without nor within doors could they meet to petition, as they had an unquestionable right to do, for Reform in the representation, except at the pleasure of any one justice of the peace. He repeated, that his great objection to the bill was, that it was founded on a principle of terror, and not upon a principle of attachment ; and no free government could stand on a principle of terror. The late Mr. Burke, in his letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol, on the affairs of America, had said, "Liberty is in danger of being made unpopular to Englishmen. Contending for an imaginary power,

